After losing popularity during the weak stock market of the 1970s, options surged back into favor in the late 1980s. One reason was public fury over mammoth executive paydays for bosses with just average performance. In an influential 1990 Harvard Business Review article, Mr. Murphy and Michael C. Jensen said the problem was executives were paid like "bureaucrats" instead of entrepreneurs. They called for giving "big rewards for superior performance and big penalties for poor performance."

"We were suggesting people shift from salaries to stock options to put more pay at risk," Mr. Murphy says today. But "that's not what companies ended up doing. They layered on massive amounts of options on top of the rest."

The bandwagon got two big boosts from an unlikely source: Congress.

First, it passed a law, pushed by President Clinton, seeking to rein in executive pay by limiting the tax break for it. The 1993 law said companies couldn't deduct yearly compensation of more than $1 million for any one of their top five officers.

But it exempted certain kinds of pay linked to performance, which included stock options. Companies rushed to restructure pay plans to grant more options. In 1994, the first year the law was in effect, the value of option grants to CEOs at S&P 500 firms leapt by 45% on average, according to Mr. Murphy, and nearly doubled again over the next two years.

The 1993 law "deserves pride of place in the Museum of Unintended Consequences," said Christopher Cox, chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, this fall.

Then in 1994, Congress helped beat back a proposed rule requiring companies to treat a stock-option grant as an expense and deduct it from profits. The plan, backed by the SEC and accounting rule makers, sparked intense corporate opposition. Congress stepped in to fight it, and after a long battle, the accounting rule makers caved. They issued a watered-down rule saying all that companies had to do was disclose in a footnote what options would have done to their profits, had the proposal passed.

Meanwhile, Congress left alone an older law that gave companies a tax deduction whenever stock options were exercised. Under that rule, which applied to the most common type of option given to executives, the employer can deduct a dollar from its income for tax purposes for every dollar of option gains pocketed by employees.

With rules like these, "what wasn't there to like about a stock option?" says Paula Todd, a compensation expert at consulting firm Towers Perrin. "You could grant them in unlimited amounts, with no expense, and claim a tax deduction. [Companies] would pay their dry cleaners if they could with stock options."

Better Than Average

Soon, other forces spurred companies to give executives ever more stock options. One was the "Lake Wobegon effect," named for the mythical Minnesota town in radio host Garrison Keillor's world where all the children are above average. Many boards believed their chiefs should be paid at least as much as the average in their industry, and often more. That attitude had the effect of pushing this average up, year after year.

Another force largely escaped notice because it seemed benign. This was a tendency by companies to grant top executives the same number of options each year, or more, even if the stock price had risen. During a bull market, doing so kept raising the value of pay packages.

Consider an executive who is granted a million options when the stock is at $20. If it's 50% higher a year later, the executive can reap a $10 profit per option, or $10 million.

But now the stock is at $30. If the executive again gets a million options, and the stock again rises 50%, the executive's profit is $15 million, not $10 million. In order to give this executive an option grant of merely the same value in year two as in year one, the year-two grant would have to contain far fewer options.

Directors had a hard time telling a CEO they were cutting the number of options because the stock had risen. Ms. Todd says the CEO's reaction would be, "I worked to get the stock price up, and my next grant is smaller and has a higher strike price?'"

Exxon awarded CEO Lee Raymond a similar number of options yearly from 1993 through 1999 -- 800,000 to 900,000, adjusted for later stock splits. Over that period, the stock rose sharply. The rise meant the value of the 1999 grant was $8.5 million, or six times that of the 1993 grant, by ExecuComp's tally. The calculation used a standard formula for valuing options known as "Black-Scholes," which sets a value for a grant at the time it's given by estimating how much gain it will someday bring the recipient.

An Exxon Mobil Corp. spokesman said the grants were made by a panel of outside directors and based partly on the size of grants to top executives elsewhere. After 2001, Exxon replaced options grants with restricted stock, a different form of compensation that the board said was "more effective in aligning executives' interests with those of shareholders." Mr. Raymond retired a year ago.

At times, the value of options companies doled out has been equal to a large share of their profits. Retailer Abercrombie & Fitch Co. gave CEO Michael Jeffries 4.66 million options in 1999, a grant ExecuComp valued at $120 million. The firm's 1999 net income was $150 million.

Abercrombie didn't actually have to shell out $120 million when it gave the options to Mr. Jeffries, of course. But it incurred an obligation to issue 4.66 million shares someday at the 1999 price. And this obligation didn't have to be reflected as an expense on the company's income statement.

A spokesman for Abercrombie said the grant had a "delayed vesting" feature "intended to incentivize Mike Jeffries to remain with the company...and to continue to generate exceptional financial results." Under him, the stock has risen more than 750% since it began trading in 1996. Mr. Jeffries is eligible to exercise the big 1999 grant now, and if he did so would reap about a $120 million profit.

The options-issuing frenzy reached a peak in 1999 and 2000. Dot-com companies, some with little other way to pay employees, handed out options like confetti. Thousands of people made fortunes on stratospheric rises in the stocks of tech firms, some of which didn't exist a couple of years later. Meanwhile, some "old economy" companies, trying not to lose top people to Silicon Valley, cranked up their own options generators.

In mid-2002, Alan Greenspan testified to Congress about what was then a tech and telecom bust, and about a wave of corporate scandals at firms like Enron, WorldCom and Tyco International. The Federal Reserve's then-chairman spoke of an "infectious greed" that seemed to grip some in business, for which he partly blamed "poorly structured" stock options. Giant grants "perversely created incentives to artificially inflate reported earnings in order to keep stock prices high and rising," he said. "The incentives they created overcame the good judgment of too many corporate managers."

Moving the Goal Post

When stock prices failed to rise, some companies changed the rules. If the share price fell well below stock options' exercise price, they simply lowered that price. Companies defended the move by saying options far "under water" or "out of the money" no longer served as incentives to executives to perform well.

Critics of repricing say it subverts the fundamental options purpose of aligning managers' and shareholders' interests. Since shareholders can't get a refund on a stock they bought that has fallen, the critics say, why should executives be able to do something similar?

Repricings "basically ensure that the manager gets paid no matter what. It takes a lot of risk out of the whole thing," says David Yermack, a New York University professor who studies executive pay.

About 11% of companies repriced options at least once between 1992 and 1997, according to research by Chandra Subramaniam, an associate professor of accounting at the University of Texas at Arlington. Borland Software Corp. did it eight times in the decade ended in 1998. System Software Associates Inc. repriced the same options five times in 1996 and 1997 as its stock kept plunging, Mr. Subramaniam says. In a paper published in 2004, he and his co-authors calculated that repricings padded executives' pay by an average of nearly $500,000 each.

In 1998, a change in accounting rules crimped repricing somewhat. Companies now had to take a hefty charge against earnings if they put new exercise prices on existing options. But there was a loophole. If they canceled the old options, waited six months and issued new ones at a lower price, there was no penalty.

As tech stocks collapsed in the early 2000s, directors rushed to shore up options stranded out of the money. At computer-chip maker PMC-Sierra Inc., the company stock peaked at $245 a share in March 2000, then plunged below $10. Many shareholders fell hard.

The boss had a softer landing. Between September 2002 and March 2003, the company repriced 1.6 million of CEO Robert Bailey's options, slashing the exercise price on some all the way to $5.95 from $52.375. Mr. Bailey has cashed out about a third of the repriced options, for profits of $4.86 million, more than eight times what he'd have made if they hadn't been repriced. PMC-Sierra confirmed the figures but had no other comment.

Lock and Reload

In the late '80s and early '90s, companies found another way to goose stock-option grants: "Reload" them.

Normally, options disappear when exercised. But with a reload plan, a person who exercises options automatically gets replacements. Typically the replacements number fewer than the options exercised. They carry the same expiration date but a different exercise price -- the current market price.

Reload plans are supposed to encourage executives to hold stock in their company, says Mr. Cook, the pay consultant, who invented them. To get a reload, executives exercising options generally must do so not with cash, but with stock. That is, they must hand in existing shares whose value equals the cost of exercising the options. Since executives can't do that unless they own shares, they have an incentive to be shareholders of the company and to hold onto new shares obtained when they exercise options.

Critics decried reloads as abusive, a kind of option replication machine that enriched top managers -- while diluting other stockholders' ownership as the number of shares outstanding rose.

The first reload plan appeared in the late 1980s. By 1999, according to Mr. Cook's firm, nearly a fifth of large companies were offering them.

The king of reloads was Sanford Weill, who retired in April as chairman of Citigroup Inc. with an options fortune largely based on a single grant reloaded many times. In 1992, shareholders of his company, then called Primerica Corp., were asked to approve a reload plan. Deep into the legalese, on page 17, was a clause that would prove extremely lucrative for Mr. Weill: The reload plan applied to previously issued options, including a giant grant Mr. Weill got in 1986.

The plan initially also had an unusual element. Any options issued as a result of reloads wouldn't expire on the options' old expiration date, but could carry a new 10-year term.

Not long after the plan was adopted, Mr. Weill exercised nearly all of his original 1986 options, for a gain of more than $60 million. He then received replacements for most of them, restarting the clock with 10 more years to run. Year after year Mr. Weill exercised some of the replacements, each time getting more new options -- some of which he then exercised, once again getting more replacement options, and so forth.

From 1992 through the end of last year, Mr. Weill racked up total option profits of $964 million, roughly $870 million of which came from the original 1986 options and their generations of reloaded progeny. Shareholders did extremely well, too. As of yesterday, the stock of Citigroup and its predecessors was more than 30 times the price in the 1986 public offering of Mr. Weill's original company.

A Citigroup spokesman, Michael Hanretta, said Mr. Weill's options were so valuable because the company "created superior shareholder value." Mr. Hanretta also noted that employees couldn't activate the reload feature unless the stock had risen 20% from the time an option was granted, and at various times Mr. Weill was required by company policy to hold onto all or most of his shares.

Reloads have died out in recent years, after new accounting rules made them too costly to issue. A separate 2000 rule also made it financially prohibitive to add a reload feature retroactively -- eight years after Mr. Weill got that benefit.

Other rule changes have also helped slow the options express. Besides a 2002 requirement for prompt disclosure of grants, a new accounting rule means companies must record an expense when they make an options grant, and reduce profits accordingly. Many companies have cut back on options, and some have stopped awarding them at all, often replacing them with grants of shares.

Deep Well

Over the years, few corporate executives have availed themselves more thoroughly of what options have to offer than Nabors's Mr. Isenberg.

Still chief executive at the age of 77, Mr. Isenberg lives in the Breakers resort complex in Palm Beach, Fla., and commutes to Nabors's U.S. headquarters in Houston. A generous donor, he has helped found a school in New York for children with learning disabilities and given millions to the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, which has named its business school after him.

Mr. Isenberg worked at Exxon for 13 years and then headed a small steel company, settling into early retirement after that firm was sold in 1982. He was persuaded to rejoin the business world by his friend Martin Whitman, a prominent New York investor, whose fund had taken control of a troubled oil-services company called Anglo Energy. Mr. Isenberg invested some of his own money and in 1987 took the helm of what was soon renamed Nabors Industries.

Early on, Mr. Isenberg personally lent the company $5 million when it wanted to make an acquisition but lacked funds, Nabors says. It was the first in a series of deals that "made the company," said the Nabors spokesman, Denny Smith.

From a regional player, Nabors grew into one of the world's largest contract oil and gas drillers, with yearly revenue of $3.6 billion. Its stock has risen at a lush 21.7% compound annual rate since early 1987, although it has underperformed the Dow Jones Oil Equipment and Services Index in the past five years.

An employment contract Mr. Isenberg got when Nabors emerged from bankruptcy entitled him to an annual bonus equaling a percentage of the company's cash flow above a threshold. Nearly two decades later, Nabors is long out of bankruptcy but has continued to renew this unusual percentage-of-cash-flow deal, albeit with less-generous formulas.

Rather than accept all his bonuses, Mr. Isenberg in many years declined part of them in favor of stock options. By Nabors's reckoning, his option grants were worth tens of millions of dollars in some years. Mr. Smith, the spokesman, said this acceptance of options instead of cash meant Mr. Isenberg was placing a big chunk of already-earned pay "at risk, in alignment with shareholder interests." Mr. Isenberg still received substantial cash bonuses, of as much as $3 million in a year, and sometimes was given additional options.

For a time, Nabors operated under an options "reload" plan. It was a generous one: Instead of replacing only a portion of options that were exercised, it replaced them one-for-one. Mr. Isenberg could cash in options and take profits yet still have just as many options as before, though with higher exercise prices.

In another atypical feature, the replacement options sometimes had new terms of 10 years, making them even more valuable. Nabors says it stopped reloads before 2000. But in that year it gave Mr. Isenberg a "special award" of 2.4 million options, in lieu of a reload on 4.7 million options that he exercised for a $122 million gain. (Share figures in this article aren't adjusted for a recent two-for-one stock split.)

In 1998, amid an industry slump, Nabors's stock sank sharply. Some of Mr. Isenberg's options were "under water." The board repriced them. In exchange for giving up a fourth of his old options, he got new ones carrying a more favorable exercise price.

"The repricing was designed to restore incentive value to the option packages," said Nabors's Mr. Smith. He said repricing was widely available to employees. As it happened, Mr. Isenberg made less money by accepting the repricing deal and giving up some of his options than if he had held on, Mr. Smith said.

Following a single grant from its genesis shows how the various maneuvers can pile up profit.

Mr. Isenberg received a grant of 1.8 million options dated in Sept. 23, 1991. He exercised them in 1996 and 1997, pocketing about $24 million in profits.

Normally, that would have been the end of these options. But Nabors reloaded Mr. Isenberg, replacing his exercised options with a similar number -- which had 10 more years to run.

Then in 1998, amid the stock downturn, Nabors repriced the reload options.

Mr. Isenberg cashed in most of them in 2000 and gave the rest to a family member in 2002. His total profit from a single grant -- reloaded, extended and repriced: about $54 million, not including the gift.

The CEO's overall stock-option gains, both realized and not yet cashed in, came to $685 million at the end of last year, says S&P ExecuComp -- putting him 8th on its list of big winners from 1992 to 2005.

Mr. Isenberg also has benefited from some good timing of his option grants. The Sept. 23, 1991, award was dated on the day Nabors's stock touched its lowest closing price of that month, $5.

But it isn't clear when the price was actually set. Company documents suggest the grant price may actually have been determined many months earlier, on another day when the stock closed at $5. Moreover, the grant was contingent on a new Isenberg employment contract -- which other documents indicate wasn't signed until well after Sept. 23, when the stock was higher.

For a grant of a million options dated Dec. 4, 1995, another monthly low, Nabors produced no minutes of a compensation-committee meeting. Instead, a memo seven weeks later said there had been a discussion on Dec. 4 of Mr. Isenberg trading in part of his bonus for options. The memo said the idea first would be run by a consultant, suggesting the grant wasn't made final until weeks after the stated Dec. 4 award date.

In all, of 11 new option grants to Mr. Isenberg between 1991 and 2002, two were dated at quarterly lows in the Nabors stock price and five more at monthly lows. The odds against such a fortunate pattern occurring by chance are long.

Nabors's Mr. Smith, in a written reply to questions, rejected any notion that any backdating might have been involved. Nabors let the Journal review dozens of pages of documents at its Houston offices that Nabors says support the conclusion that the low-price grants were actually made on the fortunate dates. For four of the seven grants dated at monthly or quarterly lows, Nabors showed compensation-committee minutes saying that meetings were held on those dates and options granted. For another monthly-low grant, it showed committee minutes saying a meeting was held the day after a grant, with the grant made "effective" the previous day.

In mid-2002, a federal law required executives to report option grants within two days after they're made, instead of having weeks or months to do so, a change that sharply cut the potential for backdating. Since mid-2002, none of Mr. Isenberg's four option grants came at monthly stock lows.

Mr. Smith noted that before June 2002, Nabors was registered in Delaware, and directors could meet on short notice. Nabors then became a Bermuda-registered company. Mr. Smith said that since then it has had most board meetings outside the U.S., with options awarded at meetings "scheduled long in advance."

DOJ_NMG_0109123

Mr. Isenberg has received compensation "beyond expectations," Mr. Smith said, because of Nabors's prosperity. The spokesman said Nabors is discussing a restructuring of Mr. Isenberg's future pay arrangement. Meanwhile, he has voluntarily cut the bonus he's entitled to in half.

UnitedHealth Faces Formal Probe (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, December 27, 2006

UnitedHealth Group Inc. said the Securities and Exchange Commission has launched a formal investigation into its stock-options practices.

The Minnetonka, Minn., health insurer had been the subject of an informal SEC inquiry since April.

"The company has cooperated and will continue to cooperate with the SEC," UnitedHealth said in an SEC filing.

The company has delayed financial reports while it reviews its stock-options practices, which have led to an internal probe, a management shake-up and a restatement of financial results. UnitedHealth has said that using current accounting practices, the pretax charges for stock-based compensation expense are likely to range from $400 million to $600 million for the period 1994-2005, as well as from $25 million to $60 million for 2006.

The company has said it has substantially completed its analysis of the adjustments made to its financial statements and has asked for consultation on certain interpretive issues with the SEC's top accounting official. UnitedHealth said it will review these issues with SEC staff before completing its restatement of historical financial statements and filing quarterly reports for the quarters ended June 30 and Sept. 30, 2006.

UnitedHealth is one of the largest companies to be ensnared in the options-backdating scandal, in which companies manipulated the dates that options were awarded to provide additional compensation to executives. More than 130 companies have come under scrutiny by the SEC, and many of those are being investigated by the Justice Department.

DCX Probe Spans Globe (DETNEWS)

Internal probe reveals bribes; ex-FBI chief hired as monitor

WASHINGTON -- DaimlerChrysler AG has hired former FBI director Louis Freeh to serve as an outside monitor as it nears the end of a two-year internal investigation that has uncovered multiple instances of bribery by company employees, according to people familiar with the situation.

The massive internal investigation found employees at the automaker's Mercedes division bribed officials in Asia, Africa and Eastern Europe, the people said.

The bribery allegations, brought to light in 2004 by company whistle-blowers, also are the focus of a civil investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission and a criminal probe by the Justice Department.

Company officials would not comment on the findings of the internal probe.

"The company is very determined to operate our business with the highest ethical standards. We take these matters very seriously," DaimlerChrysler spokesman Han Tjan said. "We're still conducting our investigation."

At its height, the internal investigation led by prominent Washington, D.C., attorney Robert Bennett involved 85 lawyers and nearly as many accountants reviewing millions of documents and conducting hundreds of interviews. The company's legal, accounting and consulting bills connected to the probe have topped tens of millions of dollars, a person familiar with the matter said.

Investigators traveled to 25 countries and interviewed dozens of people, including former DaimlerChrysler Chairman Juergen Schrempp and other executives, the people said. Investigators also uncovered evidence of secret bank accounts.

This fall, DaimlerChrysler hired Freeh as a consultant to monitor the company's compliance with anti-bribery regulations and to review its internal investigation. Freeh's hiring hasn't been announced publicly.

Efforts by The News to reach Freeh, who works as a consultant to companies facing legal issues, were unsuccessful.

DaimlerChrysler has been regularly debriefing the SEC and Justice Department on the findings of its investigation and has turned over interview summaries and documents.

The bribes were seen by some company officials as an accepted way of doing business in many countries, according to people familiar with the investigation. In some cases, the amount of bribes was based on how many Mercedes vehicles were sold in a given market, the people said. In certain instances, investigators struggled to follow the money trail because intermediaries were used.

While DaimlerChrysler's internal probe is nearing completion, federal officials aren't expected to complete their investigations until 2007. Serious settlement discussions aren't expected until early next year.

Aiming to minimize penalties

DaimlerChrysler is clearly aiming to minimize any fines or sanctions by hiring Freeh as an internal monitor and providing federal investigators with the findings of the exhaustive internal investigation.

DaimlerChrysler, which is based in Stuttgart, Germany, and controls the Auburn Hills-based Chrysler Group, could face charges under the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, a 1977 law designed to prevent U.S. companies from acting unethically abroad, because its stock is listed on the New York Stock Exchange.

German companies could deduct certain types of bribes on their taxes until the late 1990s.

German prosecutors in Stuttgart also are investigating whether the company violated anti-bribery and disclosure laws.

In March, DaimlerChrysler revealed in its annual report that an undisclosed number of executives have been disciplined or fired as a result of the investigation and admitted that "improper payments" were made in Asia, Africa and Eastern Europe.

The company reduced 2005 net income by $84.5 million and 2005 operating profit by $21 million to account for the improper payments. It also faces the prospect of having to pay back taxes. Still unclear is how much senior executives knew of the arrangements.

No U.S.-based employees are believed to be involved.

Whistle-blower cases settled

On Dec. 6, the company settled the last of two 2004 whistle-blower suits filed in U.S. District Court in Detroit that prompted the probe. Christine Holtzmann had alleged the company ignored reports of accounting fraud and mishandled audits. She said she was fired in December 2003 after an 18-year career with the automaker after speaking up about the fraud.

In July 2005, DaimlerChrysler settled a 2004 wrongful-firing suit filed in U.S. District Court in Detroit by former Chrysler accountant David Bazzetta.

Bazzetta claimed he was fired in January 2004 in part because he talked to superiors about as many as 40 secret bank accounts maintained by the Mercedes unit to bribe foreign government officials.

He said in his lawsuit he learned of the bank accounts during a corporate audit committee meeting in July 2001 in Stuttgart. According to court filings, Bazzetta claimed a vice president of corporate audit, Hubertus Buderath, told a group "a common practice of Daimler Benz was the use of secret bank accounts to bribe government officials." Buderath allegedly told then-chairman Schrempp that 40 of those accounts still existed and "were buried deep in (the company's) balance sheet." Schrempp denied knowledge of any accounts.

SEC lawyers interviewed Bazzetta and Holtzmann.

Point man is powerful lawyer

The point man for DaimlerChrysler in the internal investigation is Bennett, a high-powered attorney who has represented Enron and KPMG in corporate scandals. He was President Clinton's personal attorney in the Paula Jones civil case and is a partner in Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom LLP.

Bennett declined to comment.

Skadden partner Colleen Mahoney, a former deputy director of enforcement at the SEC, who is also involved in the DaimlerChrysler internal investigation, could not be reached. Two other Skadden Arps partners, former assistant U.S. attorney Gary DiBianco and Mitchell Ettinger, a former chief prosecutor for the Air Force, also have been involved in the probe.

Mark F. Mendelsohn, deputy chief of the Justice Department's fraud section, and Frederic D. Firestone, an SEC associate director of enforcement, who are overseeing the government's investigations into DaimlerChrysler, also declined to comment.

Numerous German companies have faced bribery investigations -- Volkswagen AG for allegedly bribing union officials and most recently engineering giant Siemens AG for allegedly bribing customers using secret bank accounts.

Experts said the government's focus on DaimlerChrysler may be to send a message to the world's third-largest economy to take bribery more seriously.

"The U.S. government really wants to encourage the Germans to crack down," said Peter Henning, a Wayne State University law professor and former SEC attorney. "It's the principle here. The amounts are usually never that large. It's surprisingly cheap to bribe public officials in the Third World."

The SEC has ramped up enforcement of its anti-bribery laws recently, filing more than 100 cases in 2006.

Ex-FBI Chief Freeh Aids DaimlerChrysler Bribe Probe (AP)

AUBURN HILLS, Mich. - Former FBI Director Louis Freeh is aiding DaimlerChrysler AG in its internal investigation of bribery allegations involving company employees, a company spokesman confirmed Tuesday.

DaimlerChrysler spokesman Han Tjan said the German-American automaker has already made an internal announcement that it hired Freeh as an "outside consultant" in the investigation. Freeh's hiring was reported Tuesday by The Detroit News.

Freeh is a member of the Gavel Consulting Group, which consists of former federal judges "who can provide strategic advice to corporations and law firms on anticipated actions in business, litigation and investigations," according to the group's Web site.

A message seeking comment from Freeh was left with the Gavel Consulting Group on Tuesday.

Tjan declined to comment further on either Freeh's role or the company's investigation.

"We stress very much that we take this very seriously and we are determined to operate all our businesses with the highest ethical standards," Tjan said.

In 2004, the Securities and Exchange Commission opened an inquiry after a DaimlerChrysler employee said he was fired for complaining that the company was using secret bank accounts to bribe government officials.

In 2005, DaimlerChrysler acknowledged that the Justice Department was investigating whether the company had paid bribes to foreign officials with the knowledge of its senior executives. The company said it is continuing to cooperate with the investigations.

In March, the automaker said an internal investigation of bribery claims found evidence of "improper payments" in Africa, Asia and Eastern Europe. It said several employees had been dismissed or suspended.

SEC Amends Rules On Disclosing Executive Compensation (LAW)

By Donna Block, The Deal

The Deal, December 27, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission is changing newly adopted rules governing the disclosure of executive and director compensation.

In a statement released Friday, the agency said it is altering the requirements for disclosing the value of stock option awards and giving firms more flexibility in how they report those expenses.

The SEC said the new rules should more closely conform with the reporting of stock option awards under standards in the Financial Accounting Standards Board's rule FAS 123. That rule requires recognition of the costs of stock option awards over the period in which an employee is required to provide service in exchange for the award.

Using this same approach when disclosing executive compensation will give investors a better idea of the compensation earned by an executive or director during a particular reporting period, the SEC explained in its announcement.

The SEC compensation rules were the most extensive overhaul of executive-pay regulations in 14 years. The SEC received more than 20,000 comment letters, a record, before adopting the new rules in July.

Rising compensation has been fueled by the growing use of incentive pay, such as cash bonuses, stock options and other awards. Those incentives have made it hard for investors to get a total pay number on top executives.

Now companies must add a section to the annual proxy statement sent to shareholders that analyzes compensation. In this section, company directors and managers must describe in detail how they determined compensation for the chief executive and other top officials.

SEC Chairman Christopher Cox has said the new requirements will shed new light on the quality of corporate governance and, with the more complete disclosure about payments or benefits to executives, excessive compensation packages may be reined in.

The rule change will be effective once it's published in the Federal Register. The SEC will take public comment for 30 days and make changes to its amended rules if necessary.

S.E.C. Changes Reporting Rule On Bosses' Pay (NYT)

By Floyd Norris

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission, in a move announced late on the last business day before Christmas, reversed a decision it had made in July and adopted a rule that would allow many companies to report significantly lower total compensation for top executives.

The change in the way grants of stock options are to be explained to investors is a victory for corporations that had opposed the rule when it was issued in July, and a defeat for institutional investors that had backed the S.E.C.'s original rule.

"It was a holiday present to corporate America," Ann Yerger, the executive director of the Council of Institutional Investors, said yesterday. "It will certainly make the numbers look smaller in 2007 than they would otherwise have looked."

Christopher Cox, the commission chairman, said yesterday that he viewed the decision as "a relative technicality" that improved the rule. When the rule was adopted in July, Mr. Cox said it was aimed at providing information that would allow shareholders to "make better decisions about the appropriate amount to pay the men and women entrusted with running their companies."

In announcing the new rule on Friday, he said "the new disclosure requirements will be easier for companies to prepare and for investors to understand."

As controversy has grown over rising executive pay, it has been hard to even get agreement on the total value of compensation for top executives. The rules passed last summer required companies to disclose more information and to compile it in a summary compensation table that is expected to become the standard by which corporate pay is compared.

The new rule changes the way grants of stock options will be measured in that summary table.

Under the old rule, if a company awarded an options grant valued at $15 million to an executive this year, the full amount of $15 million would show up in the summary compensation table.

Under the new rule, which takes effect immediately, the amount reflected in the table would be much smaller, with the remaining part of the $15 million included in later years, as the executive qualifies to exercise the options.

Under some circumstances, the options grant might not be reported at all in the first year, even if the executive would otherwise have been the company's highest paid executive had the full value of the option grant been included.

The new rule is intended to make the disclosures identical to the way companies report options expenses in their financial statements, under accounting standard 123R, as approved by the Financial Accounting Standards Board.

In an interview yesterday, Mr. Cox said the change reflected what the commission had intended to do when it adopted the original rule in July. "My understanding all along was that we were going to follow the 123R model," he said. "It came out differently from that when we adopted it."

The fact it came out differently was disclosed by the S.E.C. at the time. The commission pointed out that some companies had wanted to time the disclosures in accordance with the accounting rule, but said the other approach "is more consistent with the purpose of executive compensation disclosure."

But on Friday, the S.E.C. said it now believed that the change would provide "a fuller and more useful picture of executive compensation than our recently adopted rules."

While practices vary, stock options often vest — meaning they may be exercised — over a period of three to five years after they are granted. The options can be canceled if the employee leaves the company before they vest.

For most executives, the accounting rule says the expense should be spread over the period from the grant to full vesting. So if options vest over five years, the expense would be reported over that period.

In the $15 million example, if the options vested over a five-year period, the summary compensation table would reflect a cost of $3 million per year. In the first year, the cost might be lower if the options were issued relatively late in the year, and could be almost nothing if they were issued just before the end of the company's fiscal year.

But the new rule could create confusion because it would treat options issued to some executives — those eligible for retirement — differently.

If an executive were eligible to retire when the option was granted, and could keep the option if he or she did retire, then the entire option grant would be expensed immediately and listed in the summary table in the year it was granted.

But if the executive is not eligible for retirement, then the expense is spread out over the several years it takes for the options to vest.

That makes it possible that two executives with identical pay packages would have very different disclosures, making the one eligible for retirement seem to be much better compensated. "This will muddy the waters," Ms. Yerger said.

Asked about that, Mr. Cox conceded it was an anomaly. But he said there were anomalies under the other rule as well. John White, the director of the commission's division of corporation finance, pointed to the fact that the rule adopted in July could lead to reporting of compensation that would never be received.

"The anomaly that the commission was most concerned with was that if an executive leaves the company before the options vest, the full amount of the option still was reported in compensation disclosure when, in fact, nothing was received," said Mr. White, who became director of the division in March, after the previous rules were proposed but before they were adopted.

He said that some companies issued options that had so-called cliff-vesting, in which all options vested after five years, and were forfeited if the executive left before that time. Under the new rule, expenses would still be reported for the first years, but then a negative amount would be reported in the year the executive left, reversing the earlier reported figures. There was no such reversal in the July rules.

The commission adopted the new rule in an unusual way, making it take effect immediately even though the commission had not announced that it was considering a change and had not sought public comment.

An S.E.C. spokesman pointed to two other rules adopted that way in recent years. Both were intended to comply with new federal laws that were about to take effect.

One, in 2000, stated that e-mail messages from mutual funds could satisfy rules requiring that information be given to customers in writing. The other, in 2001, established rules for complying with the Gramm-Leach-Bliley Act allowing mergers of financial companies.

Mr. Cox said there was no time to seek comment if the change announced Friday was to take effect in time to affect proxies issued in coming months. He said it would be confusing if companies reported one way in 2007 and then changed in 2008.

The rules adopted in July were intended to deal with widespread complaints that it was difficult to discover all elements of pay packages for top executives. Besides providing the summary table, the disclosures will provide new information in a number of areas, including retirement benefits.

The disclosures will be made for a company's chief executive, chief financial officer and the three other highest paid executives, as indicated by the summary table. For those on the list, all option grants will be disclosed, so even if the summary table leaves out much of the value of options granted to a chief executive, investors could see the terms of the grant and consider it in assessing how well the executive was paid.

Under the July rule, a large options grant to an executive could propel him or her onto the disclosure list. But under the rule adopted Friday, such a grant might not put the executive in that group, meaning there would be no disclosure of that executive's pay that year.

Over time, of course, most executives whose pay is being disclosed would have the same total reported under either rule. Under the new rule, options that were granted in prior years, but vested in 2006, will show up in next spring's disclosures.

The reduction in reported pay is likely to be the largest at companies that accelerated the vesting of options in 2005 to avoid reporting them as an expense at all when the new accounting rule went into effect. Executives at those companies will not have as many old options vesting as they normally would have, and thus will be able to report lower pay.

The commission said it would take public comments on the latest change for 30 days, but it added that the new rules were now final.

When the commission considered the issue earlier this year, David C. Chavern, a vice president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, urged it to take the step it rejected in July and adopted on Friday, saying that to do otherwise would overstate compensation, since options would not have been earned when they were reported, and might later be canceled.

Whenever the value of the options shows up in the summary table, the value shown will be the estimated value of the option at the time it was granted. Years later, when the options vest, the stock price could be much higher or lower than it was when the option was issued, making the options much more valuable — or all but worthless — by the time they show up in the summary compensation table at the old value.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Police Chiefs Eye More Federal Aid (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, December 27, 2006

The International Association of the Chiefs of Police is urging Congress to step up its support for law-enforcement agencies after what it calls "years of deep budget cuts and a disturbing rise in crime rates."

"The FBI's crime report ... serves as a stark reminder of what happens when law-enforcement agencies are stretched too thin: crime rates rise," said Joseph Carter, chief of the Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority Transit Police Department and president of the IACP.

"We are hopeful that the 110th Congress will take our suggestions to heart and not only completely fund important programs, but also establish new programs and enhance others that will help state, local and tribal law enforcement keep our homeland and hometowns safe," Chief Carter said.

If law-enforcement authorities are to be successful in their efforts to protect the public from "both crime and the menace of terrorism," he said, they "must receive the tools and resources they need." He said the IACP thinks Congress must:

•Fully fund the Byrne Justice Assistance Grant Program at $1.1 billion, the Community Oriented Policing Service program at $1.05 billion, and the Law Enforcement Terrorism Prevention Program at $500 million.

•Promote information and intelligence-sharing, establish a National Commission on Law Enforcement and the Administration of Justice, and enhance police recruitment and retention.

•Reform the Communications Assistance for Law Enforcement Act, reinstate the assault-weapons ban and establish a certified officers clearinghouse.

"The IACP is hopeful the 110th Congress will help law-enforcement agencies reverse this dangerous trend by implementing these innovative solutions," Chief Carter said.

He said the IACP is "very concerned" that the debate over funding for the various law-enforcement and homeland security assistance programs has become increasingly partisan during the past several years and that the issue is too important "to the safety of our communities and our nation to allow political differences to delay or reduce funding."

On Tuesday, the FBI reported that violent crime nationwide increased by 3.7 percent in the first six months of this year, continuing a trend that began in 2005. Last year, the number of violent crimes increased by 2.5 percent, the largest gain in 15 years, and the Justice Department pledged to find out why the crime numbers were continuing to increase.

The FBI's Preliminary Semiannual Uniform Crime Report, based on statistics submitted by 11,535 law-enforcement agencies nationwide, showed increases in murders (up 1.4 percent), robberies (up 9.7 percent) and aggravated assaults (up 1.2 percent) over the same period in 2005.

According to the FBI report, the largest increases in the reported number of violent crimes, 12.8 percent, occurred in small cities with populations of 10,000 to 24,999, while cities with populations of 500,000 to 999,999 had the most marked increase in reported murder offenses, up 8.4 percent.

Founded in 1893, the IACP is the world's oldest and largest association of law-enforcement executives with more than 20,000 members in nearly 100 countries.

Canadian Gold Medalist Detained On Child Abduction Charge (AP)

By Brian Witte

BALTIMORE - A federal judge on Tuesday ordered Canadian Olympic gold-medalist Myriam Bedard to temporarily remain in the custody of U.S. marshals after being charged with violating a child custody order by bringing her 12-year-old daughter to the United States.

U.S. Magistrate Judge James K. Bredar scheduled a hearing for Friday in Baltimore to address whether the U.S. government has the authority to detain the former biathlon champion pending extradition to Canada.

Kevin McCants, an attorney representing Bedard, said he was working on an arrangement that would enable his client to return voluntarily to Quebec on Friday to face the charge. McCants said the holidays have made it difficult to negotiate, but he has been in touch with Canadian prosecutors.

"We're hoping to have a deal in place in the next day or so," McCants said.

Bedard, 37, was arrested Friday night in Maryland after U.S. marshals found her and her 12-year-old daughter, Maude, at a Columbia hotel. Bedard, of Quebec, Canada, has been in the custody of U.S. marshals since the arrest. Her daughter is back in the custody of Bedard's ex-husband, Jean Paquet.

Bedard faces up to 10 years in prison on the child abduction charge, but her attorneys contend she didn't break the law.

"She's confident that when these proceedings are over that ... she will be vindicated. She's done nothing wrong," McCants said.

Bedard appeared at her initial appearance in U.S. District Court in Baltimore wearing an orange jail jumpsuit. McCants said Bedard was disappointed she had to remain in custody, but he said she told him she was OK.

"She was fine with it," McCants said. "I think I was more disappointed than anyone."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Philip Jackson argued that Bedard should be detained because she was a flight risk.

Quebec City police obtained an arrest warrant against Bedard on Dec. 8 after Paquet alleged she had taken their daughter away from Quebec City without his permission in violation of a child custody order.

An arrest warrant for Bedard was first issued from Quebec City, Canada. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police contacted the U.S. Marshals Service and the Capital Area Regional Fugitive Task Force on Dec. 15 to help find Bedard.

When marshals determined she was in the United States, a provisional arrest warrant was obtained on Wednesday. After she was arrested, Bedard was taken to the Howard County Detention Center in Jessup.

John Pepper Jr., an attorney who also is representing Bedard, said Paquet has been unclear about when he wanted to see his daughter.

"We're still waiting for him to come forth and make us aware of which periods he would like," Pepper said.

He also said Paquet was kept informed of where the girl was and that Bedard "feels absolutely devastated by the fact that Mr. Paquet would act in such a manner."

Bedard won two gold medals in the biathlon competition at the Olympic Games in Lillehammer, Norway in 1994. She won a bronze medal in that same event in the 1992 Winter Olympics in Albertville, France.

Bedard has been traveling in the United States with her current common-law spouse, Nima Mazhari, who was at the courthouse Tuesday.

Mazhari has had his own share of legal problems, being charged in 2005 with theft and possession of about 20 stolen paintings worth $100,000.

ID Thief Forges Leniency Letter (PPG)

By Torsten Ove, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, December 27, 2006

Authorities seek man who broke probation terms

A man whose prosecution three years ago was announced as part of an identity theft crackdown dubbed "Operation Identity Crisis" is in trouble again after trying to fool a notoriously no-nonsense federal judge with a forged letter asking for leniency.

U.S. marshals are looking for James M. Lyle, 22, of the West End, who was released from federal prison in May, after he failed to appear Thursday for a probation violation hearing before Senior U.S. District Judge Alan Bloch.

Mr. Lyle, who had more than 3 million credit card numbers on his computer when Pittsburgh police arrested him in 2003, was arrested again last month on new theft charges stemming from an August online purchase of a laptop computer with a stolen credit card.

That new arrest meant he had violated the terms of his probation from his previous federal case, according to a filing by the U.S. Probation Office.

At a hearing before Judge Bloch on Dec. 13, Mr. Lyle admitted the new offense and the judge placed him on home detention until a space opens up for a six-month term at a Downtown halfway house.

At that hearing, Mr. Lyle also presented the judge with a letter purportedly from Timothy Savina, his boss at British Petroleum in Scott where he had been working, indicating that Mr. Lyle was turning his life around and shouldn't go back to jail.

But Assistant U.S. Attorney Brendan Conway thought the letter looked suspicious and asked police to check it out.

"Mr. Savina has indicated that the letter is a forgery," Mr. Conway said in court papers, "that he did not prepare or sign the letter, and that he did not authorize the preparation of the letter."

What's more, Mr. Savina said Mr. Lyle, who was a manager-in-training at BP, got through the company's criminal background check by claiming his felony record was really his father's.

When confronted, Mr. Savina said, Mr. Lyle admitted that he had a friend prepare the letter for him.

"Mr. Lyle has now been terminated from his employment at BP," said Mr. Conway.

After the forgery came to light, Judge Bloch scheduled a new hearing for Dec. 21, at which time there was a good chance Mr. Lyle would go to jail. But Mr. Lyle didn't show and the judge, who has a reputation as the toughest on the federal bench in Pittsburgh, issued a warrant for his arrest.

Michael Novara, Mr. Lyle's public defender, was not available yesterday.

Mr. Lyle had been arrested by Pittsburgh police for credit card theft before 2003, but after another arrest that year authorities decided to lump him together with 11 other defendants as part of "Operation Identity Crisis," a joint effort of the U.S. Justice Department, U.S. Postal Inspectors, Federal Trade Commission, U.S. Secret Service and various banks.

Pittsburgh police had found Mr. Lyle, 19 at the time, in possession of more than 15 counterfeit credit cards, more than 3.1 million American Express card numbers, 158,765 Discover card numbers and 43,000 Visa card numbers.

A federal grand jury indicted him in 2003, he pleaded guilty the following year and Judge Bloch sentenced him to 27 months.

The judge also ordered him to pay $3,549 in restitution to various retailers that he defrauded and not to commit any more crimes.

Kansas Judge Lets Attorney General Press Abortion Case (USAT/AP)

TOPEKA, Kan. (AP) — A judge agreed Tuesday to let Kansas' attorney general, a vocal abortion opponent, try to persuade him to reinstate charges against a well-known abortion provider.

District Judge Paul W. Clark scheduled a hearing for Wednesday after Attorney General Phill Kline asked him to reconsider his decision to dismiss the case against Dr. George Tiller over a jurisdictional issue.

Kline, who lost his re-election bid in November and leaves office in three weeks, filed 30 misdemeanor counts last week accusing Tiller of illegally performing 15 late-term abortions.

On Friday, Clark dismissed the charges after Sedgwick County District Attorney Nola Foulston argued that Kline didn't have the authority to file the charges.

The judge said he would consider on Wednesday only whether a district court can limit a district attorney's power to dismiss a criminal case and, if there are circumstances allowing a court to intervene, whether they are present in Tiller's case.

Clark said Attorney General-elect Paul Morrison could participate.

Kline, a Republican and staunch abortion opponent, lost the Nov. 7 general election to Morrison, a Democrat.

Kline has been investigating whether Tiller and other abortion providers performed illegal late-term abortions in Kansas or failed to report suspected child abuse as required by law. Earlier this year, he obtained the records of 90 patients from Tiller's clinic and a clinic operated by Planned Parenthood of Kansas and Mid-Missouri.

Tiller's attorneys have contended the charges are groundless.

Kline spokesman Jan Lunsford and Foulston spokeswoman Georgia Cole did not immediately return calls Tuesday seeking comment.

Tiller's clinic, one of the few in the country to perform late-term abortions, has been a high-profile target of abortion opponents for decades. The clinic was bombed in 1985, and Tiller was shot in both arms by a protester in 1993.

Pet Store Owners Find Airline Luggage Lost From International Flights In Houston Trash Bin (AP)

HOUSTON: Authorities were trying to figure out how dozens of pieces of luggage belonging to international air travelers ended up in a trash bin behind a Houston pet store.

FBI special agent Rolando Munoz said 68 pieces of luggage from various international flights were discovered. He said the luggage was turned over to Continental Airlines to sort out.

Sgt. Dana Wolfe, a spokeswoman for the Harris County Sheriff's Office, which first responded to the luggage report, said the bags belonged to travelers at George Bush Intercontinental Airport. She said tags on the bags showed some of the travelers were going to or from London and Dubai.

The Houston Police Department is handling the case, Munoz and Wolfe said. A Houston police spokesman had no additional details Tuesday night.

Mary Clark, a spokeswoman for Continental, said she did not know if the contents of the bags were stolen.

"We're going to be investigating and the authorities are going to be investigating," she said, adding that the airline was working with other carriers to match the bags with lost luggage claims. She did not have the names of the other airlines but broadcast reports identified them as Continental Airlines, Lufthansa, British Airways and U.S. Airways.

The owners of a Pet City store found the luggage.

Cybercrooks Deliver Trouble (WP)

By Brian Krebs

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

It was the year of computing dangerously, and next year could be worse.

That is the assessment of computer security experts, who said 2006 was marked by an unprecedented spike in junk e-mail and more sophisticated Internet attacks by cybercrooks.

Few believe 2007 will be any brighter for consumers, who already are struggling to avoid the clever scams they encounter while banking, shopping or just surfing online. Experts say online criminals are growing smarter about hiding personal data they have stolen on the Internet and are using new methods for attacking computers that are harder to detect.

"Criminals have gone from trying to hit as many machines as possible to focusing on techniques that allow them to remain undetected on infected machines longer," said Vincent Weafer, director of security response at Symantec, an Internet security firm in Cuptertino, Calif.

One of the best measures of the rise in cybercrime is junk e-mail, or spam, because much of it is relayed by computers controlled by Internet criminals, experts said. More than 90 percent of all e-mail sent online in October was unsolicited junk mail, according to Postini, an e-mail security firm in San Carlos, Calif. Spam volumes monitored by Postini rose 73 percent in the past two months as spammers began embedding their messages in images to evade junk e-mail filters that search for particular words and phrases. In November, Postini's spam filters, used by many large companies, blocked 22 billion junk-mail messages, up from about 12 billion in September.

The result is putting pressure on network administrators and corporate technology departments, because junk mail laden with images typically requires three times as much storage space and Internet bandwidth as a text message, said Daniel Druker, Postini's vice president for marketing.

"We're getting an unprecedented amount of calls from people whose e-mail systems are melting down under this onslaught," Druker said.

Spam volumes are often viewed as a barometer for the relative security of the Internet community, in part because most spam is relayed via "bots," a term used to describe personal computers that online criminals have taken control of surreptitiously with computer viruses or worms. The more computers the bad guys control and link together in networks, or botnets, the greater volume of spam they can blast onto the Internet.

At any given time, between 3 million and 4 million compromised computers are active on the Internet, according to Gadi Evron, who managed Internet security for the Israeli government before joining Beyond Security, an Israeli security firm. And that estimate only counts spam bots. Evron said millions of other hijacked computers are used to launch "distributed denial-of-service" attacks -- online shakedowns in which attackers overwhelm Web sites with useless data and demand payment to stop.

"Botnets have become the moving force behind organized crime online, with a low-risk, high-profit calculation," Evron said.

He estimated that organized criminals would earn about $2 billion this year through "phishing" scams, which involve the use of spam and fake Web sites to trick computer users into disclosing their financial and other personal data.

Another trend experts cite is the steady shift of Internet criminal activity from nights and weekends to weekdays, suggesting that online crime is evolving into a full-time profession for many.

Symantec found that the incidence of phishing scams has dropped significantly on Sundays and Mondays in the United States. The firm found a similar trend when it examined the pattern of new virus variants compiled and released by attackers.

"The bulk of the fraud attacks we're seeing now are coming in Monday through Friday, in the 9-to-5 U.S.-workday timeframe," Symantec's Weafer said. "We now have groups of attackers who are motivated by profit and willing to spend the time and effort to learn how to conduct these attacks on a regular basis. For a great many online criminals these days, this is their day job: They're working full time now."

Criminals are also becoming more sophisticated in evading anti-fraud efforts. This year saw the advent and wide deployment of Web-browser based "toolbars" with embedded technology designed to detect when users have visited a known or suspected phishing Web site. But many scam artists responded by developing new methods of hosting their fraudulent Web sites and routing traffic to them that made them harder for law enforcement and security experts to thwart.

"We've seen a pretty big evolutionary jump in tactics used by phishers over the past year, and I believe it's because some of the toolbar makers and the good guys who work to get these scam sites shut down have really done a good job at preventing them from being successful," said Dan Hubbard, vice president of research for Websense, an online security firm in San Diego.

The past 12 months also brought a steep increase in the number of software vulnerabilities discovered by researchers and actively exploited by criminals. The world's largest software maker, Microsoft, this year issued software fixes to 97 security holes that it classified as "critical," meaning hackers could use them to break into vulnerable machines without any action on the part of the user.

In contrast, Microsoft shipped just 37 critical updates in 2005. Fourteen of this year's critical flaws were known as "zero day" threats, meaning Microsoft first learned about the security holes only after criminals had already begun using them.

The year began with a zero-day hole in Microsoft's Internet Explorer, the Web browser of choice for about 80 percent of the world's online users. Criminals were able to exploit the flaw to install keystroke-recording and password-stealing software on millions of computers running Windows software.

At least 11 of those zero-day vulnerabilities were in the Microsoft Office productivity software suites, flaws that bad guys mainly used in targeted attacks against corporations, according to the SANS Internet Storm Center, a security research and training group in Bethesda. Microsoft issued patches to correct a total of 37 critical Office security flaws this year.

The year also was notable for a wave of attacks exploiting flaws in software applications that run on top of operating systems, such as media players and Web browsers. In February, attackers used a security hole in AOL's popular Winamp media player to install a hidden program when users downloaded a seemingly harmless playlist file. This month, a computer worm took advantage of a design flaw in Apple Computer's QuickTime media player to steal passwords from about 100,000 MySpace.com bloggers, accounts that were then hijacked and used for sending spam. Also this month, security experts spotted a computer worm spreading online that was powered by a six-month old hole in a corporate anti-virus product from Symantec.

Many security professionals speak highly of Microsoft's Vista, the newest version of Windows scheduled for release next month. The program includes improvements that should help users stay more secure online, such as a Web browser with new anti-fraud tools, as well as operating system changes that should make it more difficult for rogue software or viruses to make unwanted changes to key system settings and files.

But some security vulnerabilities have been identified in Vista already, including at least one in its new browser, Internet Explorer 7. Moreover, experts worry that businesses will be slow to switch to the new operating system and note that even if consumers adopt it more quickly, Microsoft will continue to battle security holes in legacy versions of its Office product.

Some software security vendors suspect that a new Trojan horse program that surfaced last month, called "Rustock.B," may serve as the template for future malicious software. The program morphs itself slightly each time it installs itself on a new machine in an effort to evade anti-virus software. In addition, it hides in the deepest recesses of the Windows operating system, creates invisible copies of itself, and refuses to work under common security analysis tools in an attempt to defy identification and analysis.

"This is about the nastiest piece of malware we've ever seen, and we're going to be seeing more of it," said Alex Eckelberry, president of the security vendor Sunbelt Software in Clearwater, Fla. "The new threats that we saw in 2006 have shown us that the malware authors are ingenious and creative in their methods."

Leading Cyber-Pirates Of The World (WSJ)

By Paul Mcmanus

The Wall Street Journal, December 27, 2006

There is a new and grave threat to companies selling proprietary wares and services online: Their brand can be tarnished and customers stolen by a keystroke. With the Web now the shopping mall of choice for time-crunched consumers, cyber-thieves are "dressing up" Web sites and tweaking competitors' domain names to capture unsuspecting shoppers.

The more sophisticated scammers are criminals who electronically embed specially coded software programs on the browsers of PCs. Simply clicking on to a Web site link can plant code in a computer that takes command of its browser. These bugs hijack a search and redirect it to a fraudulent site masquerading as the legitimate one. The consumer unwittingly gives away personal and financial information that can be sliced, diced and resold worldwide.

The brand, too, is the victim of this theft. In the luxury hospitality sector, for example, where a hotel's reputation for privacy, personal service and an exceptional experience is a major asset, anything that misleads or defrauds the guest can cause permanent damage. And the consumer can end up paying top dollar for an inferior property. A traveler who believes he's using The Leading Hotels of the World's Web site to make a reservation at a five-star hotel in Paris might be electronically kidnapped and booked at a two-star with a lyrical French name. Everyone loses: The traveler is duped. Our member hotel loses revenue. And in the eyes of that traveler, our brand is robbed of credibility and cachet.

The modus operandi of this breed of pirate is to challenge a long-established company's trademark and Web site domain name -- or simply to ignore it. The brand that's attacked is forced to spend large amounts of time and money registering trademarks and URLs in 50 or 60 countries, or litigating protracted lawsuits. I speak from costly experience: In one case, travelers complained that when they searched for "palace" hotels at our Web site, they were rerouted to a site owned by a South African company that claimed to offer luxury hotels rooms at steep discount. We took legal action and after an eight-year battle won judgment for trademark infringement, shutting down the site.

What's needed is a set of international laws protecting business and consumers against Internet fraud plus a global squad of cyber crime-busters to enforce them. The U.S. has specific computer fraud laws and the FBI takes "thousands of complaints" annually through its Internet Crime Complaint Center (www.ic3.gov). But perpetrators who zero in on businesses like mine often work in countries with no laws protecting Web users and lax or little cooperation with U.S. or other foreign law-enforcement agencies.

Collaboration is the only realistic solution for the private sector to protect brands from online pirates. The global Internet community is already working together through ICANN, the Internet Corporation for Assigned Names and Numbers, a nonprofit that creates and allocates Internet protocol addresses, and resolves disputes over rights to domain names. ICANN is a natural for stepping into the computer crime arena. It has respect, international treaties, a global presence and a solid organizational structure. But don't expect ICANN to wage war all by itself. Those of us in the business world who can't rely on the government for brand protection have to be partners in long battle.

Rapist Preys On Men In Suburban Houston (AP)

By John Porretto, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 27, 2006

A rapist who has struck at least five times since April in and around Baytown has not only spread fear in this working-class community but also piqued the interest of those who study the criminal mind. The reason: He preys on other men.

That makes him something of a rarity in the world of crime.

"It's the least prevalent kind of serial rape, and largely underreported," said Jack Levin, a leading criminologist and director of the Brudnick Center on Violence at Northeastern University in Boston.

Levin and other experts say male-on-male rape sometimes stems from sexual encounters gone bad. But that does not appear to be the case with the rapist in this oil-refining town of 70,000 people about 30 miles east of Houston.

Instead, he methodically identifies and stalks young men and attacks them at gunpoint or knifepoint in or near their homes, according to police Capt. Roger Clifford. Sometimes he robs his victims, too, but rape appears to be the primary motivation, police said.

"This is certainly of interest, an interesting case," Levin said.

The U.S. Justice Department says one in 33 men in the United States has been a victim of a rape or attempted rape, compared with one in six women. Experts say men are far less likely to report a rape to authorities, because they fear being perceived as weak or see the attack as an assault on their masculinity.

In fact, investigators in Baytown fear there may be other victims of the rapist who are too ashamed to come forward.

"There's a lot of emotional damage that goes with being raped, especially when the victims are men," said Lynn Parrish, a spokeswoman for the National Rape, Abuse & Incest National Network. But she added: "The best way to get this rapist off the street is for more people to come forward."

Three of the attacks have occurred in the city, the other two on the outskirts of town. The most recent attack was Nov. 30. Clifford would not give details of the rapes but said at least one victim managed to thwart the attack.

No one has been seriously hurt.

"But it's only going to take one victim who resists enough or in the wrong way until the gun is going to go off, the knife is going to be used, and we're going to have a victim with serious injuries or who's dead," Clifford said.

Criminologists have seen cases of serial killers who raped or otherwise had sex with their male victims - among them, John Wayne Gacy and Jeffrey Dahmer. But psychologically, this is a different phenomenon.

Levin said it is rare for a serial rapist to become a serial killer.

"I think the reason has to do with the absence or presence of a conscience," he said. "A serial rapist is more likely to have a conscience. Otherwise they'd take the life and silence the victim."

Victims have described the Baytown attacker as a clean-shaven black man, 18 to 21 years old, 5-foot-10 to 6 feet tall and about 200 pounds, with a shaved head. Police have released a sketch and are working with the FBI's behavioral sciences unit to develop a psychological profile. DNA testing also is under way.

Fliers with the sketch have been circulated around schools and Baytown's Lee College, with an enrollment of about 6,000.

Jay Ali, an 18-year-old who works at the local mall, said he has been spreading the word among friends. "There's a loose psycho running around raping men," he said.

The local paper, The Baytown Sun, has run the sketch and details of the crimes at the top of its front page nearly every day since the most recent attack, and an electronic bulletin board on its Web site is filled with discussion about the rapes.

"I have selfish reasons for wanting this guy caught," Marie W. wrote in a posting Dec. 12. "I have a son who fits this guy's target group. ... I want him off the streets and locked up like yesterday."

Virginia DNA Review Hobbled (WP)

By Candace Rondeaux

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

A year after Virginia's crime lab launched an unprecedented review of old cases that experts said could free dozens of wrongly convicted people, the project appears to be years from completion, and some are questioning the credentials of the private company selected to do the DNA testing.

Former Virginia governor Mark R. Warner (D) ordered a full review of the cases last December after an analysis of old evidence revealed that two men were not guilty of sexual assault. Warner pardoned the men, who became part of a wave of exonerations that reignited a national debate over post-conviction DNA testing.

At the time, Virginia crime lab director Paul Ferrara predicted that the retesting project would be completed within two years and could free dozens of innocent inmates. But now, just days from retirement, Ferrara has revised his prediction, saying changes at the lab have stalled progress.

"We got nowhere for a while. It has suffered some delays because of staff turnover," Ferrara said. "But we're as interested and as anxious to see this thing through as everyone else. We could see as many as 30 possible exonerations when this is all over with."

The physical evidence came to light in 2001, when an inmate asserted his innocence under a new state law that for the first time granted the right to request testing of newly discovered evidence more than 21 days after sentencing. Lab analyst Mary Jane Burton, who retired in 1988 and died in 1999, and two other lab workers meticulously preserved pieces of clothing smeared with blood, semen or saliva before DNA testing got underway in the early 1990s. A cursory review of a small sample of Burton's files has exonerated five former convicts.

Earlier this year, legal experts speculated that the retesting effort could be slowed when Ferrara, 64, announced in August plans to retire by the end of this year. Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) has not selected Ferrara's successor, but the state's Forensic Science Board has interviewed several internal and external candidates, and a decision is expected next month, Virginia officials familiar with the process said.

The evidence review entails a painstaking, multi-step process of separating out cases contained in 660 boxes packed with thousands of files from 1973 through 1988, identifying suspects convicted in each case and determining if physical evidence samples can be tested for DNA.

So far, graduate students hired to help with the project have sifted through more than 329,000 cases, Ferrara said. They will sort and index about 234,000 more files held at regional labs across the state before the bulk of the work is done. They have logged 3,135 cases that have some form of biological evidence retained in the file. No DNA tests have been performed on any of the evidence yet, but Ferrara said he hopes to send the first batch out for testing soon.

"It's going to be slow," Ferrara said. "But I think anyone would rather see us proceed cautiously rather than haphazardly."

The slow pace, however, concerns some. Peter Neufeld, co-director of the New York-based Innocence Project, which has helped exonerate more than 170 inmates, lauded the state for launching the review, saying other states should follow Virginia's example. But Neufeld, who said his organization has several cases pending in Virginia, worries that the review isn't moving quickly enough.

"To allow that to drag as long as it has is unfortunate. It undermines the efficacy of what Governor Warner had intended. It slows down the exoneration of innocent Virginians who are languishing in prison," Neufeld said.

The state selected Bode Technology, a private Fairfax County-based lab, to conduct DNA tests on the samples, a contract valued at an estimated $1.4 million. Bode has won several contracts with the state and has been awarded about $9.3 million overall for outsourced work, according to the Virginia Department of Forensic Science.

But Bode's recent dealings with another state crime lab have been rocky. In August 2005, the company made national headlines after the Illinois State Police canceled a $7.7 million contract with Bode because it failed to identify semen on 22 percent of the rape kit samples it was charged with testing.

Edward Blake of Forensic Science Associates in California, a pioneer of DNA testing, said he is skeptical of Bode's ability to handle the retesting effort in Virginia. A longtime critic of Virginia's crime lab, Blake said the dust-up in Illinois raises serious questions about quality control at Bode.

"I wouldn't trust anything that they did -- not after seeing their work on several cases and the problems in Illinois. With Bode especially since they have a long-term contract with the state of Virginia, they are totally motivated not to see a problem," Blake said.

Calls to Bode General Manager and Vice President Maureen Loftus were not returned.

Ferrara said he's confident Bode is up to the task. "Over the course of the last 20 years, people have found occasions to criticize every private and public lab there is," he said. "That's to be expected. We've worked with Bode for a long time and have long experience with them."

Law Mandates Disinterment Of Murderer (WP)

By Tara Bahrampour

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

The remains of a man convicted of murdering an elderly Hagerstown, Md., couple will be removed from Arlington National Cemetery as part of a bill signed into law by President Bush.

Bush signed the $3.2 billion bill, the Veterans Benefits, Health Care and Information Technology Act of 2006, on Friday.

The bill seeks to improve benefits and health care for veterans and their families. It also requires the Secretary of the Army to remove the cremated ashes of Russell Wayne Wagner, who was convicted of murdering Daniel Davis, 84, and Wilda Davis, 80, in 1994.

Vernon G. Davis, son of the murdered couple, said yesterday that he was relieved to hear of the change, which he had worried would never come to pass.

"We just got an extra Christmas present, and I think the whole family's satisfied," he said. "For him to do something like that to Mom and Dad, and then you turn around and honor him like that, it was completely wrong."

"Arlington Cemetery is reserved as a place of honor for men and women who have served their nation in the armed services. It is appropriate to remove the remains of individuals, who, by their own criminal actions, have brought dishonor to themselves and the memory of their service," said Tony Frato, a White House spokesman.

Wagner died in early 2005 of a heroin overdose while serving two life sentences. An Army private who served during the Vietnam War and was honorably discharged in 1972, Wagner was eligible for parole at the time of his death, which made him eligible for an Arlington service. He was buried with honors in August 2005.

But after publicity about the case and pressure from the couple's family and Sens. Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho), Barbara A. Mikulski (D-Md.) and Ken Salazar (D-Colo.), the case was revisited.

Congress passed a law in 1997 barring people convicted of capital crimes from being buried in a national cemetery, a law designed to block the possibility of Oklahoma City bomber Timothy McVeigh, a veteran, being buried at Arlington.

But some veterans have been reluctant to support too many restrictions, worrying that too broad a law might bar too many people.

Backwoods Celebrity Faces Long Prison Term For Incest (WP)

By Blaine Harden

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

Robert Hale, a Bible-toting father of 15 who calls himself Papa Pilgrim, became an anti-government celebrity in Alaska by driving a bulldozer across a national park that encircles his land.

The Lord told him that using the bulldozer to clear 14 miles of derelict road through the park was a loving thing to do, Hale said in an interview three years ago.

"In order for me to love my children, I have to be a provider," Hale said then, explaining that he needed the bulldozer to fetch supplies for his children, whom he and his wife were home-schooling in an ultra-strict Christian way.

He said his children read only the Bible, always bathed with their clothes on and were not allowed to see one another naked.

Yesterday in a Palmer, Alaska, courtroom, Hale, 65, answered very different questions about his behavior and his family: He pleaded no contest to multiple charges that he raped one of his daughters.

The plea, which came three weeks before Hale was to face trial on 27 felony charges of rape, incest and coercion, punctuates an implausible saga that stretches from Texas to the outback of eastern Alaska. It is a story by turns picaresque, outrageous and sad.

Hale and his now-estranged wife, Kurina, who calls herself Country Rose, and their children, who all have names from the Bible, bought a 410-acre ranch inside Wrangell-St. Elias National Park, the largest national park in the United States.

Much of the money for the $450,000 purchase in 2002 came from the Alaska permanent fund dividend. It is an oil-funded annual payment that this year was worth $1,107 to each state resident. After Hale and his family moved to Alaska in 1998, the dividend provided the onetime subsistence farmers -- who also earned money performing gospel music -- with more cash than they had ever had.

The ranch, which they named Hillbilly Heaven, is an in-holding, which means it is surrounded by federal land controlled by the National Park Service. Under the 1980 law that established much of the vast national park system in Alaska, in-holders are guaranteed "reasonable and feasible" access to their property.

Hale's bulldozer romp stretched that guarantee beyond the breaking point. The Park Service cited Hale for violating federal law.

But land-rights activists, who in Alaska and across the West have complained for decades about persnickety law enforcement in and around federal parks, adopted Hale and his family as camera-ready symbols of America's frontier spirit.

They could sing, they made their own clothes, and Papa was handy with a sound bite. He accused the federal government of trying to starve his family. "It is like the Alamo," he said.

"We are going to make the Pilgrims poster children for abuse of federal power," Chuck Cushman, executive director of the American Land Rights Association, said in 2003.

With land-rights activists footing the legal bills, Hale's challenge to federal authority went all the way to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit in San Francisco. This February, a three-judge panel ruled against the family, although the court said in the fall that it might take another look at the case.

To drum up publicity for the court challenge, Hale and his handlers from the land-rights movement invited me and other reporters to spend the night at Hillbilly Heaven in the late summer of 2003.

In the course of a long evening spent with his children and his wife, who listened to Hale in worshipful silence, it seemed that he held a cultlike control over his family. None of the older children, several of whom were in their 20s, wanted or needed any life outside the family, Hale said then. He said they were all virgins.

Hale, it turned out, had had an extraordinarily odd life before bringing his family to Alaska.

He grew up affluent in Fort Worth, the son of I.B. Hale, an All-America tackle at Texas Christian University who in 1939 was the first-round draft pick of the Washington Redskins.

While in high school, Robert Hale eloped to Florida in 1958 with Kathleen Connally, the 16-year-old daughter of John B. Connally; Connally was to become governor of Texas and was wounded when President John F. Kennedy was assassinated. Shortly thereafter, she died of a shotgun blast to the face, an apparent suicide that Hale said occurred while he was with her in a hotel room.

In the 1970s, when Hale called himself "Sunstar" and lived as a hippie, he met Kurina Rose Bresler, then 16. They moved with their first two children to a subsistence farm in New Mexico on land owned by actor Jack Nicholson. They lived there for more than 20 years, tanning leather, breeding dogs and antagonizing many neighbors. It was there they became born-again Christians, Hale said.

But it was in Alaska, after the celebrated bulldozer ride and while Hale's lawsuit was still rattling through the federal court system, that family life exploded.

Hale was indicted in the fall of 2005, accused of raping and abusing an unnamed daughter, and he fled the area where he had lived with his family. After a two-week manhunt he was arrested without incident, and he has been in jail since.

Until last week, Hale had been expected to contest the charges against him. In a trial, his wife and many of his children would have testified against him.

In the end, he made a deal. Hale, a diabetic in poor health, pleaded no contest and will receive a sentence of at least 14 years in prison.

Maryland's Death Penalty (WP)

THE MARYLAND COURT of Appeals has thrown a big wrench into the state's already anemic death penalty enforcement. It ruled last week that Maryland's procedures for lethal injection were adopted without adequate legislative oversight. With that ruling, which will effectively halt executions until new procedures are adopted, the Maryland court joined what is fast becoming a national trend. Earlier this month, Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R) halted executions there after a botched lethal injection took over half an hour. A court in California blocked use of that state's execution cocktail. Nationally, there have been fewer executions this year than in any in the past decade -- and delays associated with challenges to lethal-injection protocols, which are now said to cause significant pain, constitute one of the reasons for the low figure.

For those of us who oppose capital punishment, any public debate that slows the wheels of death is a good thing. That said, this issue seems more than a little absurd. Leaving aside the technicalities of Maryland administrative law, it is a little tough to understand why states that have no scruples about killing people as punishment for their crimes might blanch at a brief period of discomfort for the condemned along the way. This is, after all, the intentional infliction of death; why should anyone expect it to be pretty? The sudden scruples around the country about the fact that taking human life may actually involve pain can only be understood as a surrogate for the real issue: whether Americans want to be taking life at all.

In some states this question is still taboo. Getting rid of the death penalty is all but unthinkable in Virginia, for example. But Maryland is different. Its death penalty has been used only five times since the Supreme Court reinstated capital punishment in 1976. It plays only the most incidental role in the state's criminal justice system -- so incidental, ironically, that its use creates wild regional and racial disparities in the administration of justice. Executions have been suspended in the past. Were the death penalty abolished in Maryland, almost nobody would miss it.

The Maryland court action is therefore an opportunity for a much broader discussion of the utility, justice, necessity and morality of capital punishment. It comes at a propitious moment. Incoming governor Martin O'Malley (D) personally opposes the death penalty. He did not appear inclined to dismiss the court ruling as a mere technicality -- which, formally speaking, is all it really is. That's good. Maryland doesn't need a big debate about how it kills people, but the time is ripe to debate whether it should stop.

FBI Says Files In Leak Cases Are 'Missing' (NYS)

By Josh Gerstein, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, December 27, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — The FBI is missing nearly a quarter of its files relating to investigations of recent leaks of classified information, according to a court filing the bureau made last week.

In response to a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit, the FBI said it identified 94 leak investigations since 2001, but that the investigative files in 22 of those cases "are missing" and cannot be located. "There is no physical slip of paper on the shelf which indicates that the file has been charged out to a particular FBI employee, so therefore there is no way of knowing where the file may actually be," an official in the bureau's records division, Peggy Bellando, wrote in a December 22 declaration.

"That's an amazing number," an academic who has studied the FBI's record-keeping procedures, Athan Theoharis of Marquette University, said in an interview yesterday. "These are very sensitive investigations. ... They could be called to account for whether they are monitoring reporters. These are records that should be handled very well."

Over the past decade, the FBI has waged an epic struggle to computerize and automate its records systems. The agency abandoned a $170 million "Virtual Case File" project last year after years of Congressional hearings and critical evaluations led to the conclusion that the system would never be implemented successfully.

One frequent critic of government database programs, Barry Steinhardt of the American Civil Liberties Union, said that record makes it understandable that a substantial proportion of the leak files would be mislaid.

"It's par for the course," Mr. Steinhardt said. He noted that the Justice Department has already put about 1 million case records into a database, called OneDOJ, that is being made widely available even though the files may contain unverified or erroneous data. "They want to distribute it to law enforcement in every city in the United States, but here the FBI can't manage its own files," the critic said.

Ms. Bellando's declaration said the 22 missing files pertain to 51 cases listed as closed and not to 43 other leak cases listed as pending.

Last month, a federal judge in San Francisco, Maxine Chesney, ordered the FBI and other agencies to respond by Friday to this reporter's requests for information on the frequency and outcome of leak probes. The requests followed a spate of high-profile federal investigations into press leaks, including a special prosecutor's inquiry into the leak of a CIA operative's identity, as well as a separate case in which two pro-Israel lobbyists and a Defense Department analyst were indicted for trafficking in classified information.

The Justice Department, the FBI, the CIA, and the Department of Defense told Judge Chesney last week that they will be unable to meet the court-imposed deadline and need as many as 120 additional days to complete work on the requests, which were filed in March.

A spokeswoman for the FBI, Catherine Milhoan, said she could not comment on the ongoing litigation, but noted that the records search is continuing and has been complicated by procedures for handling classified materials. She also said all hope for recovering the missing files is not lost. "It doesn't mean there aren't other avenues in place to locate those documents," she said.

Mr. Theoharis, a professor emeritus of history, said that in the 1960s the FBI used procedures known as "do not file" and "summary memoranda" to avoid placing files in the central records system. As a result, he said, the bureau would tell judges or members of Congress that searches turned up no records, when files actually existed in a secondary system.

"There's no reason to think they're not doing the same thing today," Mr. Theoharis said. "I don't want to sound conspiratorial but I don't think one can discount this."

Seracare Wins Court Approval to Send Bankruptcy Reorganization Plan to Creditors for Vote

WASHINGTON (AP) -- SeraCare Life Sciences Inc., which makes medical supplies from blood plasma, has won court approval to send its shareholder-backed bankruptcy plan to creditors for a vote.

Judge Louise DeCarl Adler of the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in San Diego on Thursday signed off on the biotechnology company's disclosure statement, which outlines its plan to exit Chapter 11 through a rights offering to existing shareholders.

Under bankruptcy law, a judge must approve such a statement before a company can send its plan to creditors for a vote.

A group of SeraCare shareholders, led by hedge fund Harbinger Capital Partners, has agreed to backstop a $20.2 million rights offering that would finance the company's bankruptcy exit. The group holds over 30 percent of SeraCare's common stock.

Shareholders, last in line for repayment in a Chapter 11 case, will get one share in the reorganized company for each share they own, along with the right to participate in the rights offering, which will offer shares at $4.75 each. Options and warrants will be reinstated after SeraCare emerges from bankruptcy.

Harbinger will also buy SeraCare's bank debt and allow it to use the cash collateral securing the debt without paying default interest through June 2007.

Votes on SeraCare's reorganization plan are due Jan. 31. Judge Adler scheduled a confirmation hearing on the plan for Feb. 15.

The company reached a deal with the shareholders after scrapping a management-backed plan to issue $25 million in unsecured notes ultimately convertible into common stock at a rate of $5.50 a share.

Under the terms of the proposed Chapter 11 plan, SeraCare will pay all of its debt, including settlements with the government and with shareholders stemming from securities-fraud claims, in full.

The Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department have been investigating SeraCare, which on March 15 announced it would restate its financial results for the first three quarters of 2005. SeraCare's chairman, chief executive and financial chief were fired in March, just before the company filed for bankruptcy protection.

Its stock was subsequently delisted from trading on Nasdaq. In over-the-counter trading Tuesday afternoon, the shares rose 5 cents to $6.10.

The company was formerly headquartered in Oceanside, Calif., but has since moved its operations to West Bridgewater, Mass.

Small Businesses Fight Fickle Rules (NYT)

By Ron Nixon

In 1995, Joseph N. Cooper won a multiyear contract worth up to $8 million to do public relations for the Immigration and Naturalization Service. He received the contract through a Small Business Administration program established to increase opportunities for small companies.

But not long after the work was under way, the deal was awarded instead to three multimillion-dollar companies, which were listed as disadvantaged in contract documents. After years of trying to win the contract back, Mr. Cooper filed a false-claims lawsuit against the companies, asserting that they had committed fraud by saying they were small businesses.

This year, to Mr. Cooper and his lawyer's surprise, the court ruled that although evidence showed the companies were indeed not small businesses, fraud had not been committed because the I.N.S. knew their true status when the work was awarded to the companies — J. Walter Thompson, the Bernard Hodes Group and Cass Communications.

The case was dismissed.

"We were floored," Mr. Cooper said in an interview. "The ruling essentially said that I was right, the companies were not small, but so what."

That experience points to the kind of Catch-22 world that some small-business owners face when they challenge the awarding of government contracts.

Many studies have shown that hundreds of government contracts set aside for small business are being awarded to large corporations. Federal laws provide several mechanisms that allow small-business owners who suspect that contracts have been awarded to large companies to protest.

But small-business owners say that the rules in many cases impose nearly impossible standards on them. Even if they do succeed in protesting an award, they say, and prove that federal agencies are intentionally awarding small-business contracts to big companies, there are almost no penalties. Often, the large companies get to keep the contacts.

"It's a hollow victory," said Raul Espinosa, a small-business owner in Florida who has won several protests. "You might win the size protest, but you can't claim the contract because the agency allowed delivery to take place and what's worse, the penalties for the violations aren't enforced."

Mr. Espinosa is leading a coalition of six small-business associations seeking to change the process.

Congress may be more receptive to their calls for change next year, when two longtime critics of the practice assume leadership positions for the committees overseeing small business.

Senator John F. Kerry, Democrat of Massachusetts and the incoming chairman of the Committee on Small Business and Entrepreneurship, has proposed giving the S.B.A. more time to complete size determinations and to help prevent big businesses from slipping under the radar of a bureaucratic contracting process.

The S.B.A. recently required businesses to report their size every five years. Mr. Kerry's proposal would make the reports annual.

"The protest process is supposed to keep the system honest, but what's the point of protesting a contract if nothing happens?" Senator Kerry said

Nydia M. Velázquez, Democrat of New York and the incoming chairwoman of the House Small Business Committee, said she would work to rectify the problems faced by Mr. Cooper and other small businesses by ensuring that there is an effective protest system in place. She also wants to make sure that penalties are enforced.

"The fact that large businesses are being awarded with small-business contracts, and that there is no system in place with penalties or consequences for this, is extremely concerning," Ms. Velázquez said.

If a small-business owner believes that a company has been illegally awarded a small-business contract the owner has several options in protesting the award.

The first is to file a so-called size protest with the S.B.A., asserting that the competitor is too big.

Under this process, a company has five days after being notified of a winning bidder to initiate the protest. If the agency decides that the winning company is not small, it can recommend that the contract be rescinded.

But that almost never happens, Mr. Espinosa says.

Last year, Mr. Espinosa protested an Air Force contract, offering documentation showing that the winning company was actually a subsidiary of a larger concern, and thus ineligible.

At first, the S.B.A. ruled that the company was a small business, but Mr. Espinosa appealed the decision to the agency's Office of Hearings and Appeals and an administrative law judge ruled in his favor. Despite the ruling, the winner kept the contract.

"There needs to be some reform in the size protest system," Mr. Espinosa said. "Otherwise, why should small-business owners bother and why would large companies worry about getting caught?"

The S.B.A. said it could only recommend that contracts be rescinded and could not compel other agencies to follow the recommendation.

Albert B. Krachman, a lawyer at the firm of Blank Rome in Washington, who has represented small businesses, said, "The system is basically set up in such a way that the policing is left up to the businesses themselves."

What's more, he said, "There is no incentive from the contracting officers or other government officials to see if the companies they are giving small business set-asides to are indeed small-business concerns."

Gary M. Jackson, assistant administrator for size standards at the S.B.A., agrees that the policing of the small-business contracting system is left up to competitors, but asserts that they are in a better position than contracting officers to know which is a small business and which is not.

Another remedy for small businesses is through the courts.

As Mr. Cooper did, small-business owners can file lawsuits asserting that fraud was committed in the awarding of set-aside contracts to large businesses. But legal specialists say the filing false-claims lawsuits can be a costly undertaking. The law also contains several legal hurdles that make it almost impossible to win, they say.

Mr. Cooper said that he was convinced that a lawsuit was his only hope.

At first, Mr. Cooper and his lawyer argued in the Court of Federal Claims that the I.N.S. had not operated in good faith when it stopped giving him work on the contract.

The I.N.S. said it was not satisfied with Mr. Cooper's work and the cost associated with it. But in a deposition, a contacting officer at the agency said no evidence was ever offered to him questioning the quality of Mr. Cooper's work. A government audit found that the cost was actually reasonable.

Still, the court sided with the I.N.S. and said that because the agency had given Mr. Cooper the minimum amount on the contract there was no evidence the agency had not operated in good faith. Mr. Cooper appealed the ruling, but an appeals court upheld the lower court ruling.

Mr. Cooper and his lawyer then filed a lawsuit in the Federal District Court for the District of Columbia. They argued that the two companies that had been awarded contracts to complete the work that Mr. Cooper's firm had originally been awarded had committed fraud when they said that they were disadvantaged businesses.

A lawyer for the companies, Bruce M. Ginsberg of the law firm of Davis and Gilbert in New York, denies that they ever misstated their size to the I.N.S. "These are multimillion-dollar companies," Mr. Ginsberg said. "They would not represent themselves as small businesses. We have no idea how they came to be marked that way in the I.N.S. documents."

Among the evidence offered by Mr. Cooper were contract documents in which the companies were described as disadvantaged and a Justice Department investigative report showing that the companies had verbally confirmed their disadvantaged status with an officer at the I.N.S., though both companies were two of the largest advertising firms in the country.

"We thought we had a slam-dunk," said Cyrus Phillips, a lawyer doing pro bono work for Mr. Cooper.

But when the judge ruled otherwise, he not only dismissed the case but also ordered Mr. Cooper to pay legal fees and other expenses to the companies he had sued.

Mr. Cooper said the ruling was a fatal blow to his personal and professional life. The legal bills he incurred have left him bankrupt and out of work.

"I did nothing wrong and tried to point out that the government was intentionally giving set-asides to large companies, and I'm the one who pays for it," Mr. Cooper said. "I wish I'd never done business with the federal government."

Courts Seek New Ways To Handle Mentally Ill Criminal Defendants (AP)

CLEVELAND - A program in Cuyahoga County courts, started in response to concerns mirrored in the justice system nationwide, aims to better understand and deal more efficiently with people who are mentally ill.

The county and several other communities across Ohio have established mental health courts to specifically handle such defendants. In the Cleveland-area program, some municipal and common pleas judges oversee mental health cases and try to place defendants with psychological problems into court-supervised treatment programs.

"We're not dealing with a high population of people with really good, secure home lives," Municipal Judge Kathleen Keough said. "We get people whose life has been in upheaval for years and who don't know any of their rights. No stability. Nobody really to count on."

In the past, those awaiting trial who showed signs of mental illnesses, such as depression or schizophrenia, tended to stay in jail two to three times longer than others while officials determined if they were competent to stand trial. Because those people might need close supervision and daily medications, the cost of keeping them behind bars can be as much as double that for others.

The program in Cuyahoga County sprang from an initiative started three years ago to try to better handle mentally ill defendants.

"The goal is to have a place where police can bring someone who needs evaluation or stabilization so they don't languish in jail," said Shaker Heights Municipal Judge K.J. Montgomery, who heads the initiative.

Recent studies indicate that mental disorders affect one of every four adults in the United States. Yet a recent U.S. Department of Justice study found that more than half the inmates in the nation's prisons and jails have mental health problems.

Part of that can be traced to fewer psychiatric hospitals, said Dr. Philip J. Resnick, director of forensic psychiatry at Case Western Reserve University. In 1960, more than 550,000 people were in psychiatric hospitals throughout the country, Resnick said. With the closing of many of the hospitals, that number has dropped to about 70,000.

The Bureau of Justice Assistance, part of the U.S. Justice Department, helps to administer the federal government's Mental Health Courts Program. The program funds projects that seek to improve the way courts help adults with mental disabilities or illnesses. Mental health courts generally deal with nonviolent offenders.

More than 150 of these courts exist and more are being planned, according to the bureau's Web site.

Cuyahoga County Common Pleas Judge Mary Jane Boyle, one of five Cuyahoga County judges overseeing cases with mentally ill defendants, said most crimes committed by the mentally ill happen when the person is not taking medications.

Corey Miller, a coordinator for Recovery Resources, a nonprofit group that provides mental health programs and services throughout northeast Ohio, said many of the inmates tell him they got into trouble either because they cannot afford to pay for their medications or they find it easier to cope with their illnesses by turning to drugs or alcohol.

Keough said the mental health dockets give defendants a chance to get help.

"Sometimes the best thing to happen to them," she said, "is when they get into court."

Delta's Antitrust Objections To Merger May Be Overstated (DEAL)

By Cecile Kohrs Lindell, The Deal

The Deal, December 27, 2006

Delta Airlines Inc. is using the looming specter of antitrust regulation as a key reason to fight an $8.5 billion takeover bid from US Airways Group Inc., but antitrust experts say Delta's argument is exaggerated.

The airline's Dec. 19 warning about the antitrust risks titled, "Proposed US Airways/Delta Merger Would Be Highly Anticompetitive" begins with a statement that the two airlines have "overlapping networks."

While it is true that the two nationwide carriers compete in many routes, the notion that antitrust problems make the deal a nonstarter "is just silly," according to a former government antitrust official.

The Department of Justice "is clearly going to look at this, and it's probably going to take four to five months," but Delta's warning that the review will take a year is not correct, according to the lawyer who asked that his name not be used.

In a Dec. 21 response to Delta's antitrust analysis, US Air acknowledges that some shuttle services between New York and Washington would have to be sold off, and that there are competitive problems with flights between Cincinnati and Charlotte, N.C., as well as Cincinnati and Philadelphia. Two city pair overlaps, according to US Air, is a far cry from the alarmist Delta report that identified more than 30 overlapping city pairs.

The key issue now is how US Air can proceed because Delta is in bankruptcy. Under bankruptcy rules, US Air can't launch a hostile bid for its competitor, but it can lobby creditors to put pressure on Delta.

"Delta can pursue multiple, parallel paths to emerge from bankruptcy," he said.

One path could be joining with US Air to file premerger notification forms with the government, which would initiate an in-depth official review. That review would give the parties, and the bankruptcy judge, a clear view of what divestitures would be required to get the deal done.

A group of creditors already formed the Unofficial Committee of Unsecured Claimholders of Delta Air Lines Inc., which represents some $2.25 billion of unsecured debt. That group said "it expects Delta to consider methodically, proactively and fairly strategic alternatives to its proposed standalone Chapter 11 plan to ensure that creditor recoveries are maximized in the Chapter 11 process."

If that group -- or other creditors -- "somehow, through some means, can force Delta to make the HSR filings" the murky antitrust issues would likely clear up in a few weeks, the lawyer said.

McClatchy Co. Flagship Newspaper Star Tribune Sold To Private Equity Group For $530 Million (FINDLAW/AP)

By Joshua Freed, Ap Business Writer

AP, December 27, 2006

(AP) - MINNEAPOLIS-Newspaper publisher The McClatchy Co. said on Tuesday that it will sell its flagship newspaper Star Tribune to a private equity firm for $530 million (â,¬401.8 million), a sharp drop from the $1.2 billion (â,¬910 million) it paid to acquire the newspaper just eight years ago.

McClatchy said it decided to sell the newspaper to Avista Capital Partners through a private bidding process "after a strategic reevaluation of its portfolio of holdings" following McClatchy's purchase of Knight Ridder for $4.5 billion (â,¬3.4 billion) earlier this year.

McClatchy faces a large tax bill from selling off 12 other newspapers earlier this year as part of its purchase of Knight Ridder. It said the tax benefit of selling the Star Tribune at a loss is worth $160 million (â,¬121.3 million), raising the total value of the deal to $690 million (â,¬523 million). McClatchy said it would use the money to pay down its Knight Ridder debt.

McClatchy chairman and CEO Gary Pruitt said in a written statement that the Star Tribune "is a profitable business that has generated significant returns for the company over the years. However, as we continue to analyze our business following the Knight Ridder acquisition, it became clear that selling the Star Tribune strengthens McClatchy's competitive position."

"This deal came about because of very specific conditions involving the Star Tribune and today's changing media landscape. We have no plans to sell any other newspapers," Pruitt said in an e-mail to McClatchy employees.

Avista does not own any other daily newspapers. It was founded in 2005 by seven former partners and nine former professionals from DLJ Merchant Banking Partners, the private equity affiliate of Credit Suisse Group, according to the statement announcing the sale.

"Avista is a company that believes in the future of newspapers and is strongly committed to the success of the Star Tribune," Publisher and President Keith Moyer told Star Tribune employees in an e-mail.

"I have had the opportunity to get to know Avista leadership quite well recently, and I can say this without hesitation: They are progressive, very smart, good-hearted people who believe that no other media platform can reach a local audience as effectively as newspapers and their product extensions," Moyer wrote.

Moyer said he would report to Chris Harte, a member of Avista's executive advisory board, who will also be named the newspaper's chairman.

Newspaper industry analyst John Morton found the sale "inexplicable and disappointing."

"The Minneapolis Star Tribune has a good reputation, has always had a good reputation. It is the kind of newspaper that you would have hoped a company like McClatchy would continue to own," he said.

"Clearly what is happening to McClatchy is that they are much more concerned about their overall financial performance than they are about publishing newspapers, the way I read it," Morton said.

Associated Press Writer Brian Bakst contributed to this report.

Private-Equity Group Taps Veteran Lobbyist (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, December 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A group of major private-equity firms has tapped a former videogame lobbyist to lead a trade group to promote the industry's interests here.

The Private Equity Council, set to begin operations early next year, said in a statement that Douglas Lowenstein will serve as its first president and chief executive officer. To take the post, he is stepping down as president of the Entertainment Software Association, which represents the U.S. videogame industry.

Private-equity firms typically buy controlling stakes in companies in the hopes of quickly cashing out, either through a stock offering or by selling them to competitors or other private-equity firms at a profit.

The private-equity trade group has been in the works for a year, as a vehicle to highlight the positive side of takeover deals for lawmakers, government officials and others.

In its statement, the PEC said it plans to be a "leading advocate for the domestic and international private-equity industry as well as a resource for those seeking to better understand the industry's role in the rapidly evolving global economy."

Members of the council include Apollo Management, Bain Capital Partners LLC, Blackstone Group, Carlyle Group LP, Hellman & Friedman LLC, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co., Madison Dearborn Partners LLC, Providence Equity Partners Inc., Silver Lake Partners, Texas Pacific Group and Thomas H. Lee Partners LP.

As the size of the industry has grown -- by some estimates, available capital managed by private-equity firms exceeds $700 billion -- the industry has faced resistance in Washington and in foreign capitals. Chinese and some European governments, in particular, have made it more difficult for private-equity firms to take over local companies.

Mr. Lowenstein, 55 years old, has headed the entertainment software group and its predecessor organization, the Interactive Digital Software Association, since 1994. According to National Journal, a magazine here covering lobbying and public policy and which compiles a comprehensive list on lobbyist activities every two years, Mr. Lowenstein received about $800,000 a year in salary and compensation in his current post.

Private Funds Prepare To Lobby (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

Some top private-equity funds have joined to form a lobbying organization to head off potential regulation.

The funds have become some of the most active purchasers of U.S. corporations, pooling money from private investors and companies and augmenting those sums with loads of debt. More than 28 percent of the dollar value of acquisitions announced in the United States this year involved private-equity firms, up from 3 percent five years ago, according to Dealogic.

The new organization, the Private Equity Council, is backed by such leaders in the burgeoning business of company buyouts as Blackstone Group, Carlyle Group and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts. Douglas Lowenstein, president of the Entertainment Software Association, which represents the U.S. video game industry, will head the trade association.

The move is the latest effort by the financial services industry to bolster its presence in Washington. The association that represents hedge funds, the Managed Funds Association, recently added to its staff, and the Securities Industry Association and the Bond Market Association merged this year to form what they hope will be a more influential lobby. The combined organization is the Securities Industry and Financial Markets Association, or SIFMA.

In late spring, several of the nation's largest private-equity firms started to discuss creating a lobby group. The decision was precipitated by recognition that they were becoming the target of tough criticism in the United States and in Europe; in Germany, for instance, a state governor referred to private-equity firms as "locusts."

Carlyle, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and other firms were sued last month by investors who claimed they conspired to hold down the amounts they pay for companies. A regulator in Britain is also investigating market abuse in private-equity transactions.

Private-equity firms collect large pools of funds from wealthy individuals, pension funds, college endowments and other sources and use the proceeds, along with loans, to buy all or large parts of companies. Hedge funds also amass money from similar sources but engage in usually shorter-term investments in such things as stocks and bonds.

Both are lightly regulated by the government, and that has caught the attention of lawmakers and senior officials in the executive branch, including those in the Securities and Exchange Commission. Christopher Cox, chairman of the SEC, has been pressing for more oversight of hedge funds, for example, which is now a $1 trillion industry.

The core group of firms behind the Private Equity Council are Blackstone, Carlyle, KKR and Texas Pacific Group. Initially, the association will consist of 15 to 20 firms and will be staffed by Lowenstein and a small group of senior people who will focus on commissioning research about the private-equity industry and its benefits to the economy.

Lowenstein could not be reached for comment yesterday, but in statement the council said it "will become a leading advocate for the domestic and international private equity industry as well as a resource for those seeking to better understand the industry's role in the rapidly evolving global economy."

Carlyle, Blackstone, Buyout Firms Form Lobby Group (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Brett Cole

Bloomberg, December 27, 2006

Dec. 26 (Bloomberg) -- Buyout firms including Carlyle Group and Blackstone Group LP formed the industry trade association Private Equity Council in Washington today as regulators increase their scrutiny.

Douglas Lowenstein was appointed chief executive officer, a group of buyout firms said in a statement. Lowenstein is now president of the Entertainment Software Association, which represents the U.S. video-game industry.

Private-equity firms and management have announced a record $718 billion of takeovers in 2006, Bloomberg data show. Carlyle, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and other firms were sued in November by investors who claim they conspired to hold down prices they pay when buying companies. The U.K. market regulator also is researching market abuse in private-equity transactions.

The council ``will become a leading advocate for the domestic and international private equity industry as well as a resource for those seeking to better understand the industry's role in the rapidly evolving global economy," according to the statement.

Other members of the council include Apollo Management LP, Bain Capital LLC, Hellman & Friedman, Madison Dearborn Partners LLC, Providence Equity Partners, Silver Lake Partners, Texas Pacific Group, Thomas H. Lee Partners LP and KKR.

Lowenstein is traveling today and unavailable for comment, said Daniel Shapiro, a spokesman for the Private Equity Council.

Club Deals

Shareholders filed a suit in New York on Nov. 15 claiming they were shortchanged because private-equity firms tempered bidding for leveraged buyouts such as the $33 billion takeover of hospital chain HCA Inc., the largest LBO ever.

So-called club deals, where firms team up to make offers, broke antitrust laws, said investors, who are seeking unspecified damages. Before the suit, the Justice Department said it was investigating possible antitrust behavior.

Private-equity firms have come under fire in Europe for loading up target companies with debt while recouping costs with fees and dividends.

The U.K.'s Financial Services Authority said last month it's monitoring loans that banks are extending to fund leveraged buyouts on concern excessive debt may risk the stability of the nation's financial markets. Leverage reached a 10-year high in Europe in April, when buyout firms borrowed the equivalent of six times the annual cash generated by the companies they acquired, according to Standard & Poor's.

Buyout firms use their own funds and debt secured on the companies they acquire to pay for takeovers. They typically seek to expand companies or improve their performance before selling them within five years to other investors.

Texas Pacific Tops Buy-outs With $101bn (FT)

By Peter Smith In London

Financial Times, December 27, 2006

Texas Pacific Group has beaten Blackstone and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts to become the world's most prolific buy-out group in 2006, notching up 17 deals with an aggregate value of just over $101bn.

The figures reflect an extraordinary year for private equity in which the value of announced deals has risen to a record $700bn, more than double the record set in 2005 and 20 times bigger than in 1996, according to Thomson Financial, the data provider.

The wave of private equity deal activity, accounting for nearly one-fifth of all global mergers and acquisitions, has helped underpin a huge rise in the value of stock markets globally.

TPG notched up high-profile deals across the world, including Australia's Qantas airline, Las Vegas casino giant Harrah's, and Univision, the US's largest Spanish-language broadcaster. No other buy-out group has ever done more than $100bn worth of deals in a single year, a coup for TPG in an environment where being known as the biggest buy-out group helps open doors to the financing community and company boardrooms.

Blackstone, which topped the US league table, took part in global deals worth $93bn, while KKR, number one in Europe, managed a world total of $78bn. Bain Capital took part in $85bn worth of deals.

The US also regained its crown from Europe as the world's most active private equity market, recording $403bn of announced deals, treble that of 2005.

Charlie Bott, co-head of Goldman Sachs' financial sponsors group, said the US figure had been driven up primarily by a number of very large US deals, including HCA, the hospital group, Equity Office Partners, the real estate company, and Freescale Semiconductors.

Most of the large US deals were bought off the public markets by buy-out groups working in teams.

William Maltby, head of leveraged finance and financial sponsors at Deutsche Bank, said the climate in Europe for so-called take-privates had been harsher. "It has been very tough to buy listed businesses in Europe, especially the UK," he said. "Once you start targeting companies that are perceived as national champions, the outcome for private equity bidders becomes political and random.

"We still don't quite know what the upper end of the deal range is. Getting the capital together for a €10bn [$13.1bn] deal is relatively easy, even €30bn. But making the deal happen is the tough part."

The private equity boom is expected to continue, fuelled by unprecedented liquidity in the debt markets, huge capital raisings by the buy-out funds, deal opportunities in industries in need of restructuring or consolidation, and companies ripe for takeover in less mature markets.

However, Mr Bott had mixed views on the outlook. "I don't think the market will carry on being as robust for the whole of next year as it is today.

"We could be sitting here in one year's time saying the outlook for 2008 is less strong than it was for 2007."

¦ A dozen of the largest US private equity groups, including TPG, yesterday announced that Douglas Lowenstein, a lobbyist for the video-game industry and president of the Entertainment Software Association, would lead their newly-formed trade association in Washington. The Private Equity Council aims to improve the industry's image of buy-out firms amid the dealmaking boom.

"The active investment approach taken by private equity firms . . . has had a profound and positive impact on job growth, industry competitiveness, and profitability. Millions of pension plans participants have profited from the superior returns," the group said.

Mr Lowenstein has led the charge in lobbying for a tougher stance on video-game piracy, and helped manage charges that the video-game industry had overstepped the limits of acceptable violence and sexual content in recent years.

Reliance Prepares For Hutchison Essar Bid (FT)

By Amy Yee In Delhi, Tom Mitchell In Hong Kong And Andrew Parker In London

DOJ_NMG_0109148

Reliance Communications, India's second-largest mobile operator, is in talks with at least four private equity firms about combining forces to make an offer for Hutchison Essar, a smaller rival.

Vodafone Friday confirmed it was considering the acquisition of a controlling stake in Hutchison Essar, India's fourth-biggest mobile operator.

Reliance's talks with private equity firms underlines the likelihood of a bidding war for Hutchison Essar, which has an enterprise value of about $14bn.

Shares in Hong Kong-listed Hutchison Telecommunications International, which holds 67 per cent of Hutchison Essar, rose 8 per cent on Vodafone's statement, to a record high of HK$19.08. Reliance declined to comment. However, people familiar with the company said it was in talks with Apax, Blackstone, Carlyle and KKR.

On Thursday, Vodafone's board gave the go-ahead for management to prepare an offer for Hutchison Essar. Leading Vodafone investors have reacted cautiously but positively to the prospect of a $13.5bn-plus offer for Hutchison Essar. Vodafone's shares closed down 1.2 per cent at 142p Friday. Vodafone said in a statement earlier: "The board of Vodafone continues to believe the mobile market in India has great potential and is therefore considering the acquisition of a controlling interest in Hutchison Essar. Such a transaction would be consistent with its stated strategy of seeking selective acquisition opportunities in developing markets. The process is at an early stage and may or may not lead to a transaction."

Vodafone is seeking to counter slowing revenue growth in its core European businesses by increasing its presence in emerging markets. Hutchison Telecommunications International said in a statement it had "been approached by various potentially interested parties", which it did not identify, and cautioned that a transaction was not guaranteed.

Hutchison Telecommunications International is a subsidiary of Hutchison Whampoa, the Hong Kong-based conglomerate.

Hutchison Whampoa has declined to comment. But people familiar with the group have said that an offer of $13.5bn would be regarded as low and unlikely to result in a deal.

Investors in Hutchison Whampoa have become accustomed to the conglomerate disposing of assets so as to bolster its interim and full-year results.

Hutchison Whampoa executives have denied such sales of assets are designed to offset losses from its third-generation mobile businesses, where it has invested more than $25bn. Operating losses at the company's 3G businesses reached $4.65bn in the first half of this year.

House Democrats Want To Redistribute Big Oil Money To Conservation, Renewables (AP)

By H. JOSEF HEBERT

AP, December 26, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - Democrats in the U.S. House of Representatives in the first weeks of the new Congress plan to establish a dedicated fund to promote renewable energy and conservation, using money from oil companies.

That is only one legislative hit the oil industry is expected to take next year as a Congress run by Democrats is likely to show little sympathy to the cash-rich, high-profile business.

Whether the issue is rolling back tax breaks _ some approved by Congress only 18 months ago _ pushing for more use of ethanol and other biofuels instead of gasoline, or investigations into shortfalls in royalty payments to the government, oil industry lobbyists will spend most of their time playing defense.

Details of a renewable fuels fund have yet to be worked out. Nonetheless, it is one of the initiatives the House will take up during its first 100 hours in session in January, according to aides to Nancy Pelosi, the Democratic leader. At least some of the money _ revenue gained by rolling back some tax breaks _ will go to a program to support research into making ethanol from sources other than corn.

"What we'll do is roll back the subsidies to Big Oil and use the resources to invest in a reserve for research in alternative energy," Pelosi, a California Democrat, recently told reporters.

But the oil issue likely to be first out of the legislative block in January concerns the ability of the federal government to recover royalties many lawmakers believe have been unfairly avoided by oil and gas companies drilling in deep waters of the Gulf of Mexico.

The Interior Department has been trying to get more than 50 companies to rework 1998-99 drilling leases that allow the companies to avoid paying billions of dollars in royalties because of a government mistake in writing the leases. Recently five companies agreed to a compromise to pay royalties on future production under the leases, but not from oil and gas already taken from the federal waters.

Most of the other companies argue that the leases represent a binding contract and have not even talked to Interior officials about them.

The industry intransigence has upset many in Congress, both Republicans and Democrats, who say they want to find a way to force the companies back to negotiations on the flawed leases. One approach is legislation barring companies from bidding on future leases unless they agree to renegotiate the flawed ones.

"There will be a new cop on the beat to force every big oil company that is currently lining its pockets with taxpayer dollars to come back to the negotiating table," Rep. Edward Markey, a Democrat, declared.

Pelosi calls the royalty avoidance from the 1998-99 leases the biggest oil industry subsidy issue she intends to tackle early. Congressional estimates have put the potential royalty loss at as much as $10 billion (?7.5 billion) over the life of the leases.

Rep. Henry Waxman, the incoming chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, has promised to continue pressing the Interior Department on the matter, which also has been the subject of extensive hearings under Republican leadership.

Recently Waxman and Rep. Tom Davis, a Republican and the committee's departing chairman, asked the Justice Department to review Interior's claim that royalties legally cannot be collected from past production under the leases.

House Democrats also are targeting a handful of oil industry tax breaks for repeal. Both Republican and Democratic lawmakers say there is unlikely to be an attempt to push more sweeping measures such a new tax on the oil industry's windfall profits.

Members of both parties have said they also want to make another stab at passing a federal law against oil company price gouging, an issue that will gain momentum should oil and gasoline prices again soar amid huge industry profits.

At the top of the hit list is a tax break that was aimed at promoting U.S. manufacturing but has provided a windfall for the oil industry as well. The provision reduces the corporate tax rate on profits from products made in the United States.

As for oil companies rolling in profits with $60 (?45.5)-a-barrel crude, it is "a break they didn't earn, deserve or need," says Rep. Jim McDermott, a Democrat. McDermott tried to eliminate the tax break in May but was unsuccessful. He estimates that oil companies are saving as much as $700 million (?530.6 million) in taxes a year because of it.

Democrats also are targeting other benefits for refinery investments and for expenditures for certain types of oil and gas exploration. Those measures, passed by Congress last year as part of a broad energy bill, are estimated to cost the government about $1.3 billion over 10 years.

Executives of the largest oil companies have said they do not need those tax breaks and do not oppose their repeal. Congress earlier this year already eliminated the tax incentive on exploration for the five largest companies.

The White House is not opposed to rolling back some of the tax breaks that Congress approved last year. President George W. Bush has said the industry does not need the subsidies given today's oil prices and industry profits.

2007 Energy Outlook: Costs Up (CSM)

By Ron Scherer

The Christian Science Monitor, December 27, 2006

NEW YORK

Remember this? Motorists complaining at the pump as the price of gasoline rises. Airlines bumping up airfares to cover expensive jet fuel. And delivery services tacking on surcharges, reflecting a record price for a barrel of oil.

DOJ_NMG_0109150

But it's not just a description of this past spring. It's also the forecast for next year, probably just when school lets out for the summer and motorists are starting to put more miles on the odometer.

"We could see close to $85 a barrel on crude next year," says Phil Flynn of Alaron Trading in Chicago.

If the forecast comes true, energy could be a dominant factor in the economic outlook for 2007 because, unlike this year, the potential increases would come when the economy is expected to be struggling. It would thus be the wrong time for the equivalent of a tax increase, which is how economists describe a spike in consumer energy costs. And it could catch the Federal Reserve in the middle of an energy-fueled jump in the inflation rate: Usually, the Fed tries to counter inflation by raising interest rates, but in a soft economy, it would rather cut interest rates.

"If we get a surge in energy prices next year, then the probability of a recession increases dramatically," says Dennis Jacobe, chief economist for the Gallup Organization in Washington. "It depends on how fast the rise takes place."

Yes, some energy analysts are beginning to think 2007 will be a case of déjà vu for consumers and business. In this scenario, prices start to ratchet up in the spring, peak sometime in the summer at a new record, and then fall back to lower levels later in the year.

Right now, the weather is an important factor, especially for the price of oil. Tuesday, oil prices hovered around $62 a barrel, some $18 a barrel below the high for the year, as relatively warm weather affected the Northeast. "We have had a relatively mild winter so far, some 20 percent to 30 percent above average [temperatures]," says John Felmy, chief economist at the American Petroleum Institute in Washington.

Last week, the National Weather Service said the warm weather in the Northeast will continue into the first week of January. But Mr. Felmy worries that a return to "normal" temperatures in January could prevent refiners from switching to gasoline production, because they would have to produce more home heating oil. "To get back a normal winter, it has to be colder than normal the rest of the winter," he frets.

It's not just the weather that's keeping a lid on prices. US economic growth is slowing - down to about 2 percent growth in the gross domestic product. The slower growth means crude-oil demand is slack - up only 0.2 percent on a year-to-date basis.

Sluggish demand has already forced OPEC to reduce production by as much as 600,000 barrels per day. OPEC's reduction also means the cartel has the ability to ramp up production to keep prices in check.

In addition, non-OPEC sources are expected to increase next year, as new discoveries in Russia, Brazil, and the US Gulf of Mexico come onstream. The Department of Energy estimates this could add a few hundred thousand barrels of oil a day to the world supply.

Any new supplies, however, could quickly be absorbed by China. With its economy expected to expand by another 9 to 10 percent, its oil demand is expected to increase by about 7 percent, estimates Paul Ting of Paul Ting Energy Vision in Short Hills, N.J.

China currently imports between 3 million to 3.5 million barrels of oil per day, Mr. Ting estimates. This indicates it would need an additional 200,000 barrels each day to satisfy its larger appetite.

But as Ting points out, "it's never simple when it comes to the Chinese energy landscape." For example, with a significant amount of its oil coming from the Middle East, China is placing more importance on energy security. "The lack of a strategic petroleum reserve [in China] is a big issue," says Ting. "So in the next year or so, they will start to accumulate 100 million barrels of oil, which translates into an additional 100,000 barrels of oil per day."

While China grapples with surging demand, some analysts believe geopolitical concerns about energy may once again roil the energy markets.

In April, Nigeria, a key oil provider, will hold a presidential election. In the oil-rich delta area of Nigeria, dissidents are attacking oil platforms and kidnapping workers.

"Separatists are already attacking the infrastructure, and the unrest could climax in April," says John Kilduff, an energy trader at FIMAT USA, a commodities broker.

Tuesday, in an indication of the difficulties facing business operations in Nigeria, a gasoline pipeline there exploded, killing at least 200 people.

Energy markets will also be tuned in to the situation in Iraq, says Amy Myers Jaffe, professor of energy policy at Rice University in Houston. In one possible scenario, there might be some manipulation of the price of oil because of the ongoing sectarian strife in Iraq between the Shiites and the Sunnis, she says. She cites as an example the Iran-Iraq war in the 1980s, when Saudi Arabia, a mainly Sunni Muslim state, tried to keep oil prices down to hurt Iran, which is mainly Shiite.

"The fact the Saudis have not done it yet does not mean they would not do it," she says. "They have enough spare capacity to do this again if they see political facts they don't like."

If the strife in Iraq were to spread, that could pose a major risk. Most of the oil production in the region is in areas controlled by Shiites, even in Saudi Arabia, says Professor Jaffe. "There is the possibility this could become not just a crisis in Iraq but could spread to other populations. The reality is that if you commute to work, you have to care that there is no extended civil war in the Gulf."

U.S. Wants Polar Bears Listed As Threatened (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

The Bush administration has decided to propose listing the polar bear as threatened under the Endangered Species Act, putting the U.S. government on record as saying that global warming could drive one of the world's most recognizable animals out of existence.

The administration's proposal -- which was described by an Interior Department official who spoke on the condition of anonymity -- stems from the fact that rising temperatures in the Arctic are shrinking the sea ice that polar bears need for hunting. The official insisted on anonymity because the department will submit the proposal today for publication in the Federal Register, after which it will be subject to public comment for 90 days.

Identifying polar bears as threatened with extinction could have an enormous political and practical impact. As the world's largest bear and as an object of children's affection as well as Christmastime Coca-Cola commercials, the polar bear occupies an important place in the American psyche. Because scientists have concluded that carbon dioxide from power-plant and vehicle emissions is helping drive climate change worldwide, putting polar bears on the endangered species list raises the legal question of whether the government would be required to compel U.S. industries to curb their carbon dioxide output.

"We've reviewed all the available data that leads us to believe the sea ice the polar bear depends on has been receding," said the Interior official, who added that U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service officials have concluded that polar bears could be endangered within 45 years. "Obviously, the sea ice is melting because the temperatures are warmer."

Northern latitudes are warming twice as rapidly as the rest of globe, according to a 2004 scientific assessment, and by the end of the century, annual ocean temperatures in the Arctic may rise an additional 13 degrees Fahrenheit. As a result, researchers predict that summer sea ice, which polar bears use as a platform to hunt for ringed seals, will decline 50 to 100 percent. Just this month, researchers at the National Center for Atmospheric Research outlined a worst-case scenario in which summer sea ice could disappear by 2040.

By submitting the proposal today, the Interior Department is meeting a deadline under a legal settlement with three environmental advocacy groups -- the Center for Biological Diversity, the Natural Resources Defense Council and Greenpeace -- that argue the government has failed to respond quickly enough to the polar bear's plight. The department has been examining the status of polar bears for more than two years.

NRDC senior attorney Andrew Wetzler, one of the lawyers who filed suit against the administration, welcomed the proposal for listing.

"It's such a loud recognition that global warming is real," Wetzler said. "It is rapidly threatening the polar bear and, in fact, an entire ecosystem with utter destruction."

There are 20,000 to 25,000 polar bears worldwide, 4,700 of which live in Alaska and spend part of the year in Canada and Russia. The other countries with polar bears in their Arctic regions are Denmark and Norway.

Although scientists have yet to fully assess many of the 19 separate polar bear populations, initial studies suggest that climate change has already exacted a toll on the animals.

The ice in Canada's western Hudson Bay is now breaking up 2 1/2 weeks earlier than it did 30 years ago, giving polar bears there less time to hunt and build up fat reserves that sustain them for eight months before hunting resumes. As local polar bears have become thinner, female polar bears' reproductive rates and cubs' survival rates have fallen, spurring a 21 percent population drop from 1997 to 2004.

Scientists have not charted the same rapid decline within the U.S. polar bear populations, but federal scientists have observed a number of troubling signs as the bears have resorted to open-water swimming and even cannibalism in an effort to stay alive.

Polar bears normally swim from one patch of sea ice to another to hunt for food, but they are not accustomed to going long distances. In September 2004, government scientists observed 55 polar bears swimming offshore in the Alaskan Beaufort Sea, an unprecedented spike, and four of those bears died. In a separate study that year, federal scientists identified three instances near the Beaufort Sea in which polar bears ate one another.

The Interior official said government officials studying Alaskan polar bears in the southern Beaufort Sea area have observed thinner adult bears and a lower rate of survival among cubs. Although the population has yet to dip, "unless the polar cub survival rate goes up, it would have to happen," the official said.

Still, the official added that the decision to propose polar bears as threatened with extinction "wasn't easy for us" because "there is still some significant uncertainty" about what could happen to bear populations in the future.

"This proposal is sort of like a scientific hypothesis. You put this out there and say to the world, 'Tell us, is this right or is this wrong?' " the official said, adding that Interior will hold several public hearings about its proposal. "We're projecting what we think will happen in the future, not just what's happening at this moment."

The department could take up to a year to complete its proposal, and it could abandon the listing if it unearths new scientific projections about the bears' fate. But that appears unlikely, as recent models have consistently pointed to a faster deterioration of Arctic sea ice.

Although federal officials cited rising sea temperatures once before in a threatened species proposal -- in May, when they called them a "major stressor" on Caribbean elkhorn and staghorn corals -- today's proposal will mark the first time the administration has identified climate change as the driving force behind the potential demise of a species.

Robert Correll, the scientist who chaired the international Arctic Climate Impact Assessment in 2004 and now directs the global change program at the H. John Heinz III Center for Science, Economics and the Environment, said in an interview that the proposal to place polar bears on the endangered species list is "highly justified."

Correll added that he is participating in an administration-funded study at the Center for Strategic and International Studies on how climate change could affect national security and foreign policy.

That, along with the proposal on polar bears, he said, "plays into a reality that, in my opinion, they're going to be rethinking their position" on global warming.

EXCO To Buy Two Gas Fields From Anadarko (WSJ)

By John M. Biers

The Wall Street Journal, December 27, 2006

Anadarko Petroleum Corp. agreed to sell two Louisiana natural-gas fields for $1.6 billion to EXCO Resources Inc., in its latest push to reduce debt after a pair of large acquisitions.

The sale covers Anadarko's Vernon and Ansley fields, which produce 192 million cubic feet of natural gas a day, or about 11% of the company's gas production.

The fields "have been great assets for the company," Anadarko Chief Executive Jim Hackett said. "However, the fields have reached the stage in their development cycle where it makes sense for us to monetize them, reduce leverage and focus on other attractive opportunities in our portfolio."

Anadarko, an oil and natural-gas producer based in The Woodlands, Texas, has been busy this year, purchasing Oklahoma City oil and natural-gas developer Kerr-McGee Corp. and Denver natural-gas producer Western Gas Resources for $21 billion over the summer before implementing an aggressive asset-sale program in the fall to reduce debt. The EXCO sale brings the total revenue from the asset sales to $8.1 billion. Anadarko has also agreed to sell assets in Canada and the Gulf of Mexico.

Anadarko had net debt of $26 billion at the end of the third quarter. The company's goal is to notch it down to $12 billion by the end of 2007, Anadarko Chief Financial Officer Al Walker said earlier this month.

A company spokeswoman said Anadarko is also actively marketing a variety of other onshore properties in the U.S., including the "Golden Trend" in Kansas and Oklahoma, an enhanced oil-recovery venture in western Texas, some assets in the Northern Rockies and a partial interest in its K-2 complex in the Gulf of Mexico. The company also hopes to sell some producing properties in Qatar and its Venezuela interest, the spokeswoman said.

Shares of EXCO, a Dallas specialist in onshore developments, were up $1.06, or 6.3%, at $17.90 in 4 p.m. composite trading, while Anadarko shares were up 56 cents at $42.70, both on the New York Stock Exchange.

Farmers And Conservationists Form A Rare Alliance (NYT)

By Jessica Kowal

MOUNT VERNON, Wash. — The standoff here between farmers and environmentalists was familiar in the modern West.

With salmon and wildlife dwindling in the Skagit River Delta, some environmentalists had argued since the 1980s that local farms should be turned back into wetlands. Farmers here feared that preachy outsiders would strip them of their land and heritage.

This year, though, the standoff ended — at least for three longtime farmers in this fertile valley, who began collaborating with their former enemies to preserve wildlife and their livelihoods.

The Nature Conservancy, which usually buys land to shield it from development, is renting land from the three farmers on behalf of migrating Western sandpipers, black-bellied plovers, dunlins, marbled godwits and other shorebirds.

From private and public funds, including a grant from the federal Environmental Protection Agency, the farmers, David Hedlin, Gail Thulen and Alan Mesman, will together receive up to $350,000 for three years of labor, expenses and the use of 210 acres, said Kevin Morse, the Skagit Delta project manager for the conservancy.

Each man has committed about 70 acres to this project, which is called Farming for Wildlife. A third of that land will be flooded with a few inches of fresh water in the spring, fall and winter. This will create shallow ponds to entice thousands of birds, some of them on their way to and from the Arctic, to stop and snack on tiny invertebrates and worms as they travel along the Pacific flyway.

More than a dozen shorebird species have declined primarily because of the loss of local wetlands, said Gary Slater, research director at the Ecostudies Institute here and a consultant for the Nature Conservancy.

The farmers see the Nature Conservancy's willingness to pay them as an acknowledgment that they should not be expected to sacrifice their land or their living for wildlife. This approach effectively turns shorebirds into another crop to manage, instead of grounds for a lawsuit.

"The stewardship ethic in this valley is incredibly strong, but it doesn't trump the bank," said Mr. Hedlin, 56, who, with his wife, Serena Campbell, grows farmer's market produce, vegetable seeds, pumpkins, winter wheat and pickling cucumbers on their 400-acre farm.

Mr. Hedlin's 70-acre Farming for Wildlife parcel has been under water since a heavy November rain breached a dike and flooded the field, in a preview of what environmentalists hope will happen. Edged with wild roses and blackberry bushes, this accidental lake quickly attracted wintering waterfowl like trumpeter swans, coots, and mallard, teal and wigeon ducks.

An hour north of Seattle and an hour south of Vancouver, British Columbia, this region's glorious tulip farms attract hundreds of thousands of tourists each April. Skagit farmers also produce about 80 crops of commercial significance, including seeds used to grow beets, spinach and cabbage around the world, many of the red potatoes eaten in the United States, and vegetables and dairy products sent to farmer's markets and restaurants in the Pacific Northwest.

Thousands of years of flooding on the Skagit River deposited a rich layer of topsoil in the "magic Skagit," as Mr. Hedlin calls the valley. European immigrants flocked here starting in the 1860s and built Victorian houses for their families on the board-flat green fields.

They also constructed an elaborate network of earthen dikes to capture land from the saltwater delta and prevent the rivers from flooding their farms. On this managed agricultural landscape, tens of thousand of acres of farmland were once tidal wetlands, Mr. Hedlin said.

Since the mid-1990s, residents have tried to slow development as strip malls and housing subdivisions marched northward from Seattle. Skagit County residents pay extra taxes to buy development rights from farmers, and a charitable group, Skagitonians to Preserve Farmland, warns that "Pavement is forever."

Many conservationists have also decided that farms are better than pavement, and say they are willing to balance preservation with profitable land use.

Mr. Morse lives here and even volunteered to spend two days last spring selling Mr. Hedlin's produce at a farmer's market.

"We don't know anything about farming," Mr. Morse told the farmers recently over coffee and sandwiches at the Rexville Grocery. "You guys are the stewards of the land. You tell me what to do."

For this experiment, each farmer's 70-acre parcel has been planted with a mixture of clover and grass to enrich the soil. While a third of the land will be periodically flooded for birds, a third will be fenced as pasture for dairy cows, and the rest will be mowed and otherwise left alone.

Farms here are gradually shifting toward organic production because consumers willingly pay much more for organic food. As another incentive to join Farming for Wildlife, the 210 acres will be available for organic use after three years.

Mr. Mesman will start producing organic milk with his 225 Holstein cows next spring. Mr. Thulen sees a big market for organic potatoes.

"In my time, I can see our little valley was farmed very hard," said Mr. Thulen, whose 2,000-acre farm was begun by his grandfather in 1867. "That pendulum has swung to get the ground healthy again."

In an ideal world, the Nature Conservancy would love to persuade farmers to add wetlands to their regular crop rotation. To that end, the group's scientists will analyze soil samples to assess whether shallow flooding might improve soil fertility as much as cow manure and mowed grass do.

In a similar project on the Tule Lake National Wildlife Refuge in Northern California, farmers reported better potato yields and fewer nematodes, a harmful worm, on land that had been purposefully flooded. But scientists say this may not apply in the Skagit Valley, where the soil has a higher clay content.

Whether or not they end up with more productive land, the three farmers seem pleased to try something new without financial risk.

"If 100 years from now," Mr. Hedlin said, "there are healthy viable family farms in this valley and waterfowl and wildlife and salmon in the river, then everyone wins."

Meat And The Planet (NYT)

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

When you think about the growth of human population over the last century or so, it is all too easy to imagine it merely as an increase in the number of humans. But as we multiply, so do all the things associated with us, including our livestock. At present, there are about 1.5 billion cattle and domestic buffalo and about 1.7 billion sheep and goats. With pigs and poultry, they form a critical part of our enormous biological footprint upon this planet.

Just how enormous was not really apparent until the publication of a new report, called "Livestock's Long Shadow," by the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations.

Consider these numbers. Global livestock grazing and feed production use "30 percent of the land surface of the planet." Livestock — which consume more food than they yield — also compete directly with humans for water. And the drive to expand grazing land destroys more biologically sensitive terrain, rain forests especially, than anything else.

But what is even more striking, and alarming, is that livestock are responsible for about 18 percent of the global warming effect, more than transportation's contribution. The culprits are methane — the natural result of bovine digestion — and the nitrogen emitted by manure. Deforestation of grazing land adds to the effect.

There are no easy trade-offs when it comes to global warming — for example, cutting back on cattle to make room for cars. The human passion for meat is certainly not about to end anytime soon. As "Livestock's Long Shadow" makes clear, our health and the health of the planet depend on pushing livestock production in more sustainable directions.

Clone On The Range (WP)

WHEN YOU TRY your first clonedog, you might not even notice. The Post's Rick Weiss reported Monday that the Food and Drug Administration is expected to vouch this week for the quality of meat and dairy products from cloned animals and their offspring. So far, ranchers and breeders have voluntarily kept food from such animals off of Americans' dining room tables. That will probably change soon.

A recent poll by the Pew Initiative on Food and Biotechnology indicates that a majority of Americans get queasy at the thought of clonal animal products lining supermarket shelves. But to its credit, the FDA stuck to the science -- the great bulk of which supports its reported conclusion.

In a study set to be published in January, scientists at the Agriculture Department's Meat Animal Research Center raised over 400 animals -- more than half of them offspring of clones -- in identical conditions. An independent lab scrutinized more than 14,000 characteristics of the animals' meat composition and health, and only one animal returned results considered abnormal. This mirrors the findings of other studies.

Cloning animals with superior genetics will make animal products better and less expensive. Breeders aim to grow genetic twins of animals with desirable traits -- such as leaner, tastier meat -- in order to breed them and improve herds over generations. The only difference between this technique and traditional animal husbandry is the production of a genetic copy at the outset. As more high-quality breeding stock becomes available, the value of such animals will decrease, lowering production costs. Americans who don't want to eat animal products made this way will undoubtedly have the opportunity to do so through niche producers.

Opposition to the cloning of livestock has proved powerful. The International Dairy Foods Association helped delay FDA action for years out of fear that American dairy goods would become less attractive abroad. According to the Pew poll, a large number of Americans object to animal cloning out of religious concerns, views that anti-cloning groups will no doubt exploit to distract the public from the scientific evidence. But the FDA's job, in this as in other matters, is to fairly assess the science.

Authorities Bust Multi-million Dollar Hampton Roads Cocaine Ring (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, December 27, 2006

NORFOLK, Va. -- Federal authorities say they've charged 11 people believed to be involved in a Hampton Roads drug-dealing ring that has sold a ton of cocaine worth more than $8 million over the last 13 years.

One suspect, Linwood Parker, is thought to have earned as much as $2.9 million from cocaine sales, authorities said.

Most of the suspects have been arrested over the last 10 days. An informant helped with the case by wearing a microphone as police taped Hampton Roads drug deals over the last year, authorities said.

Drug Enforcement Administration officials worked with state and local authorities on the case, which officials said is one of the largest drug cases in the last 13 years.

The informant, who has never been formally charged, was arrested in Norfolk last year during a cocaine deal. Authorities searched his house, seizing $50,000 and "significant financial records," according to an affidavit filed by the DEA and the U.S. Attorney's office.

He's told DEA officials that in 1993 he began buying cocaine from Naeron Mudie, a Jamaican native who moved to Hampton in the early 1990s to establish a drug trade, the affidavit said.

Mudie and six others have been charged in a separate indictment with related crimes.

In 2001, the informant began buying cocaine directly from a source in the Bahamas, the affidavit said.

Most recently, the informant told business associates that a large cocaine shipment was due on Dec. 17. But the shipment was actually arranged by the DEA, court records said.

Arrests Break Up Hampton Roads Cocaine Ring, DEA Says (VAPILOT)

By Tim McGlone, The Virginian-pilot

Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot, December 27, 2006

NORFOLK - Federal authorities say they have broken up a drug conspiracy ring suspected of distributing about a ton of cocaine, worth more than $8 million.

Eleven people have been charged in the alleged conspiracy, which authorities said dates back 13 years. It is one of the largest drug cases over that time, federal officials said.

"This was a significant organization working in the Tidewater area," said Randy Benavente, resident agent in charge of the local Drug Enforcement Administration. The case was investigated by the DEA's drug task force of federal, state and local authorities.

Most of the suspects were arrested over the last 10 days. One defendant, Linwood C. "Lenny" Parker, is suspected of grossing $2.1 million to $2.9 million on the sale of cocaine. He is scheduled to appear in U.S. District Court today.

Authorities say the case grew out of the cooperation of an unidentified individual who wore a microphone as authorities tape-recorded and videotaped drug deals throughout Hampton Roads over the past year.

The informant told the DEA that in 1993 he began buying crack from Naeron B. Mudie, a Jamaican native who had moved to Hampton in the early 1990s to establish a drug trade, according to a 34-page affidavit filed in court by the DEA and the U.S. Attorney's Office. Mudie and six others are charged in a separate indictment with related crimes.

The informant declined to take over Mudie's business when Mudie went to prison for a short time in 1996 but continued selling drugs throughout Hampton Roads. In 2001, he began buying cocaine directly from an unidentified source in the Bahamas, the affidavit says.

Between 2001 and 2004, the informant purchased about 770 pounds of cocaine from his Bahamas source as well as another person in Florida and distributed it in Hampton Roads, according to the court document. He paid between $20,000 and $22,000 a kilogram, or 2.2 pounds.

In fall 2005, the informant was arrested in Norfolk during a transaction involving 9 kilo s of cocaine. Authorities searched his house, seizing $50,000 and "significant financial records," the affidavit says.

The informant has not been formally charged and instead has been working with the task force.

According to the records, the informant promised the others that a large shipment of cocaine was due to arrive Dec. 17. The shipment was actually arranged by the DEA.

Benavente of the DEA declined to comment further on the case. Prosecutors in the U.S. Attorney's Office also declined to speak about the case.

The defendant Parker and two other suspects, Michael L. "Caddi" Sparrow and Isaac Ivan "Dog" Banks, are accused of selling the most cocaine - hundreds of pounds, worth millions of dollars.

Authorities are seeking to seize $8.6 million, the estimated gross proceeds of the entire ring. It is believed that most of the money has been sent to off shore banks.

Other suspects identified in court records as smaller dealers or couriers are: Julius C. Bernard, Tameka E. Branch, Thomas J. Cambell III, Dwayne Anthony Griffith, Crystal A. Hickson, Kenneth L. Williamson, Linda Watkins, and a defendant whose name was not immediately known.

Attorneys representing several defendants did not return calls seeking comment.

Mexican Drug-kingpin Suspects In Court Today (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, December 26, 2006

Two men believed to be high-ranking members of a Mexico-based smuggling ring are scheduled to appear today in federal court in San Diego to discuss future court dates and arrange for legal representation.

Francisco Javier Arellano-Felix, 37, and Manuel Arturo Villarreal Heredia, 31, were named last week in a seven-count federal grand jury indictment on racketeering, drug trafficking and money laundering charges in an operation that dominated the Mexican drug trade for more than a decade. The ring flooded the United States with hundreds of tons of cocaine, marijuana, methamphetamine and heroin.

The indictment accuses the men of maintaining control of a drug trafficking empire through kidnappings and up to 20 slayings, including beheadings, of rivals in the drug trade, law-enforcement officers and members of the press.

Both men were arrested in August by U.S. authorities while deep-sea fishing 15 miles off the coast of La Paz, Mexico, and have been in custody in San Diego ever since. The U.S. Coast Guard apprehended them aboard a boat known as the "Dock Holiday."

The new indictment replaces one handed up in 2003 that did not include the continuing criminal enterprise charges that could lead to their executions. Mexico has balked at extraditing those facing a possible death sentence.

A decision by federal prosecutors on whether to seek the death penalty will be made by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales at a later date.

The indictment describes Mr. Arellano-Felix as the gang's principal organizer and top leader since March 2000, and Mr. Villarreal as a hired assassin in command of crews that carried out enforcement operations and drug trafficking activities.

Both men pleaded not guilty during brief court appearances last week before U.S. District Judge Larry Alan Burns.

The gang, often referred to as the Tijuana Cartel, has been considered one of the most powerful and violent drug trafficking organizations in Mexico. At the height of its power, it was responsible for the transportation, importation and distribution of multi-ton quantities of cocaine, marijuana, heroin and methamphetamine into this country from Mexico -- primarily from Tijuana into San Diego and Los Angeles.

Jesus Labra Aviles, long considered the financial mastermind of the organization, was arrested in Mexico City in March 2000 by the Mexican military with the support of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's (DEA) Tijuana office, which ensured he was not released.

That was followed by the arrest of Ismael Higuera-Guerrero, a top lieutenant, two months later by the Mexican military in coordination with DEA. He had been the most overt member of the gang arrested, directing operations in Tijuana for years.

Gift Cards Just The Ticket For Organized Crime (CNS)

CanWest News Service, December 26, 2006

OTTAWA - Those gift cards that countless Boxing Day shoppers will be cashing in today are also landing under the Christmas trees of organized-crime groups, who use them as ``virtual currency'' for drug deals and money laundering, according to the RCMP.

A recent organized-crime threat assessment for Canada and the United States identified gift cards and prepaid debit cards as one of the tools in the financial-crime kit of organized crime. The assessment was compiled by the RCMP, the FBI and the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

``All these cards were built for legitimate purposes, obviously,'' said John Sullivan, acting director of the RCMP's proceeds-of-crime branch. ``But as with any new technology, as soon as criminal organizations see a gap, they exploit it.''

Sales of gift cards have exploded in recent years, making them a ubiquitous feature at retailers such as Chapters, HMV and Home Depot.

During last year's holiday season, 82 per cent of Canada's largest retailers offered such cards, up from 53 per cent in 2003, according to a recent Statistics Canada study.

Sales figures for Canada are tough to come by, but U.S. numbers suggest gift cards are a booming business. The U.S. National Retail Federation estimated Americans will spend $24.8 billion US on gift cards this holiday season.

Many retailers offer gift cards in set denominations. The deposit limit on such ``closed'' cards make them less attractive for organized-crime groups, Sullivan said.

They prefer ``open'' cards with higher deposit limits, such as those offered by credit-card companies, he said.

RCMP officers said such cards are now accepted as valid currency between crime syndicates. Instead of a suitcase of cash, operatives might show up for a drug deal with a fistful of gift cards.

``Let's just say a kilo of cocaine is sold for $30,000 on the market. Well, you come in with 15 cards loaded with $2,000, and you pay for that commodity,'' said Stephane Sirard, an intelligence analyst with the RCMP's criminal-intelligence directorate.

The cards are also useful for transferring money across the border, because they don't qualify as ``monetary instruments'' and aren't subject to reporting limits, he said. Individuals crossing the border with $10,000 or more must file a report with Canadian border authorities.

Internet-savvy crooks could also launder money by converting it into gift cards, then sell the cards online for less than the value stored on the card, Sirard said.

An informal search of Ebay.ca found more than 2,000 gift cards on sale in Canada, many at asking prices below face value.

Gift cards are an attractive option for crime groups because they can be obtained without going through the ``mainstream'' banking system, Sullivan said.

MasterCard Canada, for example, offers a gift card that can be loaded up to $2,500. A website that promotes the card said applicants require no credit check, security deposit, employment or income verification.

Applicants can apply for a card at various retail locations across Canada, such as convenience stores and payday-loan outlets. Once they complete the registration online, the card is mailed to them and they can load and reload it with cash at any of the retail locations.

MasterCard Canada didn't return a call for comment.

When poorly managed, prepaid-card programs can be a ``vehicle for money laundering and terrorist financing,'' conceded Gord Jamieson, director of risk management and security at Visa Canada.

But he said his company has taken a number of steps to prevent its cards from being used for criminal purposes. Prepaid Visa cards available to individual applicants have a deposit limit of $500 in Canada and cannot be reloaded or used at an ATM.

The company does offer a prepaid card with no deposit or reloading limit, but cardholders typically apply through their employers. Visa also tracks purchasing to ensure the card isn't used in countries known as money-laundering havens, he said.

``We've put some pretty tight controls around this so it's not an attractive option for money laundering.''

Sullivan said prepaid cards only recently appeared on the RCMP radar. He declined to comment on specific cases where gift cards have been seized, but said the Mounties' assessment is based on ``more than just anecdotal evidence.''

Gift Cards Popular With Underworld Set (CP)

Afghan Heroin's Surge Poses Danger In U.S. (LAT)

By Garrett Therolf, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 26, 2006

The world's purest form can kill more addicts, as seen in L.A. County.

Supplies of highly potent Afghan heroin in the United States are growing so fast that the pure white powder is rapidly overtaking lower-quality Mexican heroin, prompting fears of increased addiction and overdoses.

Heroin-related deaths in Los Angeles County soared from 137 in 2002 to 239 in 2005, a jump of nearly 75% in three years, a period when other factors contributing to overdose deaths remained unchanged, experts said. The jump in deaths was especially prevalent among users older than 40, who lack the resilience to recover from an overdose of unexpectedly strong heroin, according to a study by the county's Office of Health Assessment and Epidemiology.

"The rise of heroin from Afghanistan is our biggest rising threat in the fight against narcotics," said Orange County sheriff's spokesman Jim Amormino. "We are seeing more seizures and more overdoses."

According to a Drug Enforcement Administration report obtained by The Times, Afghanistan's poppy fields have become the fastest-growing source of heroin in the United States. Its share of the U.S. market doubled from 7% in 2001, the year U.S. forces overthrew the Taliban, to 14% in 2004, the latest year studied. Another DEA report, released in October, said the 14% actually could be significantly higher.

Poppy production in Afghanistan jumped significantly after the 2001 U.S. invasion destabilized an already shaky economy, leading farmers to turn to the opium market to survive.

Not only is more heroin being produced from Afghan poppies coming into the United States, it is also the purest in the world, according to the DEA's National Drug Intelligence Center.

Despite the agency's own reports, a DEA spokesman denied that more heroin was reaching the United States from Afghanistan. "We are NOT seeing a nationwide spike in Afghanistan-based heroin," Garrison K. Courtney wrote in an e-mail to The Times.

He said in an interview that the report that showed the growth of Afghanistan's U.S. market share was one of many sources the agency used to evaluate drug trends. He refused to provide a copy of DEA reports that could provide an explanation.

The agency declined to give The Times the report on the doubling of Afghan heroin into the U.S. A copy was provided by the office of U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), a member of the Senate Caucus on International Narcotics Control.

This potent heroin, which the DEA says sells for about $90 a gram in Southern California, has prompted warnings from some officials who deal with addicts that they reduce the amount of the drug they use. Many addicts seeking the most euphoric high employ a dangerous calculation to gauge how much of the drug they can consume without overdosing. An unexpectedly powerful bundle of heroin, therefore, can be deadly.

"I tell people, 'If you're using it, only use half or three-quarters of what you used to,' because of the higher potency," said Orlando Ward, director of public affairs at the Midnight Mission on Los Angeles' skid row.

Health workers in boutique rehab centers as well as health clinics for the homeless say increasing numbers of clients are addicted to more powerful heroin.

"My patients say it's more available and cheaper," said Michael H. Lowenstein, a doctor at the Waismann Method detoxification center in Beverly Hills.

Antonio Maria Costa, executive director of the U.N. Office on Drugs and Crime, warned world health authorities in October of the increase in Afghan heroin.

"This, in turn, is likely to prompt a substantial increase in the number of deaths by overdose, as addicts are not used to injecting doses containing such high concentrations of the drug," he said.

From 1980 through 1985, Afghan heroin dominated the U.S. market, with a 47% to 54% share, according to the DEA.

AFGHANISTAN'S share dwindled to 6% for much of the 1990s, as competition from Southeast Asia and Colombia grew. Meanwhile, the Taliban was cracking down as it gained territory, virtually eliminating poppy production after taking over the country.

Once the fundamentalist Islamic government was overthrown in 2001, Afghans turned once again to the poppy trade to survive in one of the poorest countries in the world.

A report released Nov. 28 by the World Bank said U.S. and European efforts to end Afghanistan's $2.3-billion opium business were failing.

The production of opium used to produce heroin reached its highest level ever in Afghanistan this year. It accounted for more than one-third of Afghanistan's gross domestic product and 90% of the world's supply of illicit opium, mainly going to Asia and Europe, according to the report.

The poppy crop now drives the economy in some regions of the embattled nation, helping to fund a Taliban resurgence.

In the United States, Afghan and Mexican poppies tied for second place among sources of heroin in 2004, according to the DEA's Heroin Signature Program. South America, led by top supplier Colombia, held 69% of the market.

That figure had dropped 19 percentage points from the 2003 level as U.S. and Colombian efforts to eradicate the trade enjoyed success and as Afghanistan's share increased, according to the DEA.

DOJ_NMG_0109161

The Department of Homeland Security also has found evidence of increasing Afghan heroin in this country. The agency reported skyrocketing numbers of seizures of heroin arriving at U.S. airports and seaports from India, not a significant hero in-producing country but a major transshipment point for Afghan drugs.

The seizure of heroin packages from India increased from zero in 2003 to 433 in 2005 — more than 80% of total mail seizures of heroin arriving in the U.S. that year.

In the meantime, although they may not recognize the product as coming from Afghanistan, addicts across the country are increasingly coming into contact with more powerful heroin.

"There is a different kind of heroin now," said Eric Wade, a 32-year-old recovering addict in Portland, Ore. "It is very, very strong, and it is cheaper than the other stuff. Not everybody has access to it, but I've seen more people overdose … on that stuff."

In Ballwin, Mo., an affluent suburb of St. Louis, two sisters were arrested in the spring, accused of selling "China white" heroin between classes at their high school.

Capt. Tom Jackson, who leads the St. Louis County Police Department's bureau of drug enforcement, said investigators thought the heroin traveled to the campus from Afghanistan with the help of Nigerian traffickers, a Chicago gang and a downtown St. Louis drug dealer.

"This China white is so pure that they can snort it or smoke it," Jackson said. "So, no needles or track marks."

Afghan Heroin Taking Over U.S. Market (UPI)

UPI, December 26, 2006

LOS ANGELES, (UPI) -- Supplies of heroin from Afghanistan are rapidly replacing lower quality Mexican heroin, and could lead to a rise in U.S. addiction and overdoses, a report says.

Los Angeles has seen a large impact, with heroin-related deaths jumping from 137 in 2002 to 239 in 2005, nearly 75 percent, the Los Angeles Times reported.

Experts said that within the three years other factors contributing to overdose deaths remained unchanged.

"The rise of heroin from Afghanistan is our biggest rising threat in the fight against narcotics," said Orange County sheriff's spokesman Jim Amormino. "We are seeing more seizures and more overdoses."

A report from the Drug Enforcement Administration said Afghanistan's poppy fields have become the fastest-growing source of heroin in the United States since 2001.

Another DEA report said that heroin from Afghanistan may take up more than 14 percent of the Unites States market.

Afghan Heroin Blamed For Surge Of Overdoses In Los Angeles (FOX)

FOX News, December 26, 2006

LOS ANGELES — High-potency heroin from Afghanistan is causing a surge in deadly drug overdoses in Los Angeles County, officials said, according to a report in the Los Angeles Times.

"The rise of heroin from Afghanistan is our biggest rising threat in the fight against narcotics," Orange County sheriff's spokesman Jim Amormino told the newspaper. "We are seeing more seizures and more overdoses."

According to the report, heroin-related deaths in the county have soared 75 percent in three years, from 137 in 2002 to 239 in 2005.

The Times cited a Drug Enforcement Administration report it obtained as saying that the poppy fields in Afghanistan have become the fastest-growing source of heroin in the U.S.

The heroin from Afghanistan is the purest in the world, according to the DEA's National Drug Intelligence Center.

According to the DEA report, Afghan heroin dominated the U.S. market from 1980 through 1985, with a 47% to 54% share, but that dropped to 6% for much of the 1990s, as the Taliban cracked down on poppy production.

Since the overthrow of the Taliban government in 2001, Afghans have returned to growing poppies.

According to the DEA report, opium production accounted for more than one-third of Afghanistan's gross domestic product and 90% of the world's supply of illicit opium, the Times reported.

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Heroin-related deaths have soared nearly 75 percent countywide in three years and experts believe potent Afghan heroin, which is overtaking lower-quality Mexican heroin, may be to blame.

Heroin-related deaths in the county rose from 137 in 2002 to 239 in 2005, a period when other factors contributing to overdose deaths remained unchanged, experts said.

A Drug Enforcement Administration report obtained by the Los Angeles Times shows Afghanistan's poppy fields have become the fastest-growing source of heroin in the United States, doubling from 7 percent in 2001 to 14 percent in 2004, the latest year studied.

Still, a DEA spokesman denied more Afghan heroin was reaching the U.S,

"We are not seeing a nationwide spike in Afghanistan-based heroin," Garrison K. Courtney wrote in an e-mail to the Times.

Remnants Of A Trial Prompt A Crusade (WP)

By Jerry Markon

Jim Savage has been living in a world of guard shacks, green security poles and Jersey barricades lining the street outside his home next to the federal courthouse in Alexandria.

They were put there for the trial of a terrorist, Sept. 11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, and they were supposed to come down when the trial was over. Seven months after it ended, they are still there.

So Savage, who calls the security measures an eyesore, mounted a one-man crusade to have them removed. He retrieved a judge's order saying the additional security was supposed to be temporary and tried to meet with the judge. He contacted the City of Alexandria, but was told the federal government has jurisdiction over his street.

Yesterday, Savage learned that his campaign will probably meet with only mixed success. The U.S. Marshals Service said plans are in the works to remove most of the barricades and to replace them with a permanent security wall near the courthouse. Officials said the wall will be more attractive than the faded concrete barricades and will fit with the neighborhood's architecture.

"This idea of some sort of a Berlin Wall really fits. It will be like Checkpoint Charlie," Savage, a former criminal investigator for the U.S. Army, said when told about the plans by a reporter. "The fact is that a court order allows these security measures to be present, and the basis for that order is over. To put up something permanent with the expectation that maybe you might have a terrorist trial in the future is really stretching things."

John Hackman, the acting U.S. marshal for Alexandria, said he understood the concerns of Savage and other residents at the Carlyle Towers condominium complex. "We are doing our best to reach a balance that will provide security as well as the aesthetic that the neighborhood requires," Hackman said. "But terrorism is not something where we say okay, we had a trial, and it goes away. We need to be constantly vigilant, and obviously the Alexandria court has high-profile cases."

Michael Kulstad, a marshal's spokesman, said the agency investigated 1,111 threats or "inappropriate communications" to members of the judiciary nationwide in fiscal 2006, including to judges, prosecutors and witnesses. Just last week, a federal prisoner was indicted in Richmond on charges of sending a letter bomb to the federal courthouse there.

The Alexandria federal courthouse has been a focus of additional security since the Justice Department made it the venue of choice for terrorism trials after Sept. 11. Officials have said they chose Alexandria for the Moussaoui case in part because Northern Virginia's jury pool is viewed as more conservative than New York's and because the Richmond-based U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit has been considered the nation's most conservative appellate court.

The Alexandria courthouse is not the first in Northern Virginia to wrestle with enhanced security. In 1998, the Fairfax County courthouse added metal detectors and barricades for the sentencing hearing of Mir Aimal Kasi, a Pakistani man who opened fire outside CIA headquarters, killing two people. When the trial ended, the security stayed.

"Nobody wants this stuff, but when security experts say it's necessary, I think it's irresponsible not to do it," said F. Bruce Bach, who as chief circuit judge at the time approved the security measures. "We're living in a different day and age today."

In 2002, Alexandria faced the prospect of two high-profile trials starting within days: Moussaoui's and that of John Walker Lindh, a Californian accused of fighting for the Taliban in Afghanistan.

On June 18, 2002, U.S. District Judge Claude M. Hilton, then the chief judge, ordered marshals to take all necessary security measures but specified they would be "during the pending of these cases." Lindh pleaded guilty soon after. Moussaoui's case dragged on, but he pleaded guilty last year.

Moussaoui's death penalty trial this year featured rooftop snipers and bomb-sniffing dogs. That level of security ended with the trial, during which Moussaoui was sentenced to life in prison.

But guard shacks and barricades still dot two streets surrounding the courthouse, with green security poles dug into the sidewalks. Traffic outside Savage's apartment building, which is across the street from the courthouse, must squeeze into small lanes around the shacks and a series of in-ground, collapsible metal security barricades. Federal officials did remove some of the barricades further up the street after the Moussaoui trial.

Savage was outraged when he pulled Hilton's 2002 order from the federal court clerk's office. Learning that U.S. District Judge James R. Spencer in Richmond is now the chief judge, Savage tried to meet with him to seek an order overturning the original one but said he was told to express his concerns in writing. Spencer did not return a telephone call seeking comment.

Although several other Carlyle Towers residents said they want the barricades taken down -- and the condo association board is seeking their removal -- Savage has been working mostly alone.

His next step? Writing the letter to Spencer, but delivering it to "his boss" -- U.S. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. Then, Savage said, "it may be time to move."

IMMIGRATION:

Lawsuits Challenge Texas Town's Immigration Law (LAT)

By Miguel Bustillo

HOUSTON, Texas — A Dallas suburb that has barred landlords from renting to illegal immigrants was sued Tuesday by two civil rights groups that allege the controversial ordinance turns property owners into immigration agents and violates federal law.

The challenge by the American Civil Liberties Union and the Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund seeks to derail a new law that would require property managers to check the immigration status of apartment renters in Farmers Branch, Texas. The ordinance, approved last month, is set to take effect Jan. 12.

Farmers Branch -- a city of 28,000 north of Dallas that is about 37 percent Hispanic -- is one of dozens of U.S. municipalities that, frustrated with federal government inaction, have adopted tough local measures to stem illegal immigration.

But the Farmers Branch ordinance is seen as a turning point for Texas, a state that largely has avoided the kind of confrontational immigration policies commonplace elsewhere.

"This is the first ordinance of its kind in Texas, the beginning of what we hope will not be a lasting trend here," said Lisa Graybill, legal director of the ACLU of Texas. "Stop and think what it would be like if every little town tried to adopt its own illegal immigration policy. It would be a nightmare."

The ACLU and MALDEF are challenging the law on several constitutional grounds. They argue that it violates the due process clause because it does not make clear which immigration documents are acceptable and which are not, the contract clause because it interferes with a business transaction between landlord and tenant without proper cause, and the equal protection clause because it only applies to some landlords. But the primary argument is that it exceeds the city's powers because only the federal government can enforce immigration laws.

While opponents of unchecked immigration have hailed Farmers Branch leaders for taking a courageous stand, many landlords have complained that they are being thrust into the volatile immigration debate -- and some local business owners have complained that Hispanics may no longer feel welcome in the city.

Some Texas leaders, meanwhile, have expressed concern that the city's stance is divisive and could harm the entire state's reputation. Last month, Farmers Branch Mayor Bob Phelps awoke one morning to find the words "Viva Mexico" spray-painted in red on the side of his house.

Tuesday's immigration lawsuit is the third filed against Farmers Branch, which also passed a resolution last month establishing English as the city's official language. Last week, a group of apartment owners asked a federal judge to declare the rental law unconstitutional. Earlier this month, a local real estate agent alleged that city leaders repeatedly discussed the ordinance behind closed doors, violating Texas' open meetings law.

The city recently created a legal defense fund to collect donations from supporters and sympathizers, and has received more than $6,000.

Phelps and Councilman Tim O'Hare, who spearheaded the immigration law, did not return phone calls Tuesday. Matthew Boyle, the assistant city attorney, said Farmers Branch would not discuss any pending litigation, but noted that city leaders had anticipated challenges to the law.

"The city was overtly threatened with litigation as far back as August, when this was being discussed. So we knew it would be no surprise that some litigation would be filed, and have been preparing for it," Boyle said.

Civil Rights Groups Sue Over Rent Law (FINDLAW/AP)

By Anabelle Garay, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 27, 2006

(AP) - DALLAS-Two civil rights groups filed a lawsuit Tuesday challenging a new law in a Dallas suburb that outlaws renting apartments to illegal immigrants, alleging the ordinance violates federal law and forces landlords to act as immigration officers.

The American Civil Liberties Union and the Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund filed the suit on behalf of residents and landlords in Farmers Branch, just north of Dallas. It is the third lawsuit brought against the city since the ordinance passed in November.

The lawsuit claims the measure, scheduled to take effect Jan. 12, is so poorly drafted that it excludes even legal immigrants from renting.

"Immigration enforcement must be left to the federal government, not each local municipality," said Lisa Graybill, legal director of the ACLU of Texas. "Otherwise Texas will end up with a patchwork system that is impractical and unenforceable."

Farmers Branch spokesman Tom Bryson said the city will not comment on pending litigation.

On Friday, the owners of three apartment complexes filed a lawsuit asking a federal court to declare the rent law unconstitutional. In another lawsuit filed earlier this month, a Farmers Branch resident alleged that the mayor repeatedly violated the state's open meetings laws to deliberate the ordinances.

The new law calls for property managers or owners to verify the immigration or citizenship status of apartment renters. The City Council also approved resolutions making English the city's official language and allowing authorities to become part of a federal program so they can enforce immigration laws.

Since 1970, Farmers Branch has changed from a small, predominantly white bedroom community with a declining population to a city of almost 28,000 people, about 37 percent of them Hispanic, according to the census.

More than 50 municipalities nationwide have considered, passed or rejected similar laws, but until now that trend hadn't been duplicated in Texas.

Our Founding Illegals (NYT)

By William Hogeland

EVERY nation is a nation of immigrants. Go back far enough and you'll find us all, millions of potential lives, tucked in the DNA of our African mother, Lucy. But the immigrant experience in the United States is justly celebrated, and perhaps no aspect of that experience is more quintessentially American than our long heritage of illegal immigration.

You wouldn't know it from the immigration debate going on all year (the bipartisan immigration bill-in-progress, announced this week, is unlikely to mention it), but America's pioneer values developed in a distinctly illegal context. In 1763, George III drew a line on a map stretching from modern-day Maine to modern-day Georgia, along the crest of the Appalachians. He declared it illegal to claim or settle land west of the line, all of which he reserved for Native Americans.

George Washington, a young colonel in the Virginia militia, instructed his land-buying agents in the many ways of getting around the law. Although Washington was not alone in acquiring forbidden tracts, few were as energetic in the illegal acquisition of western land. And Washington was a model of decorum compared to Ethan Allen, a rowdy from Connecticut who settled with his brothers in a part of the Green Mountains known as the Hampshire Grants (later known as "Vermont"). The province of New York held title to the land, but Allen asserted his own kind of claim: He threw New Yorkers out, Tony Soprano style, then offered to sell their lots to what he hoped would be a flood of fellow illegals from Connecticut.

Meanwhile, illegal pioneers began moving across the Alleghenies and into the upper Ohio Valley, violating the king's 1763 proclamation and a few more besides. (George would today be accused of softness on immigration; he kept shifting the line westward.) Immigrants from such déclassé spots as Germany and Ireland violated the laws and settled where they pleased. The upper Ohio was rife with illegal immigrants, ancestors of people who, in country clubs today, are implying a Mayflower ancestry.

Parallels to today's illegal immigration are striking. Then as now, it was potentially deadly to bring a family across the line. But once across, illegals had a good chance of avoiding arrest and settling in. Border patrols, in the forms of the British Army and provincial militias, were stretched thin. The 18th-century forest primeval, like a modern city, offered ample opportunities for getting lost. Complex economies thrived in the virgin backwoods, unfettered by legitimate property titles.

When conflicts developed between the first and second waves of illegals, some salient social ironies arose, too. By the early 1770's, George Washington had amassed vast tracts to which his titles were flatly invalid. The Revolution rectified that. With British law void, Washington emerged from the war with his titles legal by default. But he acquired another problem: low-class illegals were squatting on his newly authenticated, highly valuable property.

Washington harbored no fond feeling for breakers of laws that he too had recently flouted. "It is hard upon me," he lamented without irony, "to have property which has been fairly obtained disputed and withheld." He went to court to have the squatters evicted, complaining that they had "not taken those necessary steps pointed out by the law." He was appealing to righteousness from atop a high but wobbly horse.

Descendants of the great immigration experiences of the 19th and 20th centuries visit the Ellis Island Immigration Museum to learn of the tribulations of ancestors who risked much to become Americans. Those of us whose ancestors risked everything as illegal immigrants, and in the process helped found a nation, owe our forebears a debt of gratitude, too. Without their daring disregard of immigration laws, we might not be here today.

Immigrants' Jobs Vanish With Housing Slowdown (WP)

By Nick Miroff

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

The gold rush came in drywall, laminate flooring and granite countertops, and Amilcar Guzm?n came with it.

Guzm?n left El Salvador at age 18 in 1999 and landed in Manassas. Soon he had $15-an-hour jobs cutting lumber, driving nails and running a Bobcat loader. He got a car, got married. The Washington region was hungry for houses, houses, houses, and word of the boom reached Mexico and Central America, drawing thousands more eager, jobless men like him.

Then sometime last year, Guzm?n said, the rush began to go bust, little by little, month by month. The contractors stopped hiring. The phone stopped ringing. Washington, it seemed, had all the houses it could hold .

So Guzm?n got a plane ticket. On Jan. 20, he is taking his family back to El Salvador, with plans to open an auto repair shop with the money he has saved. "There's no work here anymore," he said, having spent the past month unemployed. "And when there's no work, it's time for Latinos to go back to the countries where they came from."

Hispanic immigration to the Washington region has always followed a seasonal pattern, as the winter puts a chill on outdoor labor and drives workers south. But with home sales and housing starts dropping after years of steady growth, many Hispanic workers -- legal and illegal -- say the good times are gone.

"The Hispanic population in Virginia has grown too much," said Guzm?n, echoing the sentiments of those who support tough immigration policies, "and that's closed off a lot of job opportunities."

Demographers who track migration patterns and embassy staff members say it's too soon to tell exactly how the housing construction decline has affected the region's Hispanic population. But stories of departing workers abound. Some workers say they're headed home; others, spurred by rumors of construction jobs, try their fortunes in the Carolinas, Georgia, New Orleans.

"It's a little better here, but not much," said Raul Amayas, 21, a Salvadoran immigrant reached by phone in Charlotte. Amayas left Manassas last month after losing his $400-a-week landscaping job. Now he's making $300 a week as a busboy at a Mexican restaurant. "It's hard here. Ugly," Amayas said.

Other immigrant workers said they're optimistic things will pick up again.

Juli?n Cabrera, 42, arrived in Woodbridge in 2004, a sharecropper from El Salvador who could no longer feed his nine children on the $5 a day he earned growing corn and beans. He has been snagging work at Route 1 and Longview Drive ever since. A year ago, he would get hired at least three times a week. But he hasn't found work once this month and is thinking of going to Texas, where his brother-in-law might be able to get him a job with a contractor. Until then, he's not sending money home to his family in El Salvador.

"I call my wife every eight days," he said, eyeing passing cars for potential employers. "I just tell her to be patient."

According to the National Association of Realtors, housing starts have fallen 23.5 percent between October 2004 and October 2006, and data released this month by the Northern Virginia Association of Realtors show home sales in that area plunged 45 percent between November 2004 and November 2006. Home sales in suburban Maryland are down 34 percent between November 2004 and November 2006, according to the Maryland Association of Realtors.

The effects of the slowdown are also rippling through Hispanic-owned businesses. "A lot of my customers have gone to Florida, to the Carolinas," said Carlos Castro, owner of the Todos Supermarket chain and chairman of the Hispanic Business Council in Prince William County.

Sales are down slightly at Castro's stores, but he said some of his suppliers are experiencing 30 to 40 percent decreases in local orders, with smaller, less-established businesses taking the biggest hit.

Tracking the departure of immigrants from the Washington area is difficult. "In terms of actual data, it's too soon to say," said Steven A. Camarota, research director of the Center for Immigration Studies, which supports limiting immigration. "If the economy turns down and we were to ratchet up enforcement, there would be a multiplier effect. But that isn't likely to happen. The most likely scenario is movement into other sectors of the economy and greater geographic dispersion."

Among illegal immigrant Hispanic men in the region, as many as one in three work in construction, Camarota said. No other U.S. industry employs more illegal immigrants, he said.

"A slowdown in the construction industry hits illegals much harder than the rest of the general population," Camarota said.

Gustavo Torres, executive director of CASA of Maryland, said he's concerned that tensions over immigration will spread and intensify if large numbers of idle construction workers are not quickly absorbed by other services and industries. "We've seen workers leaving for other states for jobs in construction or agriculture," he said.

Torres argued for the need for job training programs to help workers make the transition into other sectors, saying he feared that "confrontation will accelerate further" if the slowdown worsens.

"That's one of the dangers of importing lots of workers," said Ira Mehlmen, spokesman for the Federation for American Immigration Reform, which seeks to curb illegal immigration. "After their services are no longer required, you end up with them and with their families. "There isn't much reason for them to return home when services and other benefits are available."

But for many, and single men in particular, home has a powerful pull nonetheless. Aurelio Cruz has a wife and four children back in Puebla, Mexico, and every day that he's apart from them and doesn't find work "is a day of my life that I've wasted," he said.

The month of December has been lost to Cruz; he hasn't been hired once. "It's a bad situation," he said. He was thinking of going home this month, but weeks of standing along Route 1 in Woodbridge waiting futilely for work have postponed his plans.

"I came here to take care of my family," he said. "I can't go home with nothing. I can't go home the way I came."

Cost Of Care A Disabled Son Imperils Family's Immigration Hope (WSJ)

By Miriam Jordan

The Wall Street Journal, December 27, 2006

MARTHA'S VINEYARD, Mass. -- Zandro Souza, an immigrant from Brazil, rose in six years from being a restaurant dishwasher who barely spoke English to a successful chef in upscale restaurants here on Martha's Vineyard. Last year, after a long bureaucratic journey, Mr. Souza and his wife, Fernanda, were tantalizingly close to winning green cards that would let them remain in the U.S.

See video of Zandro Souza and other immigrants speaking2 at a Thanksgiving luncheon hosted by the Massachusetts Immigrant and Refugee Advocacy coalition. Mr. Souza begins speaking about two minutes into the clip.

But during a final interview with a U.S. immigration official in Providence, R.I., the Souzas' five-year effort to win legal status hit a wall. "I have no problem approving you and your wife," Mr. Souza says the official told him. "But I need more information about your son."

The Souzas' 11-year-old son, Igor, is blind and developmentally delayed. His condition requires countless doctor visits, frequent runs to the emergency room and more than $1,000 a month in medication. Mr. Souza says he has paid almost all of Igor's medical bills -- about $20,000 annually -- out of pocket, without insurance or help from government programs. He feared accepting aid would jeopardize his family's attempt to gain permanent U.S. residency.

According to Mr. Souza, the immigration official told him that if Mr. Souza and his wife died, their son could become a "public charge." Although the family tried to prove that Igor would be cared for if his parents passed away, the U.S. government earlier this year denied green cards to the couple and their son and placed them in deportation proceedings. This time the government cited another reason for rejection -- that they applied for and entered on tourist visas but intended to stay permanently.

"If this were only about me, I would throw in the towel" and return to Brazil, says Mr. Souza, 30 years old. "But I want the best for my son."

The Souzas' story shows how compassion can collide with hard-nosed financial considerations as the U.S. decides which immigrants should be admitted and which should be turned back. The Souzas rose through hard work and paying their own way. Yet they also hurt their case by entering the country on a false pretext, although many immigrants who later gain U.S. citizenship do the same.

Admitting productive, self-reliant people has long been a goal of U.S. immigration policy. The Immigration Act of 1891, one of the country's first efforts to regulate immigration, allowed the exclusion or deportation of any individual deemed to be a burden on the public purse, referring to "idiots, insane persons, paupers, or persons likely to become a public charge."

At Ellis Island, newcomers inspected by public-health officials and deemed unfit were returned to their country of origin. Steamship lines were often fined for having ferried them to the U.S. Later, legal immigrants from Mexico and Asia faced similar scrutiny on entering from the West.

A 1996 federal law says immigrants must be legal U.S. residents for five years before they qualify for Medicaid, which pays medical expenses for the poor. However illegal immigrants cannot be refused emergency medical care.

Between 1921 and 1930, 10,703 foreigners were deported on public-charge grounds. In more recent years, the government has cited other more basic reasons for forcing someone to leave, such as having entered the country illegally.

In 2005, 75,532 foreigners were deported for entering the U.S. without proper documents or through fraud or misrepresentation. Public charge was the official reason for only 824 out of the total 208,521 deportations that year.

Illegal-immigrant children are entitled to attend public schools, and special-needs children receive the same services as other students. In recent years, however, the escalating cost of providing education to children with special needs has fueled clashes between advocates for disabled students and those concerned that they are draining already-limited school budgets.

In Massachusetts about 16.5% of the state's student population receives special education. The cost of educating these children is increasing faster than for mainstream students and placing a financial burden on many school districts, according to school administrators.

Shawn Saucier, a spokesman for U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, says privacy laws prevent the agency from commenting on the Souzas' case. "However, if we were talking to a couple who had a son with disabilities, we would have to be satisfied that the child would not become a public charge," he says.

James R. Edwards Jr., an adjunct fellow with the Hudson Institute, a conservative Washington think tank, says the public-charge concept is rooted in this country's emphasis on self-sufficiency. "We aren't interested in taking foreign countries' criminals ... and certainly not those unable to support themselves," says Mr. Edwards, who favors restricting immigration.

As for the Souzas, he says, "My heart goes out to the family and the kid." However, he says, the U.S. already contends with "native-born Americans who face the same kind of crisis, with their children being ill and suffering disease."

Mr. Souza and his wife met as teenagers in 1990 in Cuparaque, a small Brazilian town. In 1994, Fernanda, then 17, became pregnant and the couple decided to marry.

Igor was born on March 1, 1995. At seven months, he was diagnosed with congenital toxoplasmosis, caused by a parasite that is present in uncooked meat and the fecal matter of cats. Transmission to the fetus can cause severe problems, including mental retardation, seizures, blindness, and even death. Doctors believe that Ms. Souza was infected by the cats in her grandmother's home, and Igor contracted the condition from his mother during pregnancy.

The couple soon realized that Igor's condition would require careful management and virtually around-the-clock monitoring, not to mention a panoply of special drugs. The Souzas had access to free care through Brazil's vast public health-care network, but the large hospitals and long waiting lists were difficult to navigate. To get Igor to the doctor, Fernanda rose at 4 a.m., taking two buses to line up just to make an appointment for a month later. The family couldn't afford private care on Mr. Souza's $300 a month salary working in a restaurant.

The Souzas saw an answer thousands of miles to the north, on Martha's Vineyard where Brazilian immigrants are the backbone of the local tourism industry. In 1989, Mr. Souza's father, José, found summer work in a restaurant called the Navigator, eventually settling here in 1997.

In 2000, Mr. Souza arrived in the U.S. on a six-month tourist visa. He joined his father at the restaurant, rising to become daytime chef. His hourly wage doubled to $17. At night, he worked a second job up the street at the Harbor View Hotel's Coach House, one of Martha's Vineyard's finest restaurants. Mr. Souza moved swiftly from dishwasher to sauté cook to lead line cook, overseeing all the workstations in the kitchen. "He has a passion," says Jim Moore, the restaurant's food and beverage director, who took Mr. Souza to demonstrate his cooking -- including his mini lobster rolls -- at the upscale Tribeca Grill in New York City.

In early 2001, Mr. Souza brought his wife and son to the U.S. The two took an overnight van to Rio de Janeiro, where an official at the U.S. consulate issued them tourist visas.

Igor started kindergarten at the Oak Bluffs School, where he was assigned a special assistant, as well as occupational and physical therapy. About 400 students attend Oak Bluffs School, where Igor today is in the fifth grade. About 20% of them require special-education services. However, "only three or four have the level of need requiring a one-on-one assistant" such as Igor, says James Weiss, Martha's Vineyard school superintendent. Mr. Weiss estimates it costs more than $40,000 to educate Igor annually compared with $15,000 for "regular" students.

"He certainly is a youngster who impacts our budget in a significant way," says Dr. Weiss. However, "it's both our legal and moral obligation to help students who have identified needs."

As Igor mastered English, story time and music became his favorite classes. He began singing Beatles songs. A poem he wrote in Braille with the help of his teacher reads, "My favorite song is 'Yesterday.'" A lanky, curly-haired boy, Igor recently entertained teachers and classmates in the hallway with a rendition of "Hey Jude."

Initially, the family relied on friends to drive them to Boston for appointments with Blaise Bourgeois, a neurologist at Children's Hospital Boston. The consultations, every four or five months, cost the couple about $350 each, which they paid out of pocket according to bills and receipts reviewed by The Wall Street Journal.

Igor also required a special dentist, nutritionist, endocrinologist and frequent visits to his pediatrician. Every three months or so, Igor suffered a seizure that landed the Souzas in the emergency room of the Martha's Vineyard Hospital. One of his worst episodes, Christmas Eve in 2003, lasted 45 minutes. The emergency-room visits have cost between $1,500 and $2,500 each. Mr. Souza says Igor's medical bills this year are about $16,000; in previous years they have risen as high as $20,000.

Mr. Souza says he pays for his son's doctor visits and prescription medication on the spot. Mr. Souza says he still owes $4,000 to the hospital for emergency-care visits. "If I can't pay in one lump sum, I make sure and send a check in every month -- even if it's just for $100 or $300," says Mr. Souza.

Mr. Souza, his wife and son live with Mr. Souza's parents and other relatives in a three-bedroom house owned by Mr. Souza's father. Mr. Souza earns $5,000 to $6,000 a month; about 27% of that is deducted in taxes from his weekly paycheck. He contributes $600 a month to his parents' mortgage.

In 2001, Mr. Souza sought to take advantage of a temporary immigration law, known as Section 245i, to apply for an employer-sponsored green card for himself and his family. The bill allowed immigrants to adjust their status from within the U.S., even if they had overstayed their visas or entered the country illegally. Employers regarded the program as an opportunity to legalize their work force, while critics said it was tantamount to amnesty.

Alan Counsell, then manager of the Navigator restaurant, had previously agreed to sponsor Mr. Souza's father and mother. He agreed to sponsor the Souza family as well. "It was a small repayment" for their dedication, he says. "Anything I asked of them they gave me."

Mr. Counsell followed the requirement to place advertisements in the newspaper, to show that qualified chefs -- like Mr. Souza -- weren't readily available on the Vineyard. Mr. Souza paid for the ads -- and over the next few years paid almost $10,000 in fees to lawyers and the U.S. government.

In July 2003, the Souzas received notification that their employment authorization was being processed. Mr. Souza was thriving professionally, earning a reputation as a fine seafood cook and collecting employee awards. He acquired hundreds of cookbooks, which he says helped him improve his English. His favorite chef is the well-known New York restaurateur Mario Batali, whose picture on the cover of a 2002 edition of Gourmet Magazine Mr. Souza pinned to a wall.

Mr. Souza's son, who shares a bedroom with his parents, refuses to go to sleep before his father arrives home from work each night. On Mondays, Mr. Souza's only day off, the father picks up his son from school and treats him to pizza. On Sundays, the family dresses up for evening services at the local Brazilian evangelical church, where Igor sways and chants spiritual songs.

In 2004, the Souza family was fingerprinted and issued Social Security numbers and work permits, "I felt like the gates to freedom were opening," recalls Mr. Souza. "The only thing missing was the interview." The family was summoned to Providence for an 8 a.m. interview on May 13, 2005, the final step in the process.

Mr. Souza was nervous but hopeful. He and his wife took an oath to tell the truth, he recalls. They began answering questions from the adjudicator. Among them was the question of why the family had come to the U.S. Mr. and Mrs. Souza told the official that they had come here to make a better life.

As Igor squirmed in his chair and babbled in Portuguese, the immigration adjudicator turned to Mr. Souza and asked whether he relied on the U.S. government for the child's care. Mr. Souza answered without hesitation: "No."

Mr. Souza recalls the adjudicator then asking: "So you pay for his schooling?"

Mr. Souza answered hastily -- failing to explain that while his son attended public school, he paid for Igor's health care himself.

Then the immigration official voiced concern that the son would become a public charge if his parents passed away, Mr. Souza recalls. The Souzas left the room clutching a form letter with Igor's name filled in at the top. In the space next to 5, "PLEASE SUBMIT THE FOLLOWING," the official had written: "I-864 from your father Zandro Souza showing evidence you will not become a public charge." They had 12 weeks to supply the documentation.

"I can't even remember driving home," says Mr. Souza.

According to U.S. immigration policy, an applicant can overcome a public-charge inadmissibility issue by providing sufficient evidence that he or she is unlikely to become a public charge. This evidence can be a posted as a bond, an "affidavit of support" from friends or family, personal funds, or an offer of employment.

The Souzas set out to prove that, in the event of a tragedy, Igor would be cared for by their family, not the government. Mr. Souza sent evidence that his father's house on Martha's Vineyard -- bought for $265,000 several years earlier and now worth about $500,000 -- could be put in a trust in Igor's name if his parents died. It could then be sold, if necessary, to cover his health expenses. Some immigration attorneys question why the government requested an affidavit of support in the Souzas' case, because the family was being sponsored by an employer who already serves as a financial guarantor.

But this soon became a moot point. In January 2006, immigration authorities denied green cards to each member of the Souza family and ordered them to appear in court for deportation proceedings. The government was no longer raising the "public charge" issue. Rather, the government notice stated that Mr. Souza, his wife and Igor had come to the U.S. on six-month tourist visas in violation of U.S. law because their actual intention was to stay in the U.S. for good.

"I felt an empty feeling, like everything had been in vain," recalls Mr. Souza.

Mr. Saucier, the spokesman for immigration, says: "We don't look for one reason and deny the case. We issue it for all reasons applicable to the application."

While they wait for their deportation hearing in February, Mr. Souza continues to pay for Igor's health care. Early this month, the family paid $643.98 for two antiseizure drugs, according to receipts reviewed by the Journal.

Mr. Souza says that if his family receives their green cards, he will continue to pay for his son's medical costs. As new legal residents, the Souzas won't qualify for Medicaid for five years under current immigration law. And Mr. Souza's current income level already puts the family well above the poverty limit for Medicaid.

That's why Mr. Souza says he wants to cook for a larger restaurant or one owned by a chain. Those restaurants, he notes, offer health insurance.

TAX:

Tax Haven Wants Its Welcome Mat Back (WSJ)

By Robert Guy Matthews

The Wall Street Journal, December 27, 2006

For decades, the U.S. Virgin Islands was a friendly place for business owners looking to skirt U.S. taxes. Too friendly, Congress declared back in 2004, changing the relevant statute. Since then, the Treasury Department and Internal Revenue Service have been cracking down.

Now, elected officials and business leaders in the U.S. territory are complaining that the federal government has gone too far and the tax crackdown is threatening the local economy and government revenue. They are lobbying Congress to ease up.

"While these changes were aimed at preventing tax abuse by persons who neither lived nor worked in the Virgin Islands, the changes went too far, forcing many legitimate businesses to close their doors," Charles Turnbull, governor of the Virgin Islands (population about 109,000), told a Senate committee this year.

The controversy is a reminder that what looks like an odious tax dodge to the Treasury and IRS can look like a well-justified tax break to individuals and communities that benefit from it. The tension comes as the Treasury is under pressure to collect more of the taxes that are legally owed. The IRS estimates about 17% of all taxes owed -- about $290 billion every year -- go unpaid.

Forty miles east of Puerto Rico in the Caribbean, the U.S. Virgin Islands -- not to be confused with the British Virgin Islands -- include the islands of St. Croix, St. John and St. Thomas, and about 50 small islets and cays. They were named in 1493 by Christopher Columbus in reference to the legendary beauty of St. Ursula of Cologne and her 11,000 virgins. The U.S. bought them from the Danes for $25 million of gold in 1917 to improve military positioning during World War I.

Per capita income is just $14,500, less than that in Mississippi, the poorest state. The hilly islands have little room to grow food; many goods have to be flown or shipped in. About 80% of the territory's 43,000 jobs are tied to tourism.

In 1986, as part of a sweeping overhaul of U.S. tax laws, Congress opened the door to tax breaks to spur economic development in the territory. One of the biggest allowed the Virgin Islands to offer a deal to Americans who moved there to set up a business. Companies and individuals would pay the same taxes they paid in the U.S. -- minus 90%. By law, Virgin Islanders pay U.S. tax rates, but the money goes to the local government, not Washington.

To qualify, companies had to invest at least $100,000; hire at least 10 people, 80% from the Virgin Islands; and contribute $50,000 or more to local charities. The rules have since been eased in some cases.

In later years, as Washington began to crack down on tax abuse of all sorts, the Virgin Islands came under scrutiny. "Something had to be done," said Benedetta Kissel, deputy international tax counsel at the Treasury Department. "We were getting reports that people were living and working in the U.S. but claiming 90% discounts on their tax returns."

In June 2004, the IRS warned companies in what is known as the Economic Development Commission program to avoid manipulating residency and income rules to qualify for the tax break. The Treasury and IRS also began implementing new regulations that significantly lengthened the time a person seeking the tax break had to live in the Virgin Islands. The old rule required a resident to be on the Islands for 122 days a year on average, over three years, to qualify. The new ones required a resident to spend at least 183 days, or roughly six months, every year.

The Treasury and IRS began enforcing the new regulation in earnest in early 2005, and -- to the consternation of some on the Islands -- the IRS asserted that it had authority to go back as far as it wanted without regard to the statute of limitations. IRS spokesman Terry Lemons wouldn't estimate how many audits are in the works, saying only that the Virgin Islands is facing increased scrutiny. "Basically, we have tried to figure out who was a bona fide resident who could claim these tax incentives," says Treasury's Ms. Kissel.

In the Virgin Islands, this is seen by some as overkill. "I don't think that there is any question that there were bad guys, but we here on the island are feeling the effects from the IRS," said Theodore Skolkus, a partner at Clearwater Consulting LLC. Four years ago, Mr. Skolkus, a tax attorney, set up a Virgin Islands consulting firm after moving from Arkansas to take advantage of the tax breaks. Because of new rules, he says, he has laid off two employees because one of his partners decided to leave the firm, taking away the extra business income to support existing staff.

Business owners say residency rules are a hardship because they have to leave the islands, often for long stretches to drum up clients.

In 2005, the Virgin Islands government spent at least $1.38 million lobbying the federal government on tax-related issues, according to Opensecrets.org. Included is a $140,000 fee to hire former Texas Republican Rep. Richard K. Armey. Mr. Armey, now with the law firm of DLA Piper, didn't return messages.

The number of financial firms that make the Virgin Islands their corporate home has fallen to less than 60 from 100 two years ago. One of the biggest to pull up stakes is a subsidiary of Chicago-based Driehaus Capital Management -- a retirement-planning outfit -- which expects to be gone by the end of the year. A Driehaus spokesman declined to give the reason for the company's departure.

Applications to sign up for the 90% tax breaks have fallen to zero, said Frank Schulterbrandt, chief executive officer of the Virgin Islands Economic Development Authority, which runs the program. He said the program created 3,000 high-paying jobs and generated about $114 million of tax revenue to the islands. The crackdown has chilled economic growth and scared away future investment, even though the agency has jettisoned those who were improperly claiming the tax break. "We have been blindsided and we didn't have time to negotiate," he said.

Firms that remain in the program are asking for permission to employ fewer locals than previously required.

Gov. Turnbull and Donna M. Christensen, a Democrat who is the territory's nonvoting delegate in Congress, insist they aren't looking to make the Virgin Islands a tax haven. But they argue that the U.S. government should balance cracking down on tax cheats with helping the islands to become more self-sufficient and its economy more diversified.

To buttress their argument, the territorial government hired PricewaterhouseCoopers to assess the effect of the tax breaks. That report said the islands could lose $80 million, or more than a tenth of the $633 million of corporate and individual tax receipts, if the economic-development program's tax incentives end.

Tax Breaks For Skyboxes (WSJ)

By Daniel Golden

The Wall Street Journal, December 27, 2006

This week, college football bowl games dominate television sports programming. But, off screen, little-known tax breaks are spurring the latest scrimmage over commercialism in college athletics. Some academics and legislators, contending that college football's multibillion-dollar building boom detracts from schools' educational mission, are targeting tax laws that treat payments for luxury seating and naming rights as charitable gifts.

Two congressional committees have looked into the tax breaks in recent months, seeking information from the National Collegiate Athletic Association and hearing testimony from critics. The tax benefits have also figured in a controversy at the University of Michigan over a proposed $226 million stadium renovation.

The tax perquisites, "could be the Achilles' heel of stadium expansions, a way to put the brakes on," says former University of Michigan President James Duderstadt.

Over the past decade, many football powerhouses have upgraded their stadiums, and the spending spree shows little sign of abating. Michigan plans to build 83 luxury suites at its stadium, known as "The Big House." The University of Texas recently embarked on a $175 million stadium reconstruction, adding 47 luxury suites. Partly as a result of debt payments on capital outlays, colleges' athletic spending is increasing more than three times as fast as their overall spending, according to the NCAA.

Universities typically finance these renovations by issuing tax-exempt bonds. They then make payments on the debt by leasing the new luxury suites and other preferred seating to individuals or corporations. Suites -- usually featuring 16 seats, catered food, televisions and high-speed Internet access -- are priced at $50,000 to $90,000 a year.

A selling point to alumni and other supporters is that they can deduct most of the lease fee from their taxable income. Under a 1988 federal law, taxpayers may deduct 80% of payment for the right to purchase seating at a collegiate sports event -- though not a professional one -- as a charitable contribution. Direct payments for game tickets, food, parking and other goods aren't deductible as charitable contributions but may be written off as a business expense if used to entertain clients.

Some colleges also pay debt by selling stadium naming rights to corporations, which can deduct the payment as a donation or business expense. The University of Maryland this year sold naming rights to its football field for $20 million over 25 years to Chevy Chase Bank to help fund a $50 million renovation that also adds 60 luxury suites. Under a 1997 federal law, colleges don't pay taxes on revenue from naming rights, which are considered part of their nonprofit mission rather than unrelated business income.

College athletic directors and boosters say they need the tax breaks to raise revenue to modernize stadiums and pay for less popular sports and academic tutoring for athletes. "I don't see a thing in the world wrong with" the 80% deduction, says oil executive W.A. "Tex" Moncrief Jr., who leases a luxury suite at the University of Texas stadium. "That money is used to further many educational activities."

Warren Hood, associate athletic director at the University of Illinois, said the 80% deduction is cited in its marketing brochures and has been helpful in pitching luxury suites. Illinois, which lost 10 of 12 football games this season, began construction last month on a $116 million stadium renovation financed largely by borrowing. Mr. Hood said the university has commitments from supporters to lease 45 of 48 new luxury suites priced from $45,000 to $59,000 a year.

Critics say these payments should not be deductible as charity because they purchase a valuable asset -- either premium seating or, in the case of naming rights, advertising. The 80% deduction is "ridiculous," says Smith College economist Andrew Zimbalist, author of a book on college sports. "I don't think intercollegiate sports support the educational mission. It's a separate activity."

A tax deduction for luxury boxes "isn't my style," says Rebecca McGowan, one of the University of Michigan's eight regents. She initially opposed the Michigan renovation out of concern that skyboxes "were going to be enormously expensive, for the benefit of relatively few people." But she switched sides after receiving assurances that more athletic revenue would be devoted to academic programs.

Mr. Duderstadt, the former Michigan president, told the Senate Finance Committee at a hearing this month that the "perverse treatment" of "mandatory fees" for luxury-skybox leases and season-ticket licenses as charitable contributions is "fueling an arms race in college sports, driving universities to debt-finance massive stadium expansion projects, exploit young student athletes, and tolerate multimillion-dollar coaches' salaries."

Iowa Sen. Charles Grassley, the outgoing Senate Finance chairman who will become ranking minority member in the next Congress, said through a spokeswoman that he'd "like to know how tax deductions for boosters who lease luxury boxes at college football stadiums help poor kids afford college." The incoming chairman, Montana's Sen. Max Baucus, expects to focus on whether federal tax incentives "are helping to provide educational access to students," and may look at tax breaks for athletic facilities in that context, a senior aide said.

According to a staffer, Sen. Grassley is considering taking up the investigation initiated by retiring House Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas into whether sponsorships and huge television deals for sports are consistent with colleges' tax-exempt status. In October, Rep. Thomas wrote to NCAA president Myles Brand, observing that major-college football and men's basketball "more closely resemble professional sports."

The California representative, who copied Sen. Grassley on the letter, asked Mr. Brand how much money athletic departments receive from corporate sponsorships and donations, including gifts made for the right to buy tickets. Mr. Brand responded in November that sponsorships generate $275 million in annual athletic revenues, and that donations to major-college athletic departments in 2004-05 were $845 million.

"Educational institutions ... have received favored status in every income tax act passed by Congress," Mr. Brand wrote.

Such consideration surfaces in the history of the 80% luxury-suite deduction. In 1986, the Internal Revenue Service ruled that gifts required to obtain a "substantial benefit," such as season tickets, are not deductible. Nevertheless, a tax-reform act passed that same year allowed full deductions for contributions for the right to buy seating at the University of Texas and Louisiana State University. The provision was pushed by the late Texas representative J.J. Pickle, a University of Texas alumnus and influential member of the House Ways and Means Committee, and the late Louisiana Sen. Russell Long, an LSU graduate and longtime member of the Senate Finance Committee.

In 1988, Congress extended the deduction to all universities but reduced it to 80%. "That was one of those blatant compromises," says Bruce Hopkins, a Kansas City, Mo., attorney specializing in nonprofit law. "They just plucked the 80% figure out of the proverbial air."

Even with the 80% deduction, some universities haven't raised as much money from premium seating as anticipated. The University of Colorado has leased nearly all of its 40 luxury suites but only 38% of 1,850 club seats, which cost between $1,500 and $2,200 a year, athletic director Mike Bohn says. Revenue from suites and club seats falls just short of the $3.2 million needed to pay down debt, he said, instead of the $5.7 million that leasing all of the seats would generate.

Opponents of Michigan's renovation doubt the university will find enough customers for its luxury suites, where alcohol will be banned. "Why pay a whole bunch of money, drive up to Ann Arbor, sit behind a glass wall and not be able to get a beer," says Laurence Deitch, one of two regents on the university's eight-member board who voted against the plan last month. "I think I'd stay home."

But Michigan administrators say at least 50 people have expressed unsolicited interest in leasing suites. "Would we do worse without the tax deduction?" asks Tim Slottow, the university's executive vice president. "I don't know. I wouldn't want to find out."

The Payroll Tax Trap (WSJ)

When these columns warned last month against a tax increase next year to "save" Social Security, White House officials said we were hooting at phantoms. Well, the more we listen to senior Republicans, the more worried we get.

Asked about a tax increase last week, President Bush refused to rule it out the way he had after the 2004 election. Instead, he said that, while he'd prefer not to raise taxes, in negotiating with Democrats he wants everyone's "ideas on the table." His spokesman, Tony Snow, was just as noncommittal on taxes, saying that "I'm not ruling it up and I'm not ruling it down." More than one GOP Senator has told us privately he's open to the idea. And no less a political student than Bill Thomas, the soon-to-retire Chairman of House Ways and Means, recently told a public forum that "I wish I were a bit more comfortable in listening to some of the noises that are currently being made" by his GOP colleagues. Uh, oh.

The issue is the price Mr. Bush is willing to pay to attract Democrats into a Social Security deal he could claim as a legacy. The President deserves credit for trying to reform Social Security while it is still in temporary surplus. But Democrats refuse to talk about personal retirement accounts for younger workers, and the White House is already signaling surrender on that proposal. The big question left is whether having everything "on the table" means conceding to Democratic demands for higher taxes today in return for future benefit cuts.

What liberals dearly want is to raise the payroll tax cap. Under current law, Americans pay a 12.4% Social Security tax on all wages up to $94,200 in 2006, and the cap rises each year with inflation. (There is also an uncapped 2.9% Medicare payroll tax on top of that.) So why not lift the cap a little more, say the taxers, perhaps to $150,000 if the trade-off is benefit cuts that will prevent even larger tax increases in the future?

One answer is that Social Security was always meant to be run like a pension program where the taxes paid by workers are linked to the benefits they get back during retirement. Eliminating or substantially raising the cap would convert Social Security into an overt income redistribution program. If that is the direction Congress wants to go, we should all then end the pretense that Social Security is some kind of "universal" insurance program and call it welfare for poor seniors.

Such a payroll tax hike would also eviscerate Mr. Bush's most impressive domestic achievement: the pro-growth tax cuts. If the tax cap were eliminated entirely, the President would be signing into law one of the largest tax hikes in U.S. history, or more than $1.3 trillion in new taxes over the first 10 years alone. About seven million families with an income of less than $150,000 a year would be hit with a tax increase of up to $6,000 a year.

This would also be a major tax hike on small-business employers, who pay half of the payroll levy (workers pay the other half themselves). As Mr. Bush's first chief economic adviser, Lawrence Lindsey, puts it: "The President would thus be not just raising taxes on entrepreneurs to well above the levels that prevailed in the Clinton administration, but to a rate higher than Carter." Some "legacy."

But wouldn't this all be worth it if we could take those future, unfunded liabilities off the books? Only if you think a tax increase now is worth a promise to cut benefits later. No one serious thinks those benefits will be paid anyway, so why make young current workers pay twice for the sins of their fathers?

Such a tax hike-benefit cut compromise would only exacerbate the generational inequity of Social Security. The paramount scandal of Social Security is not its insolvency but rather its abysmally low rate of return for new workers. Even if the payroll tax were left alone and all promised benefits were eventually paid out to young workers, these workers would get a tiny real annual rate of return of 1% to 1.5% on average, according to a Cato Institute analysis. Even a risk-free government bond pays 3% to 4%.

Taking personal accounts off the table eliminates the only option that will provide a better rate of return for future generations. As the nearby chart shows, personal accounts earning market returns would provide roughly twice as high an annual benefit to low income workers upon retirement, three times as high a benefit for middle income workers, and four times more to those with an income in today's dollars of $94,200 a year. Mr. Bush was right to link future cuts in benefits for wealthier earners to personal accounts.

As for the politics, Republicans might take note that AARP, the liberal senior lobby, is already calling a tax increase essential to a "balanced plan" for Social Security. And in a perverse way they're right: Such a plan would raise taxes on moderate-income Republican voters in return for cutting the benefits on those same Republicans. No wonder Democrats like the idea.

A tax increase of any kind with GOP fingerprints would remove the one big political brand advantage that Republicans still have over Democrats. It would make it far easier for Hillary Rodham Clinton to propose another tax increase in 2008 because GOP credibility in fighting the idea would be nil -- just as it was in 1992 after Mr. Bush's father raised taxes as part of his "deficit reduction" deal with George Mitchell. If Republicans now let themselves get sucked into a payroll tax increase, they'll deserve the same fate.

Mississippi: Judicial Nominee Withdraws (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

Michael Wallace, a Jackson lawyer, sent a letter to President Bush asking that his name be withdrawn from nomination to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit. Though Mr. Wallace wrote that he believed most senators would consent to his nomination, he said the incoming Judiciary Committee chairman, Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, “made it clear two weeks ago that he intends to permit vacancies to be filled only with 'consensus nominees.' " Mr. Wallace said remarks Mr. Leahy inserted into the record at his confirmation hearing "establish that he does not regard me as such a nominee."

Lawyer Asks Bush To Revoke His Nomination To The Bench (WP/AP)

JACKSON, Miss., Dec. 26 -- A Mississippi lawyer asked President Bush to withdraw his nomination to an appellate court, saying that he does not believe that the senior Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee considers him a consensus nominee.

The lawyer, Michael B. Wallace, 54, of Jackson, said Tuesday that he made the request in a letter sent to the White House last week.

Wallace wrote that he thinks a majority of the Senate would consent to his nomination. But he said incoming Judiciary Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) "made it clear two weeks ago that he intends to permit vacancies to be filled only with 'consensus nominees' " and that Leahy has indicated that he doesn't consider Wallace to be such a nominee.

In February, Bush nominated Wallace, a former aide to Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), to fill the seat on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 5th Circuit vacated more than a year ago by Judge Charles Pickering Sr., also a Mississippian. The New Orleans-based 5th Circuit hears cases from Mississippi, Louisiana and Texas.

In November, Wallace's name was among six judicial nominations that Bush resubmitted to the Senate.

Wallace drew opposition from Democrats, civil rights groups and the American Bar Association, which for the first time in almost a quarter-century unanimously rated a judicial nominee "unqualified."

Wallace said various special interests and their supporters on the committee had made up their minds before he was allowed to testify or respond to criticism.

Lott said in a statement that he was disappointed that "petty partisanship" would keep Wallace off the court.

AIDS Program Loses Track Of Funds, Results (WT/AP)

By Rita Beamish

The Washington Times, December 27, 2006

Even Bush administration officials acknowledge it was a lot to expect all at once: rush billions of dollars of help into AIDS-stricken nations, demand quick results from U.S. contractors, and then expect those contractors to produce tidy progress reports.

In the end, it was too much.

Government auditors found that accurate record keeping and monitoring often took a back seat in President Bush's three-year-old, $15 billion plan to fight HIV/AIDS in African and other poor countries.

The Bush administration says the situation has improved greatly because it has imposed tighter, standardized reporting systems on groups that receive U.S. money to ensure the accuracy of their reported results.

Lapses in verification, confusion over how to measure results and errors in counting people served by anti-AIDS programs were significant enough that at least one member of Congress wants lawmakers to investigate.

"While the global AIDS pandemic is an urgent humanitarian crisis that demands a rapid response, we cannot sacrifice results and accountability for speed," said Rep. Barbara Lee, California Democrat.

Rep. Henry A. Waxman, California Democrat and incoming chairman of the Government Reform Committee, agreed that Congress should probe accountability questions raised by government auditors.

Ambassador Mark Dybul, the administration's global AIDS coordinator, said there is a growing "culture of accountability" in the nations receiving U.S. help, and he is confident the overall numbers reported for the program are now accurate.

Early problems were expected as the administration demanded quick results from its contractors, Mr. Dybul said.

"You could've waited for three years to get all these systems in place, and an awful lot of people would have died," he said. "Our approach was get the services out, start moving the programs.

Auditors nonetheless plan to recommend improved reporting methods to ensure "reasonable assurance that what they say was done was actually carried out," said Joe Farinella, the assistant inspector general for the U.S. Agency for International Development, which conducted the audits.

Investigators focused on groups caring for infected people and AIDS orphans, and working to prevent spread of the disease.

They found that in Guyana, the AIDS program reported inflated numbers to Congress in its annual report. The government claimed 5,200 AIDS orphans received care in that country, but auditors documented fewer than 300, many of them not even affected by AIDS.

The opposite occurred in South Africa, where some provincial governments refused to disclose information on AIDS tests and counseling, causing "severe underreporting" of how many benefited from U.S.-backed services, auditors said. Officials said that problem was now resolved.

After reporting that millions of people were reached by mass media promoting sexual abstinence and use of condoms, the administration now has dropped that measurement completely, on grounds that it is impossible to know how many people hear radio messages.

Development analysts say that some of the new religious and community organizations doing the AIDS work were ill-equipped for the reporting demands accompanying U.S. grants.

"This whole push for new partners is a double-edged sword. You have to build their capacity to manage U.S. government money and particularly meet the reporting guidelines," said Patty Mechael, former program director for the charity CARE.

One of the largest contractors, Family Health International (FHI), experienced 83 percent inaccurate or unverified tallies from its subcontractors in impoverished Guyana.

FHI has since strengthened training for its local partners, "making sure the people clearly understand what they're measuring," Senior Vice President Sheila Mitchell said.

Some groups that didn't measure up have been dropped, and others who complained about reporting demands have warmed to the new systems, Mr. Dybul said.

He said the updates the administration released on World AIDS Day on Dec. 1 are accurate: 822,000 people receiving lifesaving drugs, and 4.5 million receiving care.

Crackdown On 'Earmarks' Still Leaves Room For Some (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

WASHINGTON — Billions of taxpayer dollars will continue to flow next year to thousands of projects sought by lawmakers, despite Democratic leaders' vow to place a moratorium on so-called congressional earmarks when they take control of Congress next week.

An earmark is a provision added to a spending bill for an item or program that wasn't requested by the agency getting the money or authorized by previous legislation.

Projects authorized in prior years and not yet completed will be largely unaffected by the moratorium unless federal agencies choose to stop funding them, officials say. In addition, more than 2,600 projects won passage in a 2007 defense appropriations bill before the moratorium was announced.

Even new projects could win funding if lawmakers persuade agencies to continue paying for them. "You have literally thousands of earmark lobbyists here in Washington," says Rep. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz., a leading critic of earmarks. "The pressure's going to be intense."

Democratic leaders announced this month that they would not include congressional earmarks in the final spending bill for the 2007 fiscal year, which runs through Sept. 30. "We will place a moratorium on all earmarks until a reformed process is put in place," said Sen. Robert Byrd of West Virginia and Rep. David Obey of Wisconsin, who will head the appropriations committees next year.

There were 13,012 earmarks in the 2006 budget totaling $67.1 billion, according to the Congressional Research Service.

No one is sure how existing projects should be treated. Until that's clear, some agencies say they will continue to fund thousands of projects carried over from 2006. "These agencies know who butters their bread," says Steve Ellis of Taxpayers for Common Sense.

Most of the government has operated under temporary budget authority since the fiscal year began Oct. 1, because the outgoing, Republican-controlled Congress passed only two spending bills, for defense and homeland security.

Among the earmarked projects that are still being funded:

•About 300 Department of Agriculture projects that cost about $150 million. These include the study of certain fungi in Wyndmoor, Penn., and Arctic germplasm in Palmer, Alaska. "Under the guidelines given to us, we are not to cut out anything," says Joseph Garbarino, the Agricultural Research Service budget director.

•Army Corps of Engineers projects, such as those for water and wastewater treatment. There were about 2,000 projects in the 2006 budget, including about 50 inserted by members of Congress without administration support. "We can't willy-nilly go stopping and starting things," says Gary Loew of the corps' civil works branch.

In addition, more than 6,000 projects authorized by the five-year, $286 billion transportation bill are financed mostly by the Highway Trust Fund's gas tax revenue. They are not likely to be held up by the Democrats' action.

The White House is considering giving agencies guidelines to follow on earmarks for 2007. "The administration wants to see reforms that provide greater transparency and accountability to the process, and which result in a reduction in number and amount of earmarks," deputy White House budget director Stephen McMillin says.

Ban On Pet Projects Won't Stop Trading (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, December 27, 2006

Democrats may have declared a one-year moratorium on pet projects treasured by members of Congress, but the move will hardly stop horse trading in Washington or moves by lawmakers to try to steer taxpayer money back home.

Nor will it touch billions of dollars in already budgeted Pentagon earmarks, which go to everything from research into better body armor for overseas troops to finding bone marrow matches to treat leukemia patients.

The temporary ban on earmarks — footnotes in spending bills that lawmakers use to deliver federal bacon to their states — has been greeted with applause by budget hawks and is seen as a savvy political move. But many in the rank and file are not happy.

"I've had my share of calls and they weren't to wish me a Merry Christmas," said incoming Appropriations Committee Chairman David Obey, D-Wis.

Earmarks have exploded in number and cost under GOP control of Congress and Congress got a black eye when former Rep. Randy Cunningham, R-Calif., admitted taking $2.4 million in bribes in exchange for earmarking projects to defense contractors. The Bush administration and budget hawks have protested in vain.

Obey and his Senate counterpart Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., have promised to eliminate lawmakers' pet projects as they fashion a catchall spending bill to close out about $463 billion in unfinished budget business — dumped on them by outgoing Republicans.

Byrd and Obey have announced a plan to fund most domestic agency accounts at 2006 levels, with some increases to avoid layoffs of federal employees and for politically sensitive programs such as veterans' medical treatment.

Some of the money to pay for such add-ons will come from accounts used by lawmakers to send earmarks back to their districts and states. But Congress is unlikely to drain all the money from such accounts — which run the gamut from agricultural research, flood control and grants to local police and fire departments, among many others.

That means projects will go ahead in many instances, but it will be up to Bush administration officials, spread throughout dozens of federal agencies, to determine who gets the money. Instead of looking to bills passed by Congress — or rosters of projects listed in accompanying reports — agency chiefs will have enormous discretion to award projects.

In response, lawmakers are likely to pick up the phone and write letters as they lobby agency officials to go ahead with their earmarks.

"We're going to continue to make the strongest case we can to whomever we need to fund projects we believe have a broad, positive impact on the district and are supported by the communities in which they exist," said Betsy Hawkings, chief of staff to Rep. Christopher Shays, R-Conn.

"Even if things aren't always earmarked in report language or in a bill, sometimes there's conversations that occur between members ... and agencies," said Christin Baker, spokeswoman for the White House budget office.

Some Democrats are worried that Bush officials will use their power to help their GOP friends.

"Republican members are going to get their projects and Democratic members will not," said a Democratic staff aide responsible for writing one of nine unfinished appropriations bills. The aide is not authorized to speak with reporters and declined to be quoted by name.

But GOP officials awarding earmarks also need to be careful or run the risk of retribution from powerful Democrats writing agency budgets later next year.

"As Senator Byrd likes to say, everybody has to come back to the watering hole," said Byrd's spokesman, Tom Gavin. "And the Appropriations Committee is the watering hole."

In going forward, Bush officials are likely to fund projects included in its February budget or approved in other bills such as the defense authorization measure.

That would mean construction of federal courthouses and other federal buildings is likely to go forward, as is new housing and other construction on military bases. But earmarks for projects such as grants for after-school programs and local hospitals are more likely to get shelved.

Democratic leaders vow to reform the earmark process by requiring the names of lawmakers be listed along with their projects. And they promise to scale back the number and cost of lawmakers' pet projects.

Some lawmakers are worried that in reducing the number of earmarks, a disproportionate share would go to powerful members of the Appropriations committees and to senior lawmakers, with far fewer given to the rank and file. A chief reason for the massive growth in earmarks is that GOP leaders spread them around to everyone who asked for them.

"People bemoan the 'explosion' of earmarks but what we did was we democratized it," said Rep. James Walsh, R-N.Y., a subcommittee chairman — or "cardinal"_ on the Appropriations Committee. "We took what was the purview of a few so-called cardinals ... and we gave members all across the country the opportunity to give us their priorities."

With Promises Of A Better-Run Congress, Democrats Take On Political Risks (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

WASHINGTON, Dec. 23 — Republican rule on Capitol Hill drew to an exhausted end just before dawn on Dec. 9 after lawmakers dispatched a pile of bills that few had read and even fewer had helped write. Democrats say the era of such chaotic and secretive legislating came to a close as well.

After chafing for years under what they saw as flagrant Republican abuse of Congressional power and procedures, the incoming majority has promised to restore House and Senate practices to those more closely resembling the textbook version of how a bill becomes law: daylight debate, serious amendments and minority party participation.

Beyond the parliamentary issues, Democrats assuming control on Jan. 4 said they also wanted to revive collegiality and civility in an institution that has been poisoned by partisanship in recent years. In a gesture duly noted by Republicans, the incoming speaker of the House, Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, offered Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, who is remaining in Congress, the use of prime office space in the Capitol out of respect for his position.

Mrs. Pelosi has consulted with the new Republican leader, Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, in developing initiatives for the year, including a task force to explore independent enforcement of ethics rules. That was in sharp contrast to two years ago, when Republicans — who only grudgingly consulted Democrats — pushed through a set of diluted ethics rules that they were later forced to rescind. Democrats also supported a severance package for senior Republican aides, but the spending was blocked in the last hours of Congress by conservative Republicans.

A statement of principles by House Democrats calls for regular consultation between the Democratic and Republican leaders on the schedule and operations of the House and declares that the heads of House committees should do the same.

“We are going to give people an honest and contemplative body they can be proud of once more,” said Representative Louise Slaughter, Democrat of New York and the incoming chairwoman of the Rules Committee.

Veteran Democrats said they did not sense that their colleagues wanted to retaliate against Republicans for perceived slights over the last decade. "We know we won in part because they got so nasty and unlikable," said Representative Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts.

Mr. Frank and Representative Edward J. Markey, a fellow Massachusetts Democrat, pointed to another difference between incoming Democrats and the Republicans who took control in 1995 and saw their mission as one of purging Democrats and hobbling government.

"Democrats want government to work," said Mr. Markey, who under the Republican majority was often frozen out despite his senior position on the Energy and Commerce Committee. "I have not had a conversation where Democrats sit around talking about who they want to get back at."

Yet pledges to engage Republicans legislatively carry risks. If Democrats do not follow through or revert to practices they have spent recent years condemning, they are certain to come under attack from watchdog groups and Republicans. Republicans are already accusing Democrats of backsliding by not guaranteeing them hearings and amendments on legislation to be considered in an initial 100-hour legislative program that Democrats view as a showcase for their new majority.

But Republicans are hoping Democrats stick to their guns and allow the minority a stronger voice on legislation. The opposition leadership said it would take the opportunity to put forward initiatives that could be potentially troublesome for newly elected Democrats in Republican-leaning districts who within months will have to defend their hard-won seats.

"There are going to be days when we will offer alternatives in ways that are going to be very appealing to Democrats in districts the president carried just two years ago," said Representative Roy Blunt of Missouri, who will be the second-ranking House Republican in the 110th Congress.

Republicans see the ability to force tough votes — which they avoided in the majority by stifling Democratic alternatives — as having two potential benefits: It can put vulnerable Democrats on record with positions that might not be popular at home, or it can fracture the untested Democratic majority. Mr. Blunt noted that even senior Democrats who served in Congress when Democrats held control had no experience dealing with a relatively thin, 16-seat majority that will not allow many lawmakers to avoid tough votes.

Democratic leaders said that in the spirit of a new beginning, they have every intention of allowing Republicans the kind of legislative opportunities that Republicans regularly denied Democrats. "Democracy is a risk," said Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the incoming majority leader. "And democracy is about alternatives."

But Mr. Hoyer and other Democrats also said that they were not naïve. If Republicans take the Democratic offer and try to advance politically charged amendments, Democrats will tighten the reins.

"We may well reject amendments which are designed solely for the purposes of creating a 30-second ad," Mr. Hoyer said. "We are not going to be foolish or stupid."

Democrats have not guaranteed Republicans an equal say, and the party's pledge to the minority states only that legislation should "generally" come to a vote under rules that allow "open, full and fair debate."

But to Congress watchers who grew increasingly outraged over Republican conduct of the House during the rule of Mr. Hastert and the majority leader Tom DeLay, the Democrats are definitely heading in the right direction.

"The House has been so egregiously run for a number of years that it was seen as contributing both directly and indirectly to the election results," said Thomas Mann, a Congressional scholar at the Brookings Institution. "There really is a strong political incentive to try to do business differently."

Democrats said explicitly that they would abandon some of the most disputed Republican practices. They point in particular to the vote on Medicare prescription drug legislation in 2003, when Republicans refused to shut off a House vote for three hours so they could twist arms and push the measure through just before sunrise. Democrats stipulate that votes should be completed within 15 minutes and not held open simply to manipulate the outcome.

Democrats are developing a proposal to guarantee that lawmakers have at least 24 hours to examine legislation. They have also called for "an end to the two-day work week" and the beginning of a "predictable, professional, family-friendly schedule that allows the legislative process to proceed in a manner that ensures timely and deliberative dispensation of the work of Congress."

In the House and Senate, the leadership is vowing to conduct full and open conference committees that reconcile differing legislation passed by the two chambers and produce a final bill. In recent years, those sessions have all but disappeared, with senior Republicans hashing out final versions behind closed doors, occasionally adding provisions passed by neither the House nor the Senate. Some of the major legislation approved in the final hours of the past Congress was written in private by just a few lawmakers and aides and rushed to the floor.

Democrats said the Republican majority typically refused to tell them even where the supposedly bicameral, bipartisan conference sessions were being held.

"We are going to have conferences with the House," said Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the incoming majority leader, "real conferences, public conferences, where public issues will be debated and voted upon."

Republicans said that Democrats exaggerated the degree to which they were excluded from legislative operations and that the Republican majority was less oppressive than House Democrats had been in the latter part of their 40-year majority before losing power in 1994. And they said that Democrats did not want to work with them but were more interested in scoring political points.

Democrats disputed those accusations. But even if there is some truth in them, they said, their years in the minority have made them newly sensitive to the need for a more democratic democracy.

"They really had disenfranchised about half of the American citizens," Ms. Slaughter said, referring to her Republican colleagues. "I felt my country was going down the drain. We are going to have a much more open process."

Drug Plan Companies Failed To Tell Of Changes (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 26 — Some prescription drug plans did not inform Medicare beneficiaries of impending changes in their costs and benefits, as they were required to do, Bush administration officials and Congressional aides said Tuesday.

This could be a serious omission in a program where beneficiaries need accurate information to choose among dozens of competing private plans.

Administration officials have told Congress that they may give these beneficiaries a six-week extension of the open-enrollment period, which ends Sunday. Beneficiaries could use the extra time to compare the options that will be available to them in 2007.

Drug benefits are administered by private insurers under contract to Medicare. Premiums, co-payments and the list of covered drugs vary by plan. In general, people who are enrolled in a drug plan and take no action by Sunday will remain in that plan throughout next year.

Even when a Medicare drug plan keeps the same name, its costs and benefits may change substantially on Jan. 1. Medicare officials repeatedly told insurers that they must notify beneficiaries of such changes by Oct. 31 of this year. But some insurers did not send out the "annual notice of change" documents, which can be 30 or 40 pages long.

The administration informed Congress of the problem last week. Administration officials said they would consider imposing penalties on companies that did not provide the necessary information to beneficiaries.

"There could be penalties for plans that did not send out the annual notice of change on time," said Jeff Nelligan, a spokesman for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services.

Mr. Nelligan said he understood that UnitedHealth Group, one of the largest Medicare drug plans, did not send the required notices to some of its beneficiaries in October. He said he did not know how many other plans failed to meet their obligations or how many people were affected.

Tom Koutsoumpas, senior vice president of Ovations, the UnitedHealth unit that serves the Medicare market, confirmed that the company had failed to send timely notices to some people enrolled in its prescription drug plans. He said he believed that Medicare would give those beneficiaries more time to choose a plan.

Peter L. Ashkenaz, a spokesman for UnitedHealth, said that perhaps 200,000 of its beneficiaries had not received the required notices by the Oct. 31 deadline. Even though people have until Dec. 31 to sign up for a plan, the Bush administration urged them to do so by Dec. 8, to avoid problems at the pharmacy.

Mr. Ashkenaz cited two reasons for the delay. UnitedHealth held back some notices because they included erroneous information that had to be corrected, he said. In addition, he said, a company printing the notices "had a fire that delayed production."

In every state but Alaska and Hawaii, more than 50 drug plans are available. Many have increased or reduced their premiums for 2007. Many have added coverage of generic drugs and reduced coverage of brand-name drugs. Some insurers have adopted new techniques to control the use of certain drugs. They can, for example, require doctors to get prior approval for prescriptions and can limit the number of pills given to a patient each month.

Insurers report other problems in the final days of the open-enrollment period. They say they have not received guidance from the government on exactly how to compute the late fees for people who did not join a Medicare drug plan when they were first eligible. The surcharge — an extra 1 percent for each month without drug coverage — adds up quickly.

The surcharge, known as a late enrollment penalty, depends on the number of months that a person went without drug coverage. Many insurers have asked the government whether they should calculate the penalty, based on the number of "uncovered months" reported by a beneficiary, or whether the government will compute the penalty.

In addition, Medicare and Social Security are still trying to straighten out problems in the withholding of prescription drug premiums from Social Security checks. Medicare mistakenly sent premium refunds to tens of thousands of people, and it failed to make the proper deductions for others.

Many insurers said they had experienced long delays in getting Medicare to correct the records on which their payments were based. These records show, for example, the date of a person's enrollment and changes in state of residence.

Most of the changes are supposed to be handled by a government contractor, IntegriGuard Enterprises, a national Medicare fraud-detection company. Teresa Houser, a spokeswoman for the company, said she could not immediately explain the delays. Federal officials noted a large backlog of requests.

Inside The Beltway (WT)

Bush levitates

Arkansas motivator

If we were to ask readers to name a musically inclined Southern Baptist politician who grew up in the town of Hope, Ark., who became governor of his state and later chairman of the National Governors Association (NGA), you'd probably answer Bill Clinton.

And you'd be correct.

But did you know that Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee also hails from Hope, is a talented musician (bass guitar), a Baptist churchgoer, and even chaired the NGA? And for more than a year, as was the case with Mr. Clinton, he's been mentioned as a likely contender for the White House.

Next month, just in time for a 2008 candidacy, Mr. Huckabee's newest book, "From Home to Higher Ground," will arrive in bookstores. Our early copy explains how Americans can build a better country through simple lifestyle and attitude changes.

Earlier this year, Mr. Huckabee authored a different sort of motivational book, "Stop Digging Your Grave with a Knife and Fork." The book was an instant best-seller, showing readers how self-discipline, diet and exercise can lead to a happier, healthier lifestyle.

In 2003, the governor was warned by his doctors that he'd be dead within a decade if he didn't lose weight. He immediately began exercising and controlling his diet, and soon lost more than 110 pounds.

Rosie rules

Partly because Washington is world headquarters for the legal profession -- and partly because he delivers the best Christmas gifts to reporters -- Inside the Beltway is pleased once again to present Washington malpractice lawyer Jack H. Olender's (his firm is located at 888 17th Street NW, should you ever find a wrong toe amputated) "Top Ten Legal Predictions for 2007."

We should point out that Mr. Olender's annual predictions have a 90 percent success rate to date. So, without further ado:

1. Old Lawyers Never Die, They Just Lose Their Jobs: Large law firms are terminating lawyers at a defined age -- 65, 68, 70, pick a number. Mandatory retirement is fairly new at law firms, as lawyers with "experience" were once considered a firm's backbone.

2. $200,000 Signing Bonuses Aren't Just for Athletes: The current signing bonus for former Supreme Court clerks joining major law firms is $200,000.

3. More Long-distance Medical Malpractice: Given Americans save as much as 80 percent on surgery in foreign countries, look for more long-distance medical-malpractice claims.

4. More Malpractice by Gynecologists Performing Cosmetic Surgery: Doctors in many specialties are being invited to take crash courses to learn (or so they think) procedures from another specialty.

5. Animal Law Grows: With a nation of animal lovers, it's no surprise that the number of animal-law practitioners continues to climb.

6. Lawyers Behaving Themselves: State bars and courts have toughened discipline, making lawyers toe the line.

7. Outsource All The Lawyers? Not quite, but lawyers and law firms are outsourcing a lot of their clerical, accounting and, yes, legal work to lawyers and firms in far-away places, such as India.

8. "Deal or No Deal" Contingent Fees: The days when "silk-stocking lawyers" at "white shoe" law firms looked down their collective noses at personal injury and malpractice lawyers who handle cases on a contingent-fee basis are long gone.

9. Bloggers Beware: An $11 million Florida jury award for a woman who claimed she was defamed on an Internet message board sends this message to all bloggers: Watch what you say on the Internet, or risk a damage lawsuit for libel and slander.

10. Employers and Pornography: Civil liability for money damages will become a factor in getting employers to monitor computer use to prevent the transmission of porn, for which employers can be held responsible.

I hereby resolve ...

A reminder that Inside the Beltway is once again collecting New Year's resolutions, inviting readers to tell politicians -- indeed, members of the Democrat-controlled 110th Congress -- what they'd like them to accomplish in the coming year.

Frist Isn't Resting, On His Laurels Or Otherwise (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

Those who think formerly important people in Washington just vegetate once they leave town might note how outgoing Senate Majority Leader Bill "Dr. Video" Frist (R-Tenn.) keeps engaged as he heads out of town.

We got an e-mail just before Christmas, one he apparently sent to all his political action committee contributors, that was just chock-full of fascinating activities.

"We just today got back to Nashville," he writes in the Dec. 22 note, "and are tonight decorating the tree that we bought on the way home from the airport. Karyn and I enjoyed sharing our very last holiday season in our home in Washington over the last week, buying our 'Washington tree' and decorating it and the house extra early this year so we'd have plenty of time to enjoy it with friends as we said our goodbyes. 12 years of memories in that house!!"

But retirees shouldn't reminisce, and Frist won't. "Over the next couple of weeks, Karyn and I and the boys will be on the go; traveling and visiting with family and friends," he writes. For example, he said, he was heading to South Texas with two of his sons and some friends for a father-son hunt.

"Karyn, the boys and I will then spend the 23rd with Karyn's Mother and sister Trisha and their extended family (45 McLaughlins at their biannual McLaughlin family Christmas) in Austin. And then back to Nashville for Christmas Day to join the Frist clan," he writes. "We're rehabbing the home I grew up in, but it's not ready so we are living in the backyard in a garage apartment (now beautifully decorated by Karyn!)."

The key is to keep moving. "Another hunt with the family on the 26th to replicate the traditional southern hunt (at night) that we did exactly four years ago on the night that I became majority leader."

A hint of nostalgia there, but Frist quickly recovers. "I'll spend early January talking with and listening to folk around the country on the new focus for my leadership committee Volunteer PAC (VOLPAC) and promise to send along information before the end of the month."

Okay. Maybe all that doesn't excite you. But at the end of his message, Frist promises real news. "February I'm off on my annual medical mission trip delivering care, doing surgery, and treating AIDS patients in Kenya and Sudan and am so excited that Karyn will join me this year."

So stay active and keep moving. There's always a future presidential run to think about.President Kerrey Makes the Rounds

Speaking of presidential runs, let's remember there are other presidencies out there that offer some of the same trappings as the job in the White House. The New School announced last week that university President Bob Kerrey, another former senator whose presidential campaign quickly evaporated, is headed to India next week, stopping in three major cities "to meet top leaders in government, finance, culture, and education."

Kerrey "will participate in a town hall meeting" in Mumbai, and hold "three press conferences." Not Air Force One, but . . .HR to the Staff: Eat Something

Lots of government and private workforces were allowed to split early last Friday. But the National Science Foundation demanded that workers have lunch before heading out.

An e-mail from Paul Bealafeld in human resources explained how this works.

Bealafeld's e-mail said he was "following up on the director's . . . early dismissal message with the administrative timekeeping rules and procedures."

"Employees and teleworkers may discontinue work 3 hours prior to the end of their normal tour of duty and select administrative leave for the final 3 hours," he said. But "attaching the dismissal to the lunch break and leaving earlier than 3 hours prior to the end of the tour of duty is not authorized [so] the earliest time that employees could leave would be 12:30 p.m. if they signed in at 7 a.m."

Remember, "employees and teleworkers who discontinue work before the 3-hour dismissal are not entitled to any administrative leave and will be charged personal leave from the point of their departure until the end of their scheduled tour of duty for today."

So don't go off on an empty stomach.A White House Leak?

President Bush's pre-Christmas visit to Walter Reed Army Medical Center caused some unexpected problems, judging from an e-mail alert we received. There were the usual traffic rerouting and parking restrictions, from 8 p.m. on Dec. 21 until 2 p.m. the next day.

The e-mail lists 12 such changes likely to frustrate drivers and includes an apology:

Traffic will be blocked temporarily around the campus and re-routed if necessary. Sorry for the incontinence during this mission.

We're sorry, too.

An Early Test For Lawmakers (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0109184

Thanks to the 2001 tax cut law, over the next four years the federal government will forgo some $30 billion so America's wealthiest taxpayers can claim bigger write-offs for expenses like dependents and mortgage interest. One-third of those tax cuts kicked in this year, with the rest scheduled to take effect in 2008 and 2010. By then, most of the advantage will go to the top 0.3 percent of Americans — those making more than $1 million a year — who have until now been required to limit the amounts they are allowed to claim for things like the spousal exemption or the mortgage costs on a vacation home.

Over roughly the same period, the government is looking at a $14 billion shortfall in its share of financing for a crucial federal-state program that provides health insurance to poor children, the so-called Schip, or State Children's Health Insurance Program. Without full financing, 1.5 million children will be cut from the program or underserved.

Depriving children of adequate health care while giving the rich tax benefits that were intended for average Americans is flat-out wrong. The new Democratically controlled Congress must move quickly to prevent that. When it convenes in the new year, Congress should pass a law to freeze the tax write-offs at 2007 levels. That will not cause anyone's taxes to rise. But it would free up the money that is needed for children's health insurance.

It would also be an early sign that the new Congress is more in touch with current economic reality than its Republican-led predecessor. When the bolstered write-offs were enacted in 2001 the nation was still flush with the Clinton-era budget surpluses. And while we never supported the notion that tax cuts for the rich were an appropriate way to use the surplus, those championing the cuts could at least make the argument (quickly proved wrong) that the nation could afford it.

Since then, the budget surpluses have disappeared, the nation has gone to war, government services have been cut deeply and the percentage of uninsured children has started to rise again, after declining in every year since 1998. The children urgently need to win this one, and only the new Congress can help them.

Festive Mood Sustains Stock Indexes Despite Retail Worries In Light Trading (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, December 27, 2006

Stocks entered what investors sometimes call the year-end silly season, putting in widespread gains on thin trading activity as investors ignored disappointing retail-sales reports.

Some analysts credited a sharp decline in oil prices, the biggest in more than a month. Others said the few influential investors at work in the year's waning days were simply betting that the rally that began in July would last through year's end.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average ended its three-session slump and rebounded 64.41 points, or 0.52%, to 12407.63.

It is up 15.8% this year, less than 70 points from the record 12471.32 hit one week ago.

The day's big news was a series of disappointing holiday-shopping reports from sources including MasterCard and the National Retail Federation, indicating retail-sales gains were lighter than last year. Some analysts said the gains were strong nonetheless, while others said they would appear stronger once gift cards were cashed in next month.

Others said investors were ignoring short-term news, and betting that the year's last week would show stock gains, as it usually does.

"This is just a continuation of the rally we have seen since mid-summer. People are expecting the market to hold up until year end," said Stephen Sachs, director of trading at mutual-fund group Rydex Investments in Rockville, Md. "The retail-sales news is going to be ignored this week, and it will catch up with us next week."

Crude-oil futures fell $1.31, or 2.1%, to $61.10 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Traders said oil investors were looking past tensions with Iran and focusing on mild winter weather, which holds down demand for fuels.

Oil futures are still up 9.5% from the recent 18-month closing low hit on Nov. 17, but are practically unchanged -- up just up 0.1% -- for the year to date.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 0.44%, or 6.14 points, to 1416.90, up 13.5% this year.

The Nasdaq Composite Index advanced 0.51%, or 12.33 points, to 2413.51, ahead 9.4% for the year.

Bond prices rose, pushing yields lower, because investors concluded that the weak retail-sales numbers suggest a soft economy, which will make the Federal Reserve less likely to raise interest rates.

Outside the U.S., stocks declined in dollar terms. Stocks in Japan hit a seven-month high, while China shares set a record. Most major European markets remained closed for Christmas holidays and reopen today. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, fell 0.04%, or 0.08 point, to 240.40.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks advanced1. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 1.02 billion shares, as 2,295 stocks rose and 1,027 fell.

Bond prices gained2. The 10-year Treasury note rose 5/32, or $1.56 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.607%. The 30-year bond was up 13/32 to yield 4.734%.

The dollar strengthened3. Late in New York, it traded at 119.15 yen, up from 118.81, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.3096 from $1.3141.

Former President Ford Dies At 93 (WP)

By J.y. Smith And Lou Cannon

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

Gerald Rudolph Ford Jr., who became the 38th president of the United States as a result of some of the most extraordinary events in American history and sought to restore the nation's confidence in the basic institutions of government, died Tuesday.

His wife, Betty, reported the death in a statement.

"My family joins me in sharing the difficult news that Gerald Ford, our beloved husband, father, grandfather and great grandfather has passed away at 93 years of age," Mrs. Ford said in a brief statement issued from her husband's office in Rancho Mirage, Calif., the Associated Press reported. "His life was filled with love of God, his family and his country."

The statement did not say where Ford died or list a cause of death, according to AP. Ford had battled pneumonia in January 2006 and underwent two heart treatments -- including an angioplasty -- in August at the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn.

President Bush issued a statement about the death shortly after midnight. "President Ford was a great American who gave many years of dedicated service to our country. . . . [H]e assumed the Presidency in an hour of national turmoil and division. With his quiet integrity, common sense, and kind instincts, President Ford helped heal our land and restore public confidence in the Presidency," Bush said. "The American people will always admire Gerald Ford's devotion to duty, his personal character, and the honorable conduct of his administration. We mourn the loss of such a leader . . ."

Ford was the only occupant of the White House never elected either to the presidency or the vice presidency. A former Republican congressman from Grand Rapids, Mich., he always claimed that his highest ambition was to be speaker of the House of Representatives. He had declined opportunities to run for the Senate and for governor of Michigan.

He was sworn in as president on Aug. 9, 1974, when Richard M. Nixon resigned as a result of the Watergate scandal.

"The long national nightmare is over," Ford said in his inaugural address. "I believe that truth is the glue that holds government together, not only our government, but civilization itself. That bond, though strained, is unbroken at home and abroad."

Ford had become vice president on Dec. 6, 1973, two months after Spiro T. Agnew pleaded no contest to a tax evasion charge and resigned from the nation's second highest office. The former Maryland governor was under investigation for accepting bribes and kickbacks.

In the 2 1/2 years of his presidency, Ford ended the U.S. involvement in the war in Vietnam, helped mediate a cease-fire agreement between Israel and Egypt, signed the Helsinki human rights convention with the Soviet Union and traveled to Vladivostok in the Soviet Far East to sign an arms limitation agreement with Leonid Brezhnev, the Soviet general secretary. Ford also sent the Marines to free the crew of the Mayaguez, a U.S. merchant vessel that was captured by Cambodian communists.

On the domestic front, he faced some of the most difficult economic conditions since the Great Depression, with the inflation rate approaching 12 percent. Chronic energy shortages and price hikes produced long lines and angry citizens at gas pumps. In the field of civil rights, the sense of optimism that had characterized the 1960s had been replaced by an increasing sense of alienation, particularly in the inner cities. The new president also faced a political landscape in which Democrats held large majorities in both the House and the Senate.

But Ford's overriding priority was ending the constitutional and political crisis known as Watergate. It had begun June 17, 1972, when five operatives of Nixon's reelection campaign were caught breaking into Democratic National Committee headquarters in the Watergate office building.

The White House denied any involvement. But as the situation unfolded, the central question was whether Nixon had tried to obstruct the subsequent investigation. A special prosecutor sought answers on tapes Nixon had made of his Oval Office conversations.

The president resisted turning them over on the ground that this would violate executive privilege, but in July 1974, a unanimous Supreme Court ruled against him. Within days, prosecutors found a tape on which Nixon apparently ordered a cover-up. The House Judiciary Committee approved three articles of impeachment. Faced with the virtual certainty of a trial by the Senate, Nixon resigned.

Ford believed that his signal achievement was healing the national divisiveness caused by the "poisonous wounds" of Watergate, as he put it in his inaugural speech. "There is no question that this is the thing I contributed," Ford said 30 years later in an Aug. 25, 2004, interview with The Washington Post at his summer home in Beaver Creek, Colo.

When he assumed office, Ford immediately made clear his intention to change what historian Arthur M. Schlesinger Jr. called "the imperial presidency."

He was "acutely aware," Ford said in his inaugural address, that he had not been elected to the position he held, and he asked Americans "to confirm me as your president with your prayers." He said he had neither sought the presidency nor made any "secret promises" to attain it.

"In all my public and private acts as your president, I expect to follow my instincts of openness and candor with full confidence that honesty is always the best policy at hand," he said.

". . . Our Constitution works; our great republic is a government of laws and not of men. Here the people rule. But there is a higher power, by whatever name we honor Him, who ordains not only righteousness but love, not only justice but mercy.

"As we bind up the internal wounds of Watergate, more painful and more poisonous than those of foreign wars, let us restore the Golden Rule to our political process, and let brotherly love purge our hearts of suspicion and hate."

A new spirit was soon evident in the nation's leadership. The Oval Office, long a fortress for an embittered president who frequently fled its confines to his homes in San Clemente, Calif., or Key Biscayne, Fla., was thrown open to members of Congress, old friends, public officials, reporters.

The new president's approval rating reached 71 percent. He was photographed making his own breakfast. He was freely contradicted by his eldest son, and his aides spoke what was on their minds without waiting for official clearance. He appointed Jerald F. terHorst, a respected Washington correspondent, as his chief spokesman.

This euphoric honeymoon lasted precisely one month.

On Sept. 8, Ford granted Nixon a full pardon for all federal crimes he had "committed or may have committed" when he was in the White House. The only acknowledgement he received in return was a six-paragraph statement from Nixon in San Clemente saying that "I can see clearly now . . . that I was wrong in not acting more decisively only in dealing with Watergate, particularly when it reached the stage of judicial proceedings and grew from a political scandal into a national tragedy."

Ford said the pardon was necessary to bring Watergate to a close, that he would have had to pardon Nixon sometime in any case, and that it was easier to do it sooner than later.

The response was a tidal wave of criticism. Every opinion poll showed a large majority of Americans opposed the pardon. It was denounced in Congress, including by members of Ford's own party. Republican officials gloomily and accurately forecast that it had reintroduced the Watergate issue into the 1974 elections, which proved to be a Democratic landslide. White House spokesman terHorst resigned in protest.

It was widely assumed that Ford had doomed his political career. By January 1975, his approval rating had plummeted to 36 percent. Not even two assassination attempts, both in California in 1975, generated significant popular support.

The consequences included a three-month delay in confirmation of Ford's choice of former governor Nelson A. Rockefeller of New York as vice president. In congressional hearings, it was disclosed that Rockefeller had made large private gifts to employees on the New York State payroll and that he had played a hidden role in financing a campaign book against Democratic gubernatorial nominee Arthur J. Goldberg. The disclosures undermined his ability to play an influential role in the Ford administration.

Many conservative Republicans in Congress joined Democrats in opposing Ford's programs. In mid-1975, Gov. Ronald Reagan of California, the darling of the right wing of the GOP, announced his intention to seek the Republican presidential nomination in 1976.

Ford beat back the Reagan challenge, but he narrowly lost the general election in November 1976, to the Democratic candidate, former governor Jimmy Carter of Georgia.

Asked in his 2004 interview with The Washington Post if the pardon had hurt him in the 1976 election, Ford replied: "It probably did. It was a close election, as you know . . . there is a group of bitter people who never forgave me and probably voted against me, and the net result is that they probably helped that I didn't win."

Ford closed strongly against Carter after trailing by as much as 30 points in the polls but was damaged by asserting during a debate that Poland was not under Soviet domination. Against the advice of aides who told him this was a blunder, Ford stubbornly waited several days before correcting himself. The impression of bumbling was exacerbated by reports of his purported clumsiness. During a trip to Austria, he tripped and fell while leaving Air Force One and there were several photographs of him falling while skiing.

But Carter began his own term with a graceful tribute that stands as the general assessment of the Ford presidency: "For myself and for our nation," Carter said in his inaugural address, "I want to thank my predecessor for all he has done to heal our land."

Throughout his years in Washington, Ford had a reputation for hard work, patience and self-confidence. These qualities gained him a place in the inner circles of the Congress. He was helped also by the fact that politically he was a man of the center. He was an internationalist in foreign affairs, a moderate on civil rights and social questions and a conservative on fiscal matters.

His standing in the government was evident in 1963 when President Lyndon B. Johnson named him to the commission that investigated the assassination of President John F. Kennedy. In 1965, he was elected minority leader of the House, the top Republican position in a House controlled by Democrats. He held that post until he became vice president.

When he retired from the White House, Ford wrote his memoirs, established his presidential library at the University of Michigan, served on the boards of various corporations, gave hundreds of speeches, played golf and divided his time between homes in Rancho Mirage, Calif., and Beaver Creek, Colo.

He apparently had no second thoughts about his career. "Once I determine to move, I seldom, if ever, fret," he wrote in his memoirs. It was one of the most notable aspects of his character and he never wavered from it.

In 1983, he told The Post that losing to Carter "truly hurt," but that he had been "doing as good a job as possible under very difficult circumstances" and that he was not going to "sit around and cry about it."

Instead of complaining, Ford pitched in to help his party. In 1980, he campaigned hard for his old foe, Reagan, who decisively defeated Carter. "I'm a political realist," Ford told The Post in 2004 in looking back on this election. "You win some and you lose some, and you have to accept the responsibility to do what you think in the bigger perspective. I sure didn't want Jimmy Carter to be president again in 1980 because I was very sour on his performance as president."

In the late 1970s, the Ford family received expressions of respect and sympathy from all over the country when former first lady Betty Ford described her successful struggle against addiction to alcohol and prescription drugs and how her husband and children had persuaded her that she needed help. The Betty Ford Clinic in Rancho Mirage, Calif., was named in her honor and became one of the nation's leading centers for the treatment of substance abuse.

In 1981, at the request of President Reagan, Ford joined Nixon and Carter in representing the United States at the funeral of Egyptian President Anwar Sadat. The three former chief executives flew to Cairo aboard Air Force One, and Ford and Carter began a warm friendship during the flight.

In 1999, President Bill Clinton conferred on Ford the Medal of Freedom, the nation's highest civilian honor. He also received the Congressional Medal of Honor. In 2000, when he was hospitalized after suffering minor strokes during the Republican National Convention in Philadelphia, there was an enormous outpouring of public affection and concern.

In "Years of Renewal," the third volume of his memoirs, which was published in 1999, Henry Kissinger, Ford's secretary of state, offered this assessment of the former president:

"With Ford, what one saw was what one got. Providence smiled on Americans when -- seemingly by happenstance -- it brought forward a president who embodied our nation's deepest and simplest values."

In a passage on present-day politics, Kissinger drew an implicit distinction between Ford and subsequent White House occupants.

"The modern politician is less interested in being a hero than a superstar," he wrote. "Heroes walk alone; stars derive their status from approbation. Heroes are defined by inner values, stars by consensus. When a candidate's views are forged in focus groups and ratified by television anchor-persons, insecurity and superficiality become congenital. Radicalism replaces liberalism, and populism masquerades as conservatism."

In Kissinger's view, Ford was a leader in the heroic mold.

Born Leslie Lynch King Jr. on July 14, 1913, in Omaha, Neb., the future president was the offspring of a brief, failed marriage between Leslie King, a wealthy Wyoming wool merchant, and Dorothy Gardner King. The Kings divorced the following January, and she returned to her parents' home in Grand Rapids.

Soon thereafter, she married Gerald R. Ford, a young paint salesman whom she had met at an Episcopal Church social. He formally adopted her child, who was renamed Gerald R. Ford Jr. The Fords subsequently had three other boys.

Both Grand Rapids and Gerald Ford's paint-selling business prospered in the first years of the marriage. TerHorst, the former press secretary-turned-biographer, recounts that Gerald Ford Sr. "owned a touring car and there was enough money to take Mrs. Ford and young Jerry to Florida for vacations."

The future president was athletic, outgoing and happy in his youth. He became an adequate student, an outstanding football player, and an Eagle Scout. Later, when his father's business declined during the Depression, he tried to help by taking a $2-a-week lunch-counter job.

In the custom of those years, he had not been told that he was an adopted child. He found out abruptly when his well-to-do biological father, on the way to Detroit to pick up a new Lincoln, dropped by the lunch counter where his son worked and told him.

Leslie King invited his son to spend the summer with him in Wyoming after he graduated from high school. Ford turned him down, but he was shocked by the discovery of his adoption.

As terHorst recounted in "Gerald Ford and the Future of the Presidency": "Inside Jerry Ford, the hurt was deep." He quoted Ford as saying: "I thought, 'Here I was, earning $2 a week and trying to get through school, my stepfather was having difficult times. Yet here was my real father, obviously doing quite well if he could pick up a new Lincoln.' "

This incident occurred in 1930, the year Ford turned 17 and was a senior at South High School in Grand Rapids. He was an all-city center on the South High football team, which won the state championship that year.

Ford's football prowess opened a window to college, and his coach and some alumni from the University of Michigan provided him with a scholarship and a job waiting on tables. He was a benchwarmer behind an all-American center for two years, while Michigan won back-to-back Big Ten football championships.

Not until 1934, in his senior year, did Gerald Ford win a starting place on Michigan's football team. Then he was voted the most valuable player on a team that lost seven of eight games and offered professional football contracts with the Green Bay Packers and Chicago Bears. But Ford said in his autobiography that he thought the law would be a better career.

Ford graduated from the university in 1935 with a B average. He accepted a $2,400-a-year offer to serve as boxing coach and assistant football coach at Yale, meanwhile applying to Yale Law School. The law school turned him down in the belief that he would not be able to do well in his studies while coaching.

Ford was accepted on a trial basis in 1938 and did well enough in a couple of courses to be allowed to enroll full time. He graduated in 1941 in the upper third of his class with his best work in a course on legal ethics.

Returning to Grand Rapids, he founded a law practice with Philip W. Buchen, a fellow Michigan graduate who had been partly crippled by polio in childhood.

Already Ford was drawn to politics. He had become active in Grand Rapids the previous summer in the campaign of Republican presidential candidate Wendell Willkie, who went down under Franklin D. Roosevelt's third-term candidacy, but who carried Michigan. Ford's interest in Willkie revealed a consistent "internationalist" bent that was evident in all of his succeeding political conflicts.

The Willkie campaign also drew Ford into local Republican affairs, where he sided with a reform group known as The Home Front, which was seeking to break the power of an entrenched Republican boss.

Ford's budding political interests were interrupted by World War II. He joined the Navy and spent 47 months on active duty, two years of this time on the aircraft carrier U.S.S. Monterey, where he was once nearly swept over the side during a typhoon. He left the Navy in 1946 with the rank of lieutenant commander.

He resumed his legal career in Grand Rapids and became active in a variety of community projects, culminating in 1949 when the national Junior Chamber of Commerce selected him as one of the nation's "10 most outstanding young men."

The year of 1948, when President Harry S.Truman was confounding pollsters by winning an upset victory over Thomas Dewey, was a time of decision for Gerald Ford. He ran for the U.S. House of Representatives in what seemed to be a hopeless battle against the entrenched Republican conservative, Bartel J. Jonkman, of western Michigan's 5th congressional district.

Jonkman was of Dutch descent, and the Dutch were the largest single ethnic group in the district. He was considered an isolationist who opposed American involvement overseas in general and aid to Europe as proposed by President Truman under the European Recovery Plan in particular.

In retrospect, Ford seemed to have been in tune with the changing times. American involvement in World War II had dissipated isolationist sentiment in the nation's heartland. The internationalist Willkie had done well in Michigan as early as 1940, and Sen. Arthur Vandenberg of Michigan, the senior Republican on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, had dramatically shifted from an isolationist to an internationalist position during the war.

Vandenberg was a political opponent of Jonkman, the senior Republican on the House Foreign Affairs Committee, and he encouraged Ford's seemingly hopeless candidacy. Jonkman also was considered by some local Republicans to be spending too little time in his home district. Ford waged a vigorous handshaking campaign, aided by members of the reform group he sided with before the war. He had the support of the largest daily newspaper in the district, the pro-Vandenberg and anti-isolationist Grand Rapids Press.

In the September primary, Ford defeated Jonkman, 23,632 votes to 14,341. He won the general election with more than 60 percent of the votes, a feat he repeated in each of the following 12 elections.

Ford had proposed marriage on February 1948, to Elizabeth Bloomer Warren, a dancer and former model, and she had accepted. But the couple kept their plans secret out of concern that her background as a dancer and a divorced woman would have an adverse effect in the Republican primary among Dutch Calvinist voters in the district.

They were married Oct. 15, 1948, in Grace Episcopal Church, which Ford attended. They had four children, Michael Gerald Ford, John Gardner Ford, Steven Meigs Ford and Susan Ford Vance.

In Washington, Ford occupied an office in what is now the Cannon House Office Building. Next door was a Democrat from Massachusetts named John F. Kennedy. Ford also formed a friendship with Richard Nixon, then a second-term House member from California.

Ford quickly established himself as a district-service congressman who answered every letter and made himself available to visitors from his state. He staffed a trailer with aides who traveled from town to town in his district. He won political points by taking stands that struck responsive chords among his constituents, such as a 1953 appeal that the United States admit 50,000 Dutch immigrants after disastrous floods in the Netherlands.

Constituent service also was the watchword of Sen. Vandenberg, whom Ford admired almost reverentially and who, in turn, considered the new House member something of a protege. When Vandenberg died in 1952, Ford briefly considered running for his seat but decided to stay in the House.

Ford became as popular among his House colleagues as he had been in Grand Rapids. He found time to golf, swim and ski, and he was accepted into the Chowder and Marching Society, a group of House members that has always welcomed former athletes.

The new congressman was named to the assignment of his choice, the politically helpful House Public Works Committee, in his first term. In only his second term, in 1951, he was appointed to the influential House Appropriations Committee.

On foreign policy, Ford remained true to the issues he had espoused in his first campaign. He supported Truman's "Point Four" program for aiding underdeveloped countries, and he consistently favored foreign military aid. His internationalism displayed itself again in candidate preferences, and he supported the nomination of Dwight D. Eisenhower at a time when Sen. Robert Taft of Ohio was favored by most Midwestern Republicans in Congress.

On domestic issues, Ford was an orthodox Republican. He voted against public housing, against the minimum wage and against repeal of the "right-to-work law" provision of the Taft-Hartley Act.

On civil rights issues, he was considered a Republican moderate during most of his career. He voted against the poll tax, a device to keep the poor -- especially blacks -- from voting, when it was an inflammatory issue, and he voted for the 1964 Civil Rights Act and the 1965 Voting Rights Act. But he also opposed school busing to achieve racial integration, a position that disappointed members of the Congressional Black Caucus, all of them Democrats estranged from the policies of the Nixon administration. Only one member of the caucus, Rep. Andrew J. Young of Georgia, voted to confirm Ford as vice president, and Young admitted to having "grave doubts."

Republican colleagues in the House considered him progressive on making the House a more responsive institution.

His first vote in Congress was in favor of changing House rules to make it easier to bring a bill up on the floor without clearance from the House Rules Committee. When he became House Republican leader, he promoted a series of task forces aimed at giving younger members an opportunity at leadership.

During the two Eisenhower administrations, when Democrats held a congressional majority for all except the 1952-1954 term, Ford gradually advanced toward House leadership. He held a senior position on the Appropriations Committee and played a growing role in GOP strategy councils. In 1960, a poll of Washington correspondents undertaken by Newsweek rated him second among the ablest members of Congress.

Ford's breakthrough into a major position of leadership occurred in 1963, when he was the candidate of a group of younger Republicans, slightly to their party's left of center, to challenge 67-year-old Charles B. Hoeven of Iowa for chairmanship of the House Republican Conference.

Ford defeated Hoeven by an 86-to-78 vote, which he jokingly used to refer to as "a landslide." He went from there, in January 1965, to oust Charles A. Halleck of Indiana from the House minority leader post he had held for six years in a 73-to-67 secret ballot.

One of the public highlights of the Ford minority leadership was a weekly news conference with Sen. Everett M. Dirksen (R-Ill.), which quickly became know as the "Ev and Jerry Show." Ford lacked Dirksen's oratorical talents, and he sometimes found himself on the losing end of exchanges with the Illinois senator.

It was at this period of his career that Ford was on the receiving end of two well-publicized gibes of President Johnson. The president once suggested that Ford couldn't "chew gum and walk at the same time" and also commented that "there's nothing wrong with Gerald Ford except he played football too long without a helmet."

Ford incorporated this last remark into some of his own speeches, correctly giving the original authorship to former Detroit Mayor Gerald Cavanaugh.

However, House colleagues on both sides of the aisle disputed the idea that Ford was less than bright. They pointed to his shrewd, effective leadership in the House and his mastery of such complexities as the defense budget.

What Ford lacked, according to one of the influential Republicans who knew him best, was a capacity for inspirational expression.

"I'd like to see him give more of a look of leadership than his pedestrian quality, but that's Jerry," this colleague said five months after the beginning of the Ford presidency. "He didn't make inspirational speeches as minority leader and he doesn't make them as president of the United States."

Ford's accomplishments as a House leader were based not upon his public pronouncements but upon a talent for friendly persuasion attested to by many Republicans and Democrats.

"It's the damnedest thing," said Rep. Joe Waggonner (D-La.). "Jerry just puts his arm around a colleague or looks him in the eye, says, 'I need your vote,' and gets it."

Most of Ford's public declarations in the mid-1960s were orthodox, oppositionist rhetoric, peppered with football expressions of "end runs" and "team play." He said the Johnson administration was taking the country into "frustration and failure, bafflement and boredom." Once he said, "If Lincoln were alive today, he'd be spinning in his grave."

Occasionally, however, Ford was capable of defining his own political moderation in words that set him apart from the Nixon administration, which he was soon to defend.

In a speech at Southern Methodist University on Nov. 8, 1968, he said: "The higher ground of moderation with unselfish unity is not only common horse sense for a political party, it is also representative of the people and in keeping with the underlying genius of the American political system."

In 1970, Ford was accused of abandoning the high ground of American politics when he launched an effort to impeach William O. Douglas, the liberal associate justice of the U.S. Supreme Court. In the course of the incident, he offered a definition -- much quoted during the Clinton years -- of what constitutes an impeachable offense.

Ostensibly, it was Ford's idea to impeach Douglas because of the appearance of excerpts of a book by the jurist in the Evergreen Review alongside material that Ford said was pornographic. However, after he became president, Ford admitted he had been helped by John N. Mitchell, the attorney general in the first Nixon administration, who was angry about Senate rejection of two of Nixon's Supreme Court nominees.

The charges presented by Ford were primarily political and made numerous references to Douglas's alleged "liberal" or "leftist" beliefs. Ford described Douglas's book, "Points of Rebellion," as "a fuzzy harangue." Responding to congressional critics who said that these charges had nothing whatever to do with judicial misconduct, Ford said on April 15, 1970:

"What, then, is an impeachable offense? The only honest answer is that an impeachable offense is whatever a majority of the House of Representatives considers it to be at a given moment in history."

The impeachment resolution was shunted to a House Judiciary subcommittee, which found no grounds for taking action.

Ford's severest intra-party critic on this issue was Rep. Paul N. McCloskey Jr., a maverick Republican from California, who considered the impeachment effort an attack on judicial independence. It was reflective of Ford's personal stature in the House and of his desire to preserve a wide range of views within the Republican Party that he and McCloskey remained good friends.

Ford's consistent advocacy of military preparedness and his internationalism made him an early supporter of the Vietnam war. When Johnson sent a half million troops to Vietnam in 1965, Ford emerged as a partisan critic who said that the United States should take sterner measures, such as the bombing of North Vietnam and a naval blockade, in an effort to end the conflict.

"It is President Johnson's war, because the president plays everything close to the vest,' Ford said on June 18, 1966. "He has an unhealthy passion for secrecy."

The use of the phrase "Johnson's war" brought Ford a rebuke from some Republicans, among them, Sen. Dirksen.

Ford served as permanent chairman of the 1968 Republican Convention, which nominated Nixon for president. In his speech to that convention, Ford emphasized failures of U.S. policy in Vietnam and military preparedness.

"Our military strength has dangerously declined compared to that of the communist world," Ford said. "We should rebuild our military power to the point where no aggressor would dare attack us."

When Nixon became president, Ford loyally supported his Vietnam policy, including the incursions into Laos and Cambodia and the bombing of North Vietnam. He later gave Nixon full credit for withdrawing U.S. troops from the war.

The new Nixon administration changed Ford's role from leader of the usually loyal opposition to outspoken advocate of the Republican president. Ford supported the president nearly nine of 10 times on legislation and on almost all important issues. Until the last few weeks of the Watergate crisis he steadfastly refused to believe that Nixon himself might be seriously implicated.

Ford's loyalty was rewarded after Agnew's resignation when Nixon nominated him for the vice presidency. Ford was the second choice after former secretary of the treasury John B. Connally, but Nixon was persuaded by various Republicans that Congress would not confirm Connally, a former Democrat.

Ford's nomination was the first made under the 25th Amendment and it touched off a detailed inquiry into his background and financial affairs by the two congressional judiciary committees.

One of the charges investigated was leveled in a 1972 book by former Washington lobbyist Robert N. Winter-Berger, a self-styled influence peddler who said that he had lent Ford $15,000 that was never repaid.

Winter-Berger was unable to produce any documentation and he contradicted himself frequently in testimony, once saying that he had written with "literary license."

His colleagues absolved Ford and he was subsequently confirmed 92 to 3 in the Senate and 387 to 35 vote in the House, despite opposition from the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (now known simply as the NAACP) and Americans for Democratic Action.

The action of both groups was based largely on Ford's civil rights record as they perceived it. Joseph L. Rauh Jr., the national vice chairman of the ADA, said Ford had been "a divisive influence on civil rights legislation at every turn."

Ford spent the better part of the next 10 months trying to defend Nixon on the Watergate issue, while at the same time condemning the practices of political espionage, lying and obstruction of justice uncovered in the Watergate scandal.

While he never criticized Nixon personally, he tried on several occasions to distance himself from the Nixon White House, most noticeably on March 31, 1974, when he told a Midwestern Republican conference in Chicago that the party must "learn the lessons of Watergate."

But it was not until the weekend before Nixon's resignation that Ford stopped proclaiming belief in Nixon's personal innocence. And it was not until the day before Nixon bid farewell to his high office in a nationally televised speech that Ford actually assembled a transition team.

In the aftermath of the Nixon pardon, Ford's political vulnerability was evident in his efforts to deal with Vietnam and its legacy.

He surprised many Americans by unveiling, in a speech to a Veterans of Foreign Wars convention, a conditional-amnesty plan for Vietnam-era draft evaders and deserters. The proposal drew a swarm of critics. Veterans groups opposed any amnesty program while organizations such as the American Civil Liberties Union called for unconditional amnesty. Of the estimated 100,000 draft evaders, only about 20,000 took advantage of the program. Ford said in his memoirs that he was inspired by President Abraham Lincoln's offer of amnesty to Civil War deserters who swore allegiance to the union.

Although U.S. combat troops had been withdrawn by the time Ford took office, Washington was still committed to supporting the non-communist government in Saigon. With conservative backing, the president proposed an increase in aid for the South Vietnamese government to help it resist what was expected to be a major effort by the North Vietnamese communists to drive it out of the country.

There was little support for this in the new Congress. Early in 1975, it rejected Ford's proposals, turning a deaf ear to arguments that Washington had to stand by its beleaguered ally to maintain its credibility in world affairs.

The communist offensive began in April, 1975, and Ford ordered the small remaining contingent of U.S. embassy and security personnel to leave. The final evacuation produced painful pictures of Americans in retreat -- officials scrambling to get aboard helicopters while Marines held back crowds of Vietnamese who had loyally supported the United States.

On April 23, 1975, in a speech at Tulane University, Ford announced that the war in Vietnam was "finished as far as America is concerned."

A week later, Saigon fell to the communists and the long war was over.

On May 12, communist Khmer Rouge forces seized the Mayaguez, a U.S. merchant ship, in the Gulf of Thailand off the coast of Cambodia and took the 30-member crew hostage.

In the wake of the withdrawal from Vietnam, the Ford administration felt compelled to demonstrate decisively that it would protect U.S. citizens. A second reason was the president's determination to avoid a reprise of the USS Pueblo incident in 1968, in which a Navy spy ship had been captured by North Korea and its crew held under harsh conditions for a year.

The president ordered U.S. planes to bomb Cambodia. Marines invaded Koh Tang island, where the 30-member crew had initially been taken. But U.S. intelligence had lost track of the prisoners. By the time the Marines landed, the captives had been taken to the mainland and released. The Marines fought a daylong battle against a powerful Khmer Rouge force and were withdrawn from the beach by helicopter. More Americans were killed in the operation than were freed.

In retrospect, Ford came to the view that U.S. policy in Vietnam was mistaken. He blamed this on an unthinking inheritance of French colonial policy. "The French had the wrong policy, and we inherited it, and our State Department was not smart enough to realize that we should have been more objective about our policy in Vietnam," Ford said in the 2004 interview with The Post. Asked if the United States should have withdrawn sooner than it did, he said: "Absolutely, in retrospect. Now I wasn't strong enough to make that decision while I was in the White House but in reflection, there is no question."

Elsewhere in foreign affairs, Ford tried to play a mediator's role in fighting between Greeks and Turks on Cyprus. He was unsuccessful in preventing Congress from cutting off military aid to Turkey.

In the Middle East, he continued the Nixon policy of using Kissinger as a mediator between Israel and the Arab states in the Middle East. An agreement signed in September 1975 halted fighting between Israel and Egypt.

In the previous month, Ford had traveled to Helsinki to sign an accord that recognized the existing frontiers between states, including the border between East and West Germany. This implicitly recognized Soviet domination of Eastern Europe. In return, Moscow agreed to respect basic human rights and to ease restrictions on the free exchange of information and on emigration and travel within the Soviet Union.

Ford was criticized for signing the Helsinki Accords at a time when the news media were reporting numerous human rights violations in the Soviet Union, including the refusal to allow Soviet Jews to emigrate to Israel. But the president said in his autobiography, "A Time to Heal" (1979), he regarded the agreement as "a real victory for our foreign policy" because the Soviets had conceded that national borders could be changed by peaceful means.

The president also traveled to Vladivostok to negotiate a tentative new missile limitation agreement with the Soviet Union, a mission that was successful although critics of the agreement said the limits were too high.

But it was the domestic economy that proved the touchstone of Ford's presidency. The problems included inflation, rising unemployment -- it passed 9 percent, the highest level since the Great Depression -- and skyrocketing energy costs.

Soon after taking office, Ford said inflation was "public enemy No. 1." To fight it, he vetoed more than 50 spending bills. He also announced a 32-point program for fighting it, which he called "WIN," an acronym for "Whip Inflation Now."

Congress declined to enact most of Ford's anti-inflation proposals, however, and the WIN program was overtaken by the events of deepening recession. In January 1975, the president all but declared a cease-fire in his war on inflation and turned his attention to growing unemployment and sinking productivity.

In one of the most candid State of the Union messages ever presented to Congress, Ford in 1975 said:

"I must say to you that the State of the Union is not good. Millions of Americans are out of work. Recession and inflation are eroding the money of millions more. Prices are too high and sales are too slow."

Ford followed this message with a budget proposal that predicted long-term unemployment and massive deficits. His essential answer to what he conceived as the twin problems of the economy and the energy crisis was a quick tax rebate to stimulate the economy and oil tariff increases to lessen American dependence on foreign oil.

In 1976, Congress passed a tax reform act. It included tax cuts larger than those Ford had proposed, but he signed the bill into law. He resisted plans for public works projects to create jobs.

Despite the seriousness and the variety of the problems that confronted him, Ford maintained his even-tempered composure and his optimism. He met frequently with a wide range of legislators, businessmen, labor officials, heads of state, reporters and other visitors.

He knew that his chances of winning a full term in 1976 were not good, but he approached it in the spirit of Truman, whose bust he placed next to his desk in the Oval Office.

Truman, Ford used to say, "had guts, he was plain-talking, he had no illusions about being a great intellectual, but he seemed to make the right decisions."

Many would say the same of Gerald Rudolph Ford.

Gerald Ford Dies At 93 (LAT)

By Robert L. Jackson

Gerald R. Ford, who as the 38th president of the United States helped restore the nation's political stability after the trauma of the Watergate scandal, has died, his widow, Betty, announced Tuesday night.

"My family joins me in sharing the difficult news that Gerald Ford, our beloved husband, father, grandfather and great-grandfather, has passed away at 93 years of age," the former first lady said in a brief statement issued from her husband's office in Rancho Mirage. "His life was filled with love of God, his family and his country."

He died at 6:45 p.m. Tuesday at his home in Rancho Mirage. No cause of death was released.

Ford had been in declining health for several years. In August he had a cardiac pacemaker implanted during a stay at the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn. A few days later, he underwent a second heart procedure when stents were placed into two of his coronary arteries to increase blood flow.

With Ford's death, George H.W. Bush, 82, becomes the oldest living former president. He and President Carter were both born in 1924, but Bush was born in June and Carter in October.

President George W. Bush's chief of staff, Joshua B. Bolten, told Bush of Ford's death just before 8 p.m. PST, Deputy White House Press Secretary Scott Stanzel said. Bush, at his ranch near Crawford, Texas, called Betty Ford about an hour later "to express his personal condolences," Stanzel said.

In a prepared statement released by the White House, said Bush and First Lady Laura Bush were "greatly saddened" by Ford's death. "The American people will always admire Gerald Ford's devotion to duty, his personal character, and the honorable conduct of his administration," the statement said. "We mourn the loss of such a leader, and our 38th president will always have a special place in our nation's memory. On behalf of all Americans, Laura and I offer our deepest sympathies to Betty Ford and all of President Ford's family. Our thoughts and prayers will be with them in the hours and days ahead."

Ford, a Republican, served first as vice president and then as president without benefit of election. He was House minority leader in 1973 when he was chosen by President Nixon to serve as vice president after Spiro T. Agnew was forced to resign because of financial irregularities. Less than a year later, Ford was thrust into the Oval Office when Nixon resigned because of Watergate.

Ford took the presidential oath at 12:03 p.m. on Friday, Aug. 9, 1974, in a nationally televised ceremony in the East Room of the White House. Once sworn in, he stepped to a microphone to address the cameras and hundreds of tearful staffers who had just waved goodbye to Nixon's helicopter as it rose from the White House lawn.

"Our long national nightmare is over," Ford said. "Our Constitution works; our great republic is a government of laws and not of men."

Untainted himself by Watergate, Ford was left the task of restoring public confidence in an institution badly damaged by the corrosive constitutional crisis that, until Nixon's resignation, was spiraling toward the president's impeachment and conviction in the Senate.

But, after serving barely a month as president, Ford made the controversial decision to grant Nixon a blanket pardon for any crimes he may have committed while in office. Many thought Ford's move fueled national cynicism about government and the officials who ran it. Others thought it was the correct decision to move the country past Watergate.

Ford defended his actions by saying he had hoped to end the bitter debate over whether to prosecute Nixon, which had become a serious distraction for the White House. He conceded after his narrow defeat by Carter in 1976, however, that the pardon had had "an adverse impact" on his popular support, although he maintained that he had made the "right decision."

Ford took over a disoriented and virtually immobilized administration at a time of mounting problems. Abroad, the long, costly U.S. military presence in Southeast Asia was nearing an end. At home, an economy warped by inflation and energy shortages was sliding into a recession.

The new president sought to distinguish his habits from the perception that his predecessor ran an imperial presidency. Ford replaced Nixon's aides, and White House officials became more accessible than they had been in years. Trust and civility began to reappear in White House relations with Congress and the public.

One morning, he invited the White House press corps to chat with him while he ate a typical breakfast. As photographers snapped away, Ford sliced and buttered his own English muffins in the manner of the Upper Midwesterner he was.

Although Ford defended the American commitment in Southeast Asia after most U.S. officeholders had written it off as political poison, he showed early sensitivity as president to the domestic divisions left by the unpopular conflict.

To promote "the rebuilding of peace among ourselves," he initiated a conditional clemency plan that he said would give draft dodgers and deserters a chance to "work their way back" to full citizenship.

Supporters praised Ford for integrity, openness and stubborn determination. His detractors called him unimaginative and outdated, an accidental president unqualified for the White House. A public perception of Ford as a fumbler took shape after a series of minor accidents was exploited in derisive commentary and cartoons.

He survived two attempts on his life. Both occurred in California in the same month — September 1975.

On the morning of Sept. 5, a young woman named Lynette "Squeaky" Fromme, a member of the Charles Manson family who had not been involved in Manson-related murders, aimed a borrowed .45-caliber pistol at Ford as he crossed a park near the state Capitol in Sacramento. The gun misfired as a Secret Service agent grabbed her arm.

Less than three weeks later, on Sept. 22, Sara Jane Moore, later diagnosed as psychologically disturbed, fired a shot at Ford from across the street as he emerged from the St. Francis Hotel in San Francisco. A retired Marine who saw Moore raise the gun struck her arm and deflected the shot. Again, Ford was not injured.

Both women were convicted for the attempted assassinations and were sentenced to life imprisonment.

But more fundamental problems confronted Ford's administration and, indirectly, his candidacy for an elected presidential term of his own.

Although the end of the Vietnam War in May 1975 meant that the nation was technically at peace for the first time in 11 years, international tensions continued. The administration was in a drawn-out confrontation with Congress on military posture, foreign policy and controls over covert intelligence operations.

On the foreign policy front, Ford — with help from holdover Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger — played a leading role in the Helsinki Accords, in which the Soviet Union in 1975 agreed to basic freedoms of religion and conscience for all peoples. Although some dismissed the accords as worthless, some historians now believe they paved the way for later democratic reforms among the Soviet people.

Domestically, Ford sought to slay the twin beasts of a deepening recession and ballooning inflation with an economic program that was largely ineffective. He dubbed it "Whip Inflation Now," using the acronym WIN. Unemployment in 1975 had reached 9.2%, a 34-year high, and inflation was at 11%.

Ford offered everyone in the nation a WIN button to encourage support for his campaign for such voluntary measures as cost-cutting by businesses and compliance with a 55-mph speed limit to reduce reliance on foreign oil. Soon there were WIN parades, WIN work projects and WIN flags.

But high unemployment continued into the 1976 election year. And, although the pall of Watergate was largely lifted, basic policy directions were little changed from the Nixon era.

Ford was born July 14, 1913, in Omaha, the only child of Leslie and Dorothy Gardner King. They christened him Leslie Lynch King. After a divorce in 1915, Dorothy King took the boy to live with her parents in Grand Rapids, Mich., and later married a young paint salesman, Gerald R. Ford, who adopted the child and changed his name to Gerald R. Ford Jr. In time, there were three half-brothers. The elder Ford formed his own paint company and nursed the family through the Great Depression.

Young Gerald starred at center on the 1930 championship football team at South High School, then won a football scholarship to the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor, where he earned his keep as a fraternity house dishwasher and had a B average when he graduated in 1935.

Ford turned down two offers to play professional football to take a job as assistant football and boxing coach at Yale, which financed his attendance at Yale Law School. He was in the top third of his class when he received his degree in 1941.

He launched a law practice in Grand Rapids, but a few months after the Japanese attacked Pearl Harbor on Dec. 7, 1941, he joined the Navy. Assigned in 1943 to the new light aircraft carrier Monterey, he had earned 10 battle stars in the South Pacific and was a lieutenant commander when he returned to Grand Rapids in 1945.

Ford signed on with a local law firm, then soon found himself vice president of a group of former servicemen campaigning for action on veterans' housing. It was this entree to local politics that led Ford in 1948 to successfully challenge U.S. Rep. Bartel J. Jonkman, an isolationist Republican representing the 5th District, for the GOP nomination.

Ford's election that fall with 61% of the vote was routine in the 5th District, which had last sent a Democrat to Congress in 1910.

A well-kept secret during the primary campaign was Ford's engagement to Elizabeth Anne Bloomer, a trained dancer and former model. They were married a month before the 1948 general election.

It was a close, enduring match. Gerald and Betty Ford lived for a time in apartments around Washington, then moved into a comfortably unassuming house in Alexandria, Va., where they raised their four children: Michael Gerald, John "Jack" Gardner, Steven Meigs and Susan.

Freshman congressman Ford soon achieved a place on the Appropriations Committee, the starting point for all money bills. Assigned to the subcommittee on defense, he became a specialist in Pentagon budgeting and acquired a belief in military strength that he carried with him to the White House.

Ford began to emerge from the GOP rank and file in February 1952 when he joined 17 other House Republicans in a letter urging Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower to run for president. The 1952 election put Eisenhower in the White House and gave the vice presidency to Nixon, then a U.S. senator from California and a friend of Ford from when they served together in the House.

The new vice president was Ford's well-placed link with the Eisenhower administration. And it worked two ways: When a GOP moderate faction tried to force Nixon off the 1956 GOP ticket, Ford helped douse the revolt. Nixon remembered the service and brought Ford into his circle of advisors when he waged his losing presidential campaign against Sen. John F. Kennedy in 1960.

A week after the assassination of President Kennedy on Nov. 22, 1963, President Lyndon B. Johnson named Ford to the seven-member commission headed by Chief Justice Earl Warren that investigated the killing. After a 10-month inquiry, the commission found unanimously that the murder was the work of a lone gunman, Lee Harvey Oswald.

Ford, who was the last surviving member of the Warren Commission, co-wrote a book with John R. Stiles on the findings of the panel, "Portrait of the Assassin."

In January 1965, Ford became House minority leader, but the Republicans were so few at the time that he was in no position to block or amend Johnson's Great Society programs.

Ford did serve notice on the Johnson White House not to expect GOP support in the House for the escalating war in Vietnam unless Republicans were consulted on policy. A hawk on Vietnam, Ford branded the administration's limited-war policies a failure and called for vigorous action against communist supply lines.

Johnson, however, ignored Ford's criticisms and dealt with the GOP congressional leadership primarily through the late Sen. Everett M. Dirksen (R-Ill.), an old colleague who supported him on Vietnam. Privately, Johnson dropped widely repeated gibes that Ford "played football too long without a helmet."

The close election that put Nixon in the White House left House Republicans 26 votes short of controlling the House. But as minority leader, Ford provided crucial support for President Nixon. He backed Nixon's policies on waging the war in Southeast Asia and in withdrawing from it. And despite his two decades as a cold warrior, he supported Nixon's moves toward detente with Moscow and endorsed Nixon's visit to mainland China.

Despite Nixon's reelection in 1972, Republicans failed to capture the House, and Ford knew he probably would never achieve his ambition of becoming speaker of the House. He talked of serving out his last term and retiring on his generous congressional pension and maybe practice a little law.

No one, least of all Ford, foresaw the combination of scandal and political accident that within two years would dispel this dream of honorable retirement. When Agnew resigned office in disgrace after pleading no contest to financial corruption charges, Nixon was empowered by the 25th Amendment to appoint a new vice president. He selected Ford. And when Watergate engulfed Nixon soon after, Ford found himself in the Oval Office.

The Watergate scandal involved the June 1972 burglary of Democratic Party headquarters at the Watergate office complex in Washington. The break-in and efforts to cover up the crime reached all the way to the Oval Office. A number of administration officials resigned; some were later convicted of offenses connected with efforts to cover up the affair. The House Judiciary Committee ultimately recommended three articles of impeachment against Nixon. Rather than face a trial in the Senate, Nixon announced on Aug. 8, 1974, that he would resign the next day.

The healing process Ford envisioned for his presidency was severely jolted at an early stage by his abrupt televised announcement on Sept. 8, 1974, of an unconditional pardon of Nixon for any crimes he might have committed as president. No charges were pending against Nixon, but multiple breaches of trust and law were indicated by the record of a House impeachment inquiry.

Ford said he believed that a Nixon trial would fuel "ugly passions" and that "Richard Nixon and his family have suffered enough."

Public reaction was negative, and some suspected that the pardon was part of a deal that had been arranged to get Nixon to resign.

Ford denied this and took full responsibility for the decision.

He added: "I do believe the buck stops here, and I cannot rely on public opinion polls to tell me what is right."

Until he became vice president and then president, Ford was barely known outside Washington. Many Americans drew their first impression of the 38th president from the televised image of a friendly, big-boned man who looked a bit ill at ease amid the improvised inaugural solemnities.

Ford was 61 at the time but looked younger. Smiles came easily to his square-jawed face. He wore his thinning hair short, with sideburns to mid-ear. It had been 40 years since he had starred at football for the University of Michigan, but he still had an athlete's bearing.

In formal speeches, Ford was more earnest than eloquent, and he said himself that he was "no orator." His delivery of prepared texts was wooden and his impromptu comments from the platform and in his numerous news conferences were in workaday political prose. On informal occasions, he was approachable and unpretentious. At ease in the Oval Office puffing on one of his many pipes, he was a good listener and a persuasive negotiator.

Ford nominated former New York Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller to fill the vice presidency, and Congress confirmed the choice. It was an overture to the Republican center that galled conservatives, who had never accepted the moderate New Yorker. Rockefeller, considered a liability to Ford's bid for the 1976 nomination, withdrew himself from consideration as a vice presidential candidate in November 1975.

Ford began his tenure with a Cabinet inherited from Nixon, but eight of the 11 faces changed in his administration's first 18 months. Though he retained Kissinger, despite the secretary of State's many critics, he fired Secretary of Defense James R. Schlesinger, a brainy, blunt advocate of military power and an open critic of Kissinger's handling of detente with the Soviet Union. Also dismissed, then invited to stay on until his successor was in place, was William E. Colby, who had headed the CIA during 16 bleak months of Watergate-related investigations.

To succeed Schlesinger — who soon reappeared in government, as Carter's Energy secretary — Ford picked Donald H. Rumsfeld, until then the chief of the White House staff. And to succeed Rumsfeld, Ford elevated a lower-level presidential aide then known as Richard B. Cheney, now Vice President Dick Cheney. For the CIA post, Ford nominated George H.W. Bush, a former Texas congressman and onetime GOP national chairman who then headed the U.S. mission in Beijing. Ford enjoyed the presidency and worked hard at it, but his style was unexciting. Little innovation came out of the Ford White House. Such surprises as there were — notably the Nixon pardon and the Cabinet shake-up — generated more criticism than praise. Ford's business-oriented economic views alienated labor leaders, while his striving for improved relations with the communist powers brought him under right-wing fire.

In dealing with the Democratic-run Congress, Ford alternated between stubbornness and conciliation. He used his veto power liberally and set a modern record by rejecting 46 bills in his first 18 months as president, but he was overridden eight times. The effect of many of the vetoes was to put pressure on Congress to scale down costly programs.

Yet throughout Ford's presidency, policy differences with Congress seemed never to erase his old ties with Capitol Hill, where he had served 25 years in the House, nine of them as minority leader. He had friends in both parties and was esteemed as a hard-working square shooter.

Ford kept himself open to advice from many quarters. Indeed, some critics complained that he listened too much and initiated too little, that he vacillated and failed to show affirmative leadership. For example, he denounced the idea of a federal "bailout" to save New York City from bankruptcy — prompting the New York Daily News' famed "Ford to City: Drop Dead" headline — but then supported a $2.3-billion short-term loan program to tide the city over.

On other occasions he took firm stands and stayed with them despite the consequences, as when he advocated higher fuel prices to force conservation, handing Democrats a powerful campaign issue.

By April 1975, Ford's Gallup Poll rating had slid to 39%. The downward trend was halted by Ford's vigorous response to the seizure of an unarmed American container ship, the Mayaguez, by a Cambodian gunboat.

The Mayaguez and its 39-man crew were released May 14, 1975, hours after Ford had ordered a military operation that threw 210 Marines, three warships and 300 aircraft into action. Fifteen servicemen died and 50 were wounded in the assault. Although his resort to arms drew some criticism, his firm decision to draw the line at what he called "an act of piracy" acted as a tonic to a public demoralized by the communist victory in Southeast Asia.

On the domestic front, Ford took steps to eliminate abuses by the CIA and related agencies. There was abundant evidence when he took office that the intelligence agencies had been misused for illicit snooping on strictly domestic groups — and not only by the Nixon administration.

Ford promised in his first speech to Congress that there would be "no illegal tappings, eavesdroppings, buggings or break-ins by my administration." He appointed Rockefeller to head a commission to investigate the matter, which several months later found that though most CIA activities were within the agency's charter, some had been "plainly unlawful and constituted improper invasions of the rights of Americans."

Ford later directed all agencies in the foreign intelligence field not to spy on Americans electronically, not to intercept their mail and not to infiltrate domestic organizations.

He was naturally positioned to run for the GOP nomination in 1976, but he withheld his decision on whether to run until it was clear that his wife, Betty, had fully recovered from a mastectomy she underwent in September 1974. The public disclosure of her illness — a taboo subject at the time — sparked an outpouring of support, and many women credited her with encouraging early checkups that may have saved their own lives.

"Her honesty has always been one of the qualities about her that I love," President Ford said.

(The first lady became even more celebrated after leaving the White House when in 1978 she disclosed her dependence on alcohol and prescription drugs. In 1982, she founded the Betty Ford Center in Rancho Mirage, where tens of thousands of patients have sought rehabilitation from drug and alcohol addictions.)

Ford was the first president in the 185-year history of the office to lack the mandate of victory in a national election, and many saw him as a GOP workhorse, more dogged than talented, a caretaker predestined to be replaced in the 1976 election. A swarm of Democrats judged that he was beatable. He also faced serious competition from within his own party.

Undeterred, Ford announced in July 1975 that he would run for a full term in 1976. The early declaration failed to head off a strong challenge in the GOP primaries from former California Gov. Ronald Reagan.

After a long, hard and sometimes bitter struggle, Ford won his party's nomination at the Kansas City convention. He chose Kansas Sen. Robert J. Dole as his running mate.

Ford's acceptance speech, considered the best of his career, challenged Carter to meet him "face to face" in a televised series of campaign debates, the first of their kind since 1960. Carter accepted, and in the first debate, Ford did well.

Forward motion faltered, however, after Ford declared in the second debate that "there's no Soviet domination of Eastern Europe." Ford first tried to explain that he had meant the United States did not acquiesce in Soviet domination, then admitted after six days that he had simply made a mistake.

That blooper in early October coincided with other troubles. Most seriously, he was forced by public protests to accept the resignation of Earl L. Butz, the Agriculture secretary he had inherited from Nixon, after published reports of an obscene gibe Butz had made about blacks. Ford's low-key reaction to the Butz gaffe did nothing to mend fences with African American voters, who backed Carter 9 to 1 on Election Day. When all election returns were in on Nov. 2, Carter had won, 51% to 48%.

As his brief term ended, Ford won praise from many quarters for his ability to bolster the public's shaken confidence in government. At the January 1977 inaugural, he seemed near tears when his Democratic successor, Carter, turned to him and extended public thanks to the retiring president "for all he has done to heal our land."

Ford seemed at peace with himself as he left Washington late on Inauguration Day for Palm Springs, where he and his wife lived temporarily. They moved in March 1978 into a new home in Rancho Mirage, close to the desert golf courses he loved.

For a time, he held open the possibility he might run against Carter in 1980, but he abandoned the idea. He did, however, make frequent appearances at GOP fundraising events. He also collected substantial fees for speeches before business groups, served on several corporate boards and raised money for favorite charities. His activities slowed only after two total knee replacements.

The Fords usually spent winters at his California home and office, and summers at their home in Beaver Creek, Colo. The Gerald R. Ford Library was established on the University of Michigan campus in Ann Arbor. A separate Gerald R. Ford Museum was opened in Grand Rapids.

In recent years, however, Ford had struggled with health problems. The former president suffered two small strokes in 2000 and was hospitalized briefly in 2003 when he became dizzy on the golf course near his home in Rancho Mirage. He and his family did not go to the Ford home in Vail, Colo., for the Christmas 2004 holiday because his doctors did not want him to travel. Ford was also unable to accompany President Bush and former Presidents Bush and Clinton to the funeral of Pope John Paul II last year.

In January, he was admitted to the Eisenhower Medical Center in Rancho Mirage and stayed 12 days after experiencing what was described as pneumonia. Seven months later came the stay at the Mayo Clinic to have a cardiac pacemaker implanted.

Throughout retirement, Ford maintained a healthy sense of humor about one characteristic of his presidency — his portrayal as a stumbling chief executive who often fell on ski slopes and bumped his head on helicopter doors. "I've always been secure," he explained.

He even helped host two national seminars on "Humor and the Presidency." At one, comedian Chevy Chase paid him a tongue-in-cheek tribute by remarking that "while he was healing the country, he was usually hurting himself."

Ford's presidency may have been lackluster by many standards, yet his legacy was generally considered positive.

"Having inherited a nation preoccupied with Vietnam and Watergate — and in many respects both frustrated and disillusioned — Ford succeeded in refocusing the nation's energies on the future," said presidential scholar Roger B. Porter.

It is how the president himself had hoped to be judged — as a healer.

"I hope I am remembered as a president who took over in very tough, difficult times — the time of Watergate and Vietnam, when there was an awful lot of distrust for government in our country," Ford once said. "In two years I was able to heal most of the wounds — of the scandals and war — and restore public confidence in the presidency."

In addition to his wife and four children, Ford is survived by seven grandchildren, four great-grandchildren and a brother, Richard, of Grand Rapids.

Funeral services are planned for Washington, D.C., and Grand Rapids, along with public viewings in those cities and in Palm Desert. Details are to be announced today in Palm Desert.

Gerald R. Ford, 38th U.S. President, Dies (NYT)

By James M. Naughton And Adam Clymer

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

Former President Gerald R. Ford, who was thrust into the presidency in 1974 in the wake of the Watergate scandal but who lost his own bid for election after pardoning President Richard M. Nixon, has died, according to a statement issued late last night by his wife, Betty Ford.

He was 93, making him the longest living former president, surpassing Ronald Reagan, who died in 2004, by just over a month.

The statement did not give a cause, place or time of death, but Mr. Ford, the 38th president, had been in and out of the hospital since January 2006 when he suffered pneumonia, most recently in October at the Eisenhower Medical Center in Rancho Mirage, Calif., for medical tests. He returned to his home in Rancho Mirage after five days of hospitalization.

"My family joins me in sharing the difficult news that Gerald Ford, our beloved husband, father, grandfather and great grandfather has passed away at 93 years of age," Mrs. Ford said in a statement issued from her husband's office in Rancho Mirage, also the location of the Betty Ford Center. "His life was filled with love of God, his family and his country."

President Bush praised Mr. Ford for his contributions to the nation "in an hour of national turmoil and division," in a statement released early today from his ranch in Texas.

"With his quiet integrity, common sense, and kind instincts, President Ford helped heal our land and restore public confidence in the presidency," Mr. Bush said. "The American people will always admire Gerald Ford's devotion to duty, his personal character, and the honorable conduct of his administration."

Mr. Ford, who was the only person to lead the country without having been elected as president or vice president, occupied the White House for just 896 days — starting from a hastily arranged ceremony on Aug. 9, 1974, and ending after his defeat by Jimmy Carter in the 1976 election. But they were pivotal days of national introspection, involving America's first definitive failure in a war and the first resignation of a president.

After a decade of division over Vietnam and two years of trauma over the Watergate scandals, Jerry Ford, as he called himself, radiated a soothing familiarity. He might have been the nice guy down the street suddenly put in charge of the nation, and if he seemed a bit predictable, he was also safe, reliable and reassuring. He placed no intolerable intellectual or psychological burdens on a weary land, and he lived out a modest philosophy. "The harder you work, the luckier you are," he said once in summarizing his career. "I worked like hell."

Gerald Rudolph Ford was born on July 14, 1913, in Omaha to Leslie Lynch King and Dorothy Ayer King. He rose to House minority leader in 1963 and served in the House until 1973, when Vice President Spiro T. Agnew resigned, and President Nixon appointed Mr. Ford to succeed Mr. Agnew.

When Mr. Ford took the oath of president in 1974, the economy was in disarray, an energy shortage was worsening, allies were wondering how steadfast the United States might be as a partner and Mr. Nixon, having resigned rather than face impeachment for taking part in the Watergate cover-up, was flying to seclusion in San Clemente, Calif.

There was a collective sense of relief as Mr. Ford, in the most memorable line of his most noteworthy speech, declared that day, "Our long national nightmare is over."

Two years later, as he accepted the Republican presidential nomination and began a campaign that would end in his first failure in an election, Mr. Ford scarcely seemed to be indulging in hyperbole as he recalled what it had been like to take office as Mr. Nixon's heir.

"It was an hour in our history that troubled our minds and tore at our hearts," he said. "Anger and hatred had risen to dangerous levels, dividing friends and families. The polarization of our political order had aroused unworthy passions of reprisal and revenge. Our governmental system was closer to stalemate than at any time since Abraham Lincoln took that same oath of office."

The pardon, intensely unpopular at the time, came to be generally viewed as correct. In May 2001, Mr. Ford was honored with a "Profile in Courage" Award at the John F. Kennedy Library in Boston. Senator Edward M. Kennedy spoke and said he had originally opposed the pardon. "But time has a way of clarifying past events," he said, "and now we see that President Ford was right."

Mr. Ford's decision to back the 1975 Helsinki Accords was furiously criticized in 1976 by both Jimmy Carter and Ronald Reagan. They complained that it had legitimized the post-World War II borders in Europe. But in his book "The Cold War: A New History" (Penguin, 2005), John Lewis Gaddis of Yale wrote that the pact's commitment to "human rights and fundamental freedoms" became a trap for the Soviet Union, which was facing ever-bolder condemnations by dissidents.

"Thousands of people who lacked the prominence of Solzhenitsyn and Sakharov began to stand with them in holding the U.S.S.R. and its satellites accountable for human rights," Mr. Gaddis wrote. The Helsinki process, he added, became "the basis for legitimizing opposition to Soviet rule."

Mr. Ford also advanced negotiations for a new treaty to turn over control of the Panama Canal to Panama, though he slowed the process during the 1976 campaign and left it to Mr. Carter, his victorious Democratic opponent, to complete.

Both inflation and unemployment fell while he was in office. And he vigorously tried to control federal spending with vetoes of spending bills, starting his first week in office. In a matter of months, however, after the Democratic landslide in the 1974 elections, Congress began overriding his vetoes.

But that did not stop him from threatening to veto a measure, sought by Mayor Abraham D. Beame and Gov. Hugh Carey, offering a 90-day $1 billion line of credit to nearly bankrupt New York City in October 1975. "Ford to City: Drop Dead" was the front-page headline in The Daily News. The next month, the New York leaders went to Washington with a new plan with new controls on the city budget, and they got the short-term loans they needed.

Mr. Ford brought to his duties an indomitable self-assurance.

"I can recall no incident, either in the Congress, vice presidency or presidency, where I didn't feel that I was prepared," he said in retirement. "I felt more secure, more certain of myself in the presidency than at any other time."

His steadiness showed through as a timely presidential attribute, but it was always that way with Gerald Rudolph Ford Jr. He was a man more fundamental than flashy, more immutable than immodest. He served undefeated through 13 elections to the House of Representatives and rose to be its Republican leader, yet in 25 years in Congress he did not write a major piece of legislation. He was overwhelmingly confirmed as vice president, the first to be appointed under the 25th Amendment, yet he owed his selection by Mr. Nixon to the likelihood that he would prove inoffensive in the job.

As president, he was quick to assert to Congress, in a play on words that nobody misunderstood, "I am a Ford, not a Lincoln." If it was true, as was often said, that the Oval Office shaped the occupant, Mr. Ford resisted the temptation of the imperial. On an early trip as president to South Korea, he called American enlisted men "sir." His prose was so pedestrian and his tongue so unreliable — he referred on one public occasion to the noble American "work ethnic" and on another to the disease of "sickle-cell Armenia" — that he became a favorite target of comedians.

Acts of Forgiveness

"I think it's progress that the presidency has been humanized," Mr. Ford remarked a few days before he left the White House. It might easily have been an epitaph.

He had sought to bind up the nation's wounds as much by instinct as by design. One of his earliest acts, combining courage with forgiveness, was to announce before a convention of the Veterans of Foreign Wars that he favored leniency for Vietnam-era draft resisters.

When Congressional Democrats suggested that he had obtained Mr. Nixon's resignation by promising to pardon him, Mr. Ford did something presidents do not do: he went to Capitol Hill and testified, telling a House subcommittee, "There was no deal, period, under no circumstances."

He invited to the White House individuals who had been excluded as political "enemies" in the lists kept by the Nixon administration. When Mr. Ford heard, as a Republican in Congress, that Mr. Nixon kept such a list, he said to an aide, "Anybody who can't keep his enemies in his head has too many enemies."

His decision to grant a full and absolute pardon to his predecessor stunned the nation. After going to church the morning of Sept. 8, 1974, Mr. Ford went on national television to announce that there would be no formal judicial retribution against Mr. Nixon. Then, apparently untroubled by his decision, he played golf.

"I felt then, and I feel now, if I was going to do it, it had to be clean, sudden," Mr. Ford said months after he had left office. "It was a part of the healing process." He paused a moment, smiled, and added, "It didn't turn out to be quite as much of a healing at the time."

Revulsion and disillusion exploded in editorial comments and angry telegrams to the White House. Mr. Ford's biographer and friend, J. F. terHorst, resigned as White House press secretary rather than defend the pardon. For the rest of his term, Mr. Ford had to do the defending.

Those who were critical of the pardon, he said, "haven't thought through what would have happened over the next 18 months, 24 months, 36 months; that whole episode would have been on the front page."

He had expected some public criticism, he said, but it proved "far worse than I anticipated." He insisted, however, in his 1979 autobiography, "A Time to Heal" (Harper and Row), and in conversations in retirement, that had Mr. Nixon been required to face indictment and trial over the many months of the Ford presidency, "all of the healing process that I thought was so essential would have been much more difficult to achieve."

Hard Work, Honesty, Punctuality

Mr. Ford's early circumstances made him an unlikely future president. He was born July 14, 1913, in Omaha to Leslie Lynch King and Dorothy Ayer King. Not for 17 years was he to learn that he had been christened Leslie Lynch King Jr.

When he was 2 years old, his mother divorced Mr. King and moved to Grand Rapids, Mich. She remarried, and her husband, Gerald Rudolph Ford, a paint salesman with an eighth-grade education, gave the boy his name in formally adopting him.

Gerald considered his mother "a human dynamo in a womanly way" and said she "probably had more friends than any woman I ever knew." He revered his stepfather. Later in life, even in the White House, he would confront difficulty by wondering, "Now, how would he have done this?" It was perhaps the ultimate symptom of Mr. Ford's uncommon commonness that he would try to approach the presidency after the fashion of a Grand Rapids merchant. What he respected in his stepfather's manner was common sense.

His closeness to his stepfather was deepened, if anything, by the discovery that he was adopted and in particular by a brief encounter with his father.

It occurred at the age of 17, when he was a star on the state champion South High School Trojans football team, a 6-foot, blue-eyed blond with a husky voice and an infectious laugh. His mother and stepfather had told Mr. Ford that he was the product of a broken home, and the information did not appear to disturb him unduly. Mr. Ford went on with his schooling and, because the Ford Paint and Varnish Company was struggling to survive the Depression, with a job waiting on tables at Bill Skougis's Restaurant. One day a patron in the restaurant stared at him and then told him, "Leslie, I'm your father."

He was stunned.

Nearly half a century later, recalling the episode in an interview, Mr. Ford's words remained drenched in bitterness: "It was shocking, in that he would intrude on a happy family life after he had neglected my mother and me by his refusal to pay what the court ordered him to pay as child support."

In his 1994 biography of Mr. Ford, "Time and Chance" (HarperCollins), James Cannon wrote that Mr. King never paid the monthly child support ordered by an Omaha court after it found that he had beaten his wife, but that Mr. King's father did pay the money his son owed. Those payments stopped when the elder Mr. King died, Mr. Ford wrote in his autobiography.

His father, Mr. Ford said in the interview, had "abandoned me for 6, 8, 10 years — I have forgotten how long; then he would seek to intrude on my family life, which was a happy one with my stepfather."

"I really never forgave my father in a sense of totally forgiving," Mr. Ford said.

Traditional Values

The home in which the future president was brought up, along with his three stepbrothers, was imbued with the values of family loyalty, thrift and patriotism.

DOJ_NMG_0109203

On May Day one year, Mr. Ford and other students at South High saw another group of youths painting anti-American slogans on the steps leading to the school building. The group Mr. Ford was in, mostly football players, dashed over, grabbed the paint cans and, by one account, splashed the paint on the others.

Mr. Ford ran for president of the senior class in 1931 on, as he later used to recall with a laugh, the Progressive ticket. He lost, but he was never to lose another election until he sought a different presidency 45 years later as more of a conservative.

His basic philosophy involved fiscal prudence, strong national defense, suspicion of alien lands and a belief that citizens should earn a living rather than be given one. This, he said, was a legacy "from both my stepfather and my mother — hard-working, typical Middle Western individuals who had themselves been brought up in families that had comparable philosophical views."

"It was that environment plus, I think, my own instincts, which go back, I believe, to the fact that I always felt you had to work like hell," he continued. "I did. Whether I worked in the restaurant, whether I worked in scouting or whether I worked in school, I was always very conscientious."

He did well enough to win a scholarship to the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor. He applied himself with equal diligence to his studies and to football, and he worked as a dishwasher at the Delta Kappa Epsilon fraternity to help pay his room and board.

To Law School, Then to War

In those days, both his professional and athletic ambitions were mixed. He said decades later that "one of my great ambitions was to be captain of the Michigan football team," the Wolverines, in his senior year. But someone else was chosen as captain. Mr. Ford, a center, was instead selected by his teammates as the most valuable player; he was gratified, though he often joked of having been named most valuable member of a losing team.

After he graduated in 1935 from the University of Michigan, he had offers to play professional football for either the Detroit Lions or the Green Bay Packers (at $110 per game). Mr. Ford remained fascinated with sports, but he chose the law, a subject that had appealed to him since high school. He enrolled at Yale Law School.

Political opponents would ultimately fasten on Mr. Ford's sports background as a source of ridicule. President Lyndon B. Johnson, angered at a legislative development inspired by Representative Ford, cracked once that he had played football too long without a helmet. And despite his real skill at skiing and golf, a tumble on the slopes or a tee shot drive into a golf gallery would be seized on by the comedy show "Saturday Night Live" as a metaphor for a clumsy presidency.

If Mr. Ford's mental cast was more often instinctive than imaginative and his approach to issues more tactical than conceptual, he was no intellectual slouch. At Yale, Prof. Myres MacDougal wrote in interview notes on the young student: "Very mature, wise person of good judgment. Informational background not the best but interesting, mature and serious of purpose."

Initially, because he needed the income he earned as an assistant football coach and as a head boxing coach, Mr. Ford was so busy that he was not allowed to take law classes full time. He kept insisting he was capable of the dual schedule and was so persistent that he was allowed to become student and coach simultaneously in 1938. He finished in the top third of the class of 1941, with a B average.

He returned to Grand Rapids, and with a friend, Philip W. Buchen, who would later become his White House legal counsel, he set about establishing a practice specializing in labor-management matters. Shortly after the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, he joined the Navy as an ensign.

The war, more than anything else, was responsible for altering his outlook and inspiring him to pursue a career in public life.

At first, the Navy assigned him as a physical training officer to work with recruits on the grounds of the University of North Carolina. Mr. Ford kept applying for a transfer to a combat zone and kept being refused. Ever persistent, he applied anew and after a year of rejection was sent to the Pacific as a physical education officer on the U.S.S. Monterey, a light aircraft carrier.

By war's end he had risen to lieutenant commander and won 10 battle stars for participating in engagements at places including Okinawa, Wake, Taiwan, the Philippines and the Gilbert Islands. Just before Christmas in 1944, he nearly lost his life when a typhoon struck the Third Fleet and, topside on the carrier, he came within inches of being swept off the deck.

An Internationalist Takes Office

Mr. Ford never adopted the domestic liberalism of a Roosevelt or, later, a Johnson. But the war experience broadened his view, changing him "from a passive isolationist to an ardent internationalist," as he put it.

Having re-established himself in a comfortable law practice in Grand Rapids, Mr. Ford had a limited ambition at first. "I was 33, single, working and having a great time, playing lots of golf," he said later. "All I was interested in was enjoying life and getting on with my law practice."

But he kept reading a new magazine, World Report, to which he was a charter subscriber, and became an ever firmer advocate of the Marshall Plan of postwar assistance to Europe and an internationalist in a community of Dutch-origin conservative isolationists. He came to the attention of two forces: Republican reformers bent on taking control of the local party, and internationalists allied with Senator Arthur H. Vandenberg, the Republican leader, who was also from Grand Rapids.

The incumbent representative from the Fifth District of Michigan was Bartel J. Jonkman, who seemed tailored to the district — of Dutch descent, Republican, conservative, isolationist.

"I knew I was meeting a formidable incumbent," Mr. Ford later recalled, "who for many reasons should have won. And I shouldn't have expected to win." Typically, Mr. Ford did expect to win, though, and with but a smidgen of apprehension that the challenge might be taken up, he dared Mr. Jonkman to debate. "Fortunately, he did not," Mr. Ford said.

Aided by President Harry S. Truman's disputes with Congress, which kept Mr. Jonkman in Washington, Mr. Ford worked tirelessly and won the Republican primary in 1948 by nearly 10,000 votes. Then he easily won his first term in the House. He never received less than 60 percent of the vote during a quarter-century as the Representative from Michigan's Fifth District.

A Candid Helpmate

Shortly before the 1948 election, Mr. Ford paused from his campaigning to march down the aisle of Grace Episcopal Church in Grand Rapids — by local legend, wearing one black shoe and one brown shoe — with Elizabeth Bloomer Warren, who had been divorced and was generally regarded as the most attractive single woman in the city.

Betty Ford had been a model and a fashion coordinator. For two years, in New York City, she had danced in Martha Graham's troupe. She was, and remained throughout Mr. Ford's public career, a remarkably open and candid woman, given to strong opinions on abortion, feminism and other issues and willing to talk about the radical mastectomy she underwent while in the White House. She encouraged the same outspokenness in the four Ford children: Michael Gerald, John Gardner, Steven Meigs and Susan Elizabeth.

Mrs. Ford also battled drug dependency, which began in the 1960s with prescriptions for pills to relieve pain from a neck injury, and alcoholism, which grew with her loneliness during Mr. Ford's increasingly heavy travel schedule. In 1978, her family confronted her about her addictions, and, after initial denials, she finally admitted herself for treatment. Four years later, she helped dedicate the Betty Ford Center for Drug and Alcohol Rehabilitation in Rancho Mirage, Calif., on the campus of Eisenhower Medical Center.

While Mrs. Ford reared their children, Mr. Ford rose doggedly from the obscurity of the House to the leadership of its minority. In his second term he won assignment to the Appropriations Committee, where he and other fiscal conservatives worked to curb government spending. By 1953 he was on such influential subcommittees as those dealing with funds for foreign aid and national defense; throughout the Korean and Vietnam Wars he was a stalwart supporter of American military intervention in Asia.

In the House

Bud Vestal, a reporter for The Grand Rapids Press, distressed Mr. Ford by noting in a biography that Mr. Ford "never authored a major program of legislation on his own."

Mr. Ford's explanation was that as a member of the Appropriations Committee, he "was pretty preoccupied with very important matters" and "didn't have time, just as a pragmatic thing, to get involved in all the other pieces of legislation that others were writing or sponsoring or working for."

His legislative activity more often than not involved fealty to Republican Presidents Eisenhower and Nixon or obstruction of the liberal New Frontier and Great Society proposals of Democratic Presidents Kennedy and Johnson. For instance, Mr. Ford voted against a major housing assistance act in 1961 and fostered opposition to the Medicare program in 1965.

In a Congress that often seemed akin to a fraternity, he was nearly everyone's friend. He was thus an ideal prospect for minority leadership. When younger Republicans were casting about in 1963 for a point man in their rebellion against their aging leaders, they settled on Jerry Ford.

The group installed Mr. Ford as chairman of the House Republican Conference, the third-ranking post in the minority hierarchy. His name came to more prominent attention later that year when President Johnson appointed Mr. Ford to the Warren Commission to investigate the assassination of President John F. Kennedy. In 1965, after the huge loss that came with Senator Barry Goldwater's landslide defeat for the presidency the year before, the younger Republicans deposed Charles A. Halleck of Indiana as their House leader, supplanting him with Mr. Ford.

'I Need Your Vote'

With the exception of an ill-conceived effort in 1970 to impeach Associate Justice William O. Douglas, a liberal member of the Supreme Court, after Senate Democrats had twice rejected President Nixon's nominations of Southern conservatives to the court, Mr. Ford generally enlarged his circle of friends by establishing an amicable style of leadership.

When one or another Republican voted against the leadership's wishes, some party stalwarts sought to persuade Mr. Ford to discipline the offender. There were methods that might have been used: transfer to a minor committee, elimination of funds for overseas travel, loss of campaign money. Mr. Ford said no.

"That's counterproductive," he insisted. "That person knows that he disappointed you. To rub it in makes it, the next time, literally impossible to get his cooperation. You can lose one battle, but the most important thing is to win the war."

A leading House Democrat of the era, Representative Joe D. Waggoner Jr. of Louisiana, confirmed the technique's success. "It's the damnedest thing," Mr. Waggoner said. "Jerry just puts his arm around a colleague or looks him in the eyes and says, 'I need your vote,' and gets it."

An Elusive Dream

Visionary or not, Mr. Ford, as Republican House leader, worked to enlarge the minority, always pursuing the elusive dream of a Republican majority and, with it, the realization of his greatest political ambition, to be speaker of the House.

Asked in his retirement why he had coveted the speaker's post, he replied:

"I thought, as a member of Congress, that would be the ultimate achievement. To sit up there and be the head honcho of 434 other people and have the responsibility, aside from the achievement, of trying to run the greatest legislative body in the history of mankind, I think, in an efficient and effective way, to tend to the people's business, both domestic and foreign, to make sure, whatever legislation was required, to see that it was done. I think I got that ambition within a year or two after I was in the House of Representatives."

For a decade he crisscrossed the country, downing chicken dinners in 200 or so cities each year, extolling this or that prospect for a House seat and trying diligently to build a majority. But the closest the Republicans came in his years as leader was the 192 seats they held after the 1968 elections. That was still 16 short of the majority that would have made him speaker.

Apparently destined to be the perennial leader of a minority, Mr. Ford promised his wife in 1973 that he would make one more effort, however forlorn, in 1974 at winning a majority and would then retire from politics in 1976.

"I don't want to be a minority leader in perpetuity," he told friends.

'A Nice Conclusion'

On the night of Oct. 10, 1973, a few hours after Vice President Spiro T. Agnew rose in a federal courtroom in Baltimore to plead no contest to a charge of federal income tax evasion and simultaneously resigned the vice presidency, Mr. Ford was at his home in Alexandria, Va., trying to relax. The telephone rang; it was his old House ally Melvin Laird, now a White House counselor. Would Mr. Ford be interested in the vice presidency if it could be arranged, Mr. Laird asked.

"I suspect if I was asked, I would accept it," Mr. Ford replied.

He turned from the phone, he later recalled, and told Mrs. Ford that "well, that would be a nice conclusion" for his career.

The next night President Nixon was the one who telephoned Mr. Ford's home. He offered the vice presidency.

It was the first time that anyone had been nominated for the office under the terms of the 25th Amendment, which made the appointment subject to confirmation by both the Senate and the House. Much as Republicans had fixed on Mr. Ford as leader in 1965 because of his general acceptability, so Mr. Nixon chose him in 1973 to be vice president.

DOJ_NMG_0109206

At the time, in late 1973, Mr. Nixon was locked in a legal duel with the Watergate special prosecutor and the Senate Watergate committee, refusing to yield documents and tape recordings that had been subpoenaed. Indeed, a few days after Mr. Ford was nominated for the vice presidency, Mr. Nixon dismissed Archibald Cox, the first special prosecutor, for insisting on pursuing legal remedies to gain access to the White House evidence, and accepted the resignation of Attorney General Elliot L. Richardson, who declined to carry out the order to dismiss the prosecutor.

'I Believed What I Was Told'

There were Nixon allies who thought Mr. Ford might, as vice president, serve as a buffer against the efforts to impeach Mr. Nixon that were precipitated by the events of that "Saturday night massacre" in October 1973. Mr. Nixon remarked once to former Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller of New York, "Can you see Gerald Ford sitting in this chair?"

Mr. Ford accepted the nomination. "I thought," he later reminisced, "well, if I could be helpful, I knew I could be confirmed. And it was a nice way to end a career. I wasn't going to be speaker."

He took it on faith, because he had been told privately by Mr. Nixon and others that the president was innocent of any involvement in the burglary at the Democratic Party offices in the Watergate complex on June 17, 1972, or of complicity in the attempt to cover up the extent of the conspiracy.

Three days after the break-in, Mr. Ford had asked John N. Mitchell, the former attorney general and the 1972 Nixon campaign chairman, if the break-in had been authorized. As Mr. Ford recalled it, Mr. Mitchell "looked me right in the eye and said neither he nor the White House was involved."

"I believed what I was told," Mr. Ford once said, referring to the belief that Mr. Nixon was not involved in Watergate wrongdoing, "so my whole conduct as vice president was predicated on that personal trust."

Because it was the first such occasion, Mr. Ford's vice-presidential nomination prompted an extensive investigation of his background by as many as 400 agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. His nomination was confirmed, 92 to 3 in the Senate and 387 to 35 in the House. At dusk on Dec. 6, 1973, to the thunderous applause of those with whom he had served in Congress, he strode down the center aisle in the House of Representatives to stand at the lectern, not as speaker but as vice president.

Mr. Ford took it upon himself as the heir apparent to try, initially, to make certain that Mr. Nixon would remain in office. In the eight months of his vice presidency he traveled more than 130,000 miles to speak up for Mr. Nixon.

As the House Judiciary Committee painstakingly assembled evidence on which its members would ultimately recommend three articles of impeachment, Mr. Ford proclaimed confidence in Mr. Nixon's blamelessness, but privately he grew increasingly uncertain.

Growing Skepticism

The doubt was slow to take hold. In January 1974 Mr. Ford told an audience in Atlantic City that the impeachment movement was the work of "extreme partisans" who were trying to "crush the president" and in the process increase the Democratic majority in the Congress.

Alarmed, Mr. Buchen, Mr. Ford's old friend from Michigan, and Senator Robert P. Griffin, another longtime Michigan ally, privately counseled Mr. Ford to be careful lest his faith be unrewarded and his loyalty further divide the country.

Thereafter, Mr. Ford loyally defended the president, but in his own words. The Nixon staff kept sending proposed texts to Mr. Ford's office, but Mr. Ford's aides toned them down.

Instinctively, too, Mr. Ford continuously and openly urged the president to demonstrate his innocence by yielding to Congress and the courts the Watergate tape recordings and documents that were being sought. When Mr. Nixon continued to "stonewall," as the resistance came to be known, "it certainly began to raise some reservations" in Mr. Ford's mind, he said, although he kept them to himself.

Gradually, even Mr. Ford's defense of Mr. Nixon began to take a skeptical tone. At a Republican Party conference in Chicago, Mr. Ford explicitly attacked for the first time the attitude of the 1972 Nixon campaign organization, saying it had been led by "an arrogant, elite guard of political adolescents."

'A Good Night's Sleep'

At the end of July 1974, Gen. Alexander M. Haig Jr., then the White House chief of staff, made an urgent call to the vice president. General Haig advised him that a tape recording under subpoena by the special prosecutor — one of several that the Supreme Court had ruled could not be withheld by Mr. Nixon — would show conclusively that Mr. Nixon had tried to curb the Watergate investigation as early as June 23, 1972, six days after the break-in.

"That was the first concrete evidence that I had contrary to the assurances I'd had before," Mr. Ford remembered.

For three days, as Mr. Nixon's aides sought to persuade the president to make public the transcript of the June 23 tape, Mr. Ford continued to travel, saying nothing of the evidence.

The president did publish it. Although Mr. Ford was unaware that Mr. Buchen and others had begun making secret preparations for a Ford presidential transition, he began to wonder in the first days of August 1974 how soon he might be president.

On Aug. 6, Mr. Nixon assembled his Cabinet at the White House and declared that he would not resign. Mr. Ford, seated opposite the president across the massive Cabinet table, told Mr. Nixon, "I no longer can publicly defend you." It was, for Mr. Ford, the loyal friend of the president, one of the most difficult things he had ever done, but, he told an interviewer, "with the development of the evidence, I had no other choice."

Two nights later Mr. Nixon announced on national television that he would resign the presidency at noon on Aug. 9.

Mr. Ford and his wife watched the Nixon statement on the television set in the family room of their home in Alexandria. Then, despite the looming accumulation of pressures, Mr. Ford went to sleep.

That he could do so, with no particular difficulty, on the eve of the nation's most unusual presidential transition, was illustrative. "My feeling is you might as well get to sleep" whatever the circumstances, Mr. Ford had said. "You'll feel better the next day. If you've got a problem, you are better prepared to deal with it tomorrow. You sure can't do much about it that night. It's a blessing, really."

The nation's torment was on his mind as he spoke that next day, Aug. 9, 1974, of the import of his sudden inauguration as the 38th president of the United States, the first person never elected president or vice president to become president.

"I am acutely aware that you have not elected me as your president by your ballots," he said to the dignitaries in the East Room of the White House and to the millions of Americans watching on television. "I have not sought this enormous responsibility, but I will not shirk it."

With an empathy that came as a relief after months of White House aloofness, the new president said: "This is an hour of history that troubles our minds and hurts our hearts. Therefore, I feel it my first duty to make an unprecedented compact with my countrymen. Not an inaugural address. Not a fireside chat. Not a campaign speech. Just a little straight talk among friends."

He urged his countrymen to help him "bind up the internal wounds of Watergate" and then added:

"My fellow Americans, our long national nightmare is over. Our Constitution works. Our great republic is a government of laws and not of men. Here, the people rule."

The Man in the White House

Mr. Ford's presidency was an extension of his own political personality: reactive rather than activist, instinctive instead of intellectual, humanistic but within the fiscal limits of conservative dogma.

Mr. terHorst, the biographer, puzzled over the seeming contradiction between the president's personal and professional philosophies: "The problem with him — he doesn't like to be kidded about it — but the fact is, this guy would, if he saw a schoolkid in front of the White House who needed clothing, if he was the right size, he'd give him the shirt off his back, literally. Then he'd go right in the White House and veto the school lunch bill."

John Hersey, after spending a week in close observation of the president, wrote in The New York Times Magazine of April 20, 1975: "What is it in him?"

"Is it an inability to extend compassion far beyond the faces directly in view?" Mr. Hersey wrote. "Is it a failure of imagination? Is it something obdurate he was born with, alongside the energy and serenity?"

The answer seemed to be a belief — one Mr. Ford was schooled in if not born with — in the essential dignity of human struggle. "Everything didn't turn to gold just because I did it," he remarked. "I had this foundation, and I had been brought up with the training that — and this is an oversimplification, but I think it's indicative — the harder you work, the luckier you are. And whether it was in such things as the Boy Scouts or athletics or academics, I worked like hell."

There were those who contended, as did Richard Reeves, the author of a critical biography, that Mr. Ford had a "tragic gap" in his understanding of such crucial matters as the Vietnam War and the Watergate scandal. More common was the assessment of Mr. Ford as "innately decent."

Executive Decisions

Mr. Ford disputed the notion that it required forceful, even harsh, character to meet the tests of the White House. He was asked once if a nice guy should be president, and answered: "Those who allege that you've got to be a mean, sinister, devious person to be president are just dead wrong. I don't see how a president in his conscience could be that."

He, too, could be forceful. He resented the accident of fate that had made him president as the nation watched South Vietnam and Cambodia — where so much of America's human and economic treasure had been spent by three predecessors — fall to the Communists in 1975. Rebuffed by Congress when he sought a last-minute $972 million in aid to Saigon, Mr. Ford made it possible for 130,000 or more refugees to come to the United States.

When the Cambodian Communists seized the American merchant ship Mayaqüez in May 1975, Mr. Ford reacted with uncharacteristic emotion, sending United States military forces to recapture the ship.

The order was motivated in part by concern for national image. "We had just pulled out of Vietnam, out of Cambodia," Mr. Ford said later, "and here the United States was being challenged by a group of leaders who were bandits and outlaws, in my opinion, and I think their subsequent record has pretty well proved it. And it was an emotional decision to tell the Defense Department we had to go in there and do something."

Mr. Ford's economic policies were traditional for Republican conservatives. He proclaimed, amid considerable White House ballyhoo, a campaign to "Whip Inflation Now," complete with "WIN" buttons. Scarcely had it begun than mounting joblessness and the worst recession since the 1930s caused Mr. Ford to abandon the anti-inflation program and propose tax cuts to stimulate the economy instead of tax increases to dampen it.

Congress, meanwhile, reflected its dominance by the Democratic Party in a steadily increasing number of spending programs and expansion of the federal deficit.

Difficult Dismissals

In what may have been his most difficult personal decision — because it went against the grain of his personality — the genial man from Michigan also acted forcefully in his dismissal of Secretary of Defense James R. Schlesinger.

There were no known policy differences of consequence between Mr. Ford and Mr. Schlesinger. But their styles and characters never quite proved compatible, and the defense secretary, a bookish and occasionally dogmatic intellectual who later became secretary of energy to President Jimmy Carter, got on the president's nerves.

"There was a tension," Mr. Ford acknowledged later. "There was a personality problem." Mr. Schlesinger, he emphasized, "is an honorable, decent person, but our chemistry doesn't fit." He did not need to add but did, "I'm not one that likes to fire people."

Nonetheless, Mr. Ford did make another central personnel decision that troubled him: jettisoning Vice President Rockefeller from his 1976 campaign ticket. Mr. Ford did so even though he had declared, in nominating the former New York governor to be his vice president, that there was no one else in the country so well equipped to stand next in the line of presidential succession.

Mr. Ford eventually decided to seek a full term as president, something he had intimated in his testimony to Congress as nominee for vice president that he would be loath to do. He decided that a lame-duck president could not be effective in a political role. Besides, although he did not like to admit it, Mr. Ford and his wife, Betty, had grown to like the perquisites of the White House.

As a candidate to succeed himself — and, he hoped, thus legitimize his accidental presidency — Mr. Ford grew politically timid. It was apparent that he would be challenged for the Republican nomination by Mr. Reagan, the former governor of California and a politician far more conservative than Mr. Ford.

Mr. Ford responded by becoming ever more conservative in his political statements and by undertaking the same sort of aggressive, energetic campaigning as an incumbent that had marked his campaigns as a member of the House of Representatives. From early 1975 until the summer of 1976, Mr. Ford traveled from one corner of the country to another. Even two attempts on his life by unbalanced women in California in 1975 did not deter him.

On one of those trips, to Sacramento on Sept. 5, he narrowly escaped an assassination attempt by Lynette (Squeaky) Fromme, who had been a follower of the convicted killer Charles Manson. Mr. Ford was moving through a crowd in Capitol Park, shaking hands and waving, when a Secret Service agent saw Ms. Fromme's arm and the pistol. She was subdued, and it turned out that while the gun was loaded there was no bullet in the chamber. She was convicted of attempted murder and sentenced to life in prison.

The other attempt, by Sara Jane Moore, took place in San Francisco. A former Marine, Oliver W. Sipple, knocked a pistol out of Ms. Moore's hand as she fired.

By the time Mr. Ford narrowly won the Republican nomination in Kansas City, Mo., in August 1976, he seemed to many of his political advisers to have diminished the value of his incumbency by traveling so extensively as to seem only another candidate. He was more than 25 percentage points behind the Democratic nominee, Mr. Carter, in the opinion polls. The economy was improving but not good. The Republicans' identification with Mr. Nixon remained.

Mr. Ford reassessed the situation with his advisers. Together they altered his political strategy and style. He spent most of the campaign period hunched over his desk or greeting guests in the Rose Garden of the White House, trying to reinforce the image of incumbency and to stress his claims to having achieved "peace, prosperity and trust."

Strides, Then a Stumble

In one of the most remarkable political comebacks in presidential campaign history, Mr. Ford nearly overcame adversity and odds. One late stumble, insisting in a debate that "there is no Soviet domination of Eastern Europe" and that Poland was not "dominated by the Soviet Union," halted the Ford surge.

In the end, his loss to Mr. Carter, the former Georgia governor, was narrow, by only 1,682,970 votes. Mr. Ford had 48 percent and Mr. Carter 50.1 percent.

But neither Poland nor a last-minute bit of bad economic news was central to his defeat. The Nixon pardon was.

Stuart Spencer, his campaign manager, said that polling data about the pardon had made it clear that "it cost him the election." He said 7 percent of Republicans had either voted for Mr. Carter or stayed home because of the pardon, and it hurt with Democrats and independents, too.

Robert S. Strauss, who was Democratic National Chairman in 1976, agreed. He said Mr. Ford "was never forgiven for it."

"People always assumed there was a deal, even though there was no evidence of one," Mr. Strauss said.

Even so, Mr. Ford's political recovery, although incomplete, reflected a positive aspect of his brief presidency. It indicated the extent to which he seemed to have re-established a sense of trustworthiness in the nation's most visible and symbolic office.

One political aide said of those who voted for Mr. Ford, "They're voting for something solid — a simple, honest, decent man."

After the White House

In the years after he left the White House, Mr. Ford took on two new roles, senior statesman and newly arrived millionaire, with his characteristic easygoing manner and energy. He had become something of a one-man academic, political and business enterprise, and by 1983 his income was estimated to be more than $1 million a year.

Mr. Ford frequently criticized President Carter on economic and defense matters, but the attacks on his successor never grew bitter or personal. On some foreign policy issues, like the Panama Canal treaties, which his own administration had quietly sought, he supported his successor.

For three years Mr. Ford contemplated another race for the presidency. In 1975, he had told aides in the White House that "Reagan would be a disaster" as president. After Mr. Reagan won the 1980 New Hampshire primary, Mr. Ford told The New York Times that it would be "impossible" for Mr. Reagan to win a general election, and he cautiously invited Republicans to ask him to run again.

But the draft he invited never came, and Mr. Reagan cruised to the nomination. When the Republicans gathered in Detroit in 1980 to nominate Mr. Reagan, he asked Mr. Ford to be his running mate.

For hours, representatives of the two men, with former Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger acting for Mr. Ford, negotiated the outlines of a possible Reagan-Ford Administration, in which Mr. Ford would have been given extensive authority in making appointments and managing the executive branch. But the negotiators were unable to reach a formula that satisfied Mr. Ford's desire to be more than a traditional vice president while also giving Mr. Reagan a free hand to govern as chief executive.

Mr. Ford nevertheless worked on the 1980 campaign trail for Mr. Reagan and his running mate, George Bush. Two months after the inauguration, Mr. Reagan sent Mr. Ford as his representative to China to reassure leaders there that Washington wished to continue improving relations.

The next October, after President Anwar el-Sadat of Egypt was assassinated, Mr. Ford represented the United States at the funeral along with the two other living former presidents, Mr. Carter and Mr. Nixon.

For many years after he left office, Mr. Ford campaigned for Republican candidates. In the first few years, those appearances had to be accompanied by hefty charitable donations to his library and museum. He also continued to warn, "If we get way over on the hard right of the political spectrum, we will not elect a Republican President," as he put it in a Times interview in 1998. He singled out the abortion issue, saying he was disappointed that his own "strongly pro-choice" views no longer seemed welcome in his party.

In August 2000, Mr. Ford appeared at the Republican convention in Philadelphia but was hospitalized for a week after a stroke.

As a result of Mr. Ford's new income, the Fords enjoyed a way of life that contrasted with their modest existence when he was a congressman, establishing homes in Rancho Mirage, in the California desert, and at Vail, in the Colorado mountains.

In addition to attending fund-raising functions, teaching at the University of Michigan and giving 30 paid speeches a year, Mr. Ford bought interests in two Colorado radio stations and served on the boards of at least eight corporations.

He also supervised and participated in sporting events, mostly golf, including an invitational golf tournament bearing his name in Vail; promoted a Southern California real estate development; and helped advertise a commercially minted coin set commemorating the presidency. He even made his acting debut at the age of 70, portraying himself on an episode of the nighttime television soap opera "Dynasty."

Asked in a 1978 interview about his life in retirement, Mr. Ford said that he was having trouble with chipping and putting in his golf game, but otherwise, "everything is wonderful."

Ford Dies At 93 (USAT)

By Bill Nichols And Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, December 27, 2006

Former president Gerald R. Ford, who inherited the daunting task of calming a divided nation when he assumed the presidency at the height of the Watergate scandal, died Tuesday at the age of 93.

"My family joins me in sharing the difficult news that Gerald Ford, our beloved husband, father, grandfather and great grandfather has passed away at 93 years of age," said his wife, Betty, in a brief statement issued from her husband's office in Rancho Mirage, Calif.

"His life was filled with love of God, his family and his country."

He was the longest-living president, followed by Ronald Reagan, who also died at 93. Ford had been living at his desert home in Rancho Mirage, east of Los Angeles.

The statement did not say where Ford died or the cause of death. Ford had battled pneumonia in January 2006 and underwent two heart treatments — including an angioplasty — in August at the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn.

A 13-term congressman from Michigan who rose to the post of House minority leader, Ford was vice president when Richard Nixon resigned the presidency in 1974 because of the Watergate controversy.

President Bush issued a statement early today saying he and Laura "are greatly saddened" by Ford's death.

"He assumed the presidency in an hour of national turmoil and division," Bush said. "With his quiet integrity, common sense and kind instincts, President Ford helped heal our land and restore public confidence in the presidency."

As the 38th president, Ford, who enjoyed a reputation for integrity on both sides of the political aisle, immediately tried to soothe the wounded nation. "The long national nightmare is over," he said as he was sworn in on Aug. 9, 1974. "Our Constitution works."

Although Ford's approval ratings initially soared, he would lose the 1976 presidential contest to former Georgia governor Jimmy Carter — largely, in the view of historians and his biographers, because he pardoned Nixon just months after being sworn in to office.

The pardon ignited a political firestorm and prompted Democrats to question whether Nixon had made a deal with Ford to protect him from prosecution. Ford resolutely denied that there was any quid pro quo.

Ford's pardon "weakened his political capital and made Democrats more willing to resist him," says Yanek Mieczkowski, a Ford biographer who teaches history at Dowling College. He says the pardon was like a "ghost that hung over Ford and his party for the rest of the decade."

Ford remains the only unelected U.S. president. He said he did not regret his decision to pardon Nixon.

"There was such venom toward Nixon for Watergate that the public just didn't understand there was something (to be considered) over and above Nixon's personal problems," Ford said in 2003. "My problem was trying to restore public confidence across the board."

In 1999, Ford was awarded the Presidential Medal of Freedom by President Clinton, who said of him: "The respect he commands has grown in the years since he left office. … President Ford represents what is best in public service and what is best about America."

An endearing bumbler

Ford's public persona during his presidency was as a mangler of the English language who had a tendency toward verbal and physical stumbles. Comedian Chevy Chase, in Saturday Night Live's early years, made a name for himself mocking Ford's ineloquence, such as when he declared in a 1976 debate with Carter that: "There is no Soviet dominance of Eastern Europe."

His friends, family and staffers, however, contended that this former star football player and son of Michigan possessed the right blend of heartland decency and reverence for his country to be able to steady the nation after the morass of Watergate and the reverberations of the Vietnam War.

To his family, colleagues and historians, his presidency — even his pardon of Nixon — illustrated his central traits: decisiveness, decency and concern for country first.

"People are coming around to the idea that his pardon of Nixon was the right thing to do for the country," daughter Susan Ford said. "He knew it then. Leadership and decency are the things that stand out in my mind when I think of my dad."

Ron Nessen, Ford's press secretary, says that Ford, the only Eagle Scout ever to become president, was the right man at the right time for America.

"The nation was so torn apart by Watergate," Nessen says. "People had lost faith in the presidency. Ford just started knitting things back together. Plus, he seemed like the guy next door because that's what he was. He wasn't Richard Nixon."

An American life

Ford was born Leslie Lynch King Jr. on July 14, 1913, in Omaha. His father, an alcoholic, threatened his mother with a knife just after his birth, and she moved her 2-week-old son to Grand Rapids, Mich., to live with her parents.

Three years later, she married Gerald Ford, a paint salesman. The Fords called their son Gerald, and in 1935, Leslie King changed his name to Gerald Ford.

"He was not raised with a silver spoon in his mouth by any means," Susan Ford said. "There's something to be said for growing up that way. I wouldn't call him frugal, but he'll pay in cash or he won't buy it."

During summers, he filled paint cans at his father's store. And in his college years at the University of Michigan, Ford held a variety of jobs, including summer stints as a park ranger at Yellowstone National Park and as a model. Ford and his then-girlfriend, Phyllis Brown, appeared on the cover of Cosmopolitan magazine in 1942.

Chase and other comedians in the 1970s parodied Ford as clumsy. His legendarily wayward drives on the golf course prompted Bob Hope to wisecrack: "It's not hard to find Jerry Ford on a golf course — you just follow the wounded."

But the jokes belied elite athletic ability. Ford played football and basketball and ran track in high school, earning all-city and all-state honors as a star center in football. He went on to star on national championship football teams at the University of Michigan in 1932 and '33. He received offers to play professionally from the Green Bay Packers and Detroit Lions.

He turned down those offers to coach boxing and football and study law at Yale University. Among those under his football tutelage: future senators Robert Taft Jr. of Ohio and William Proxmire of Wisconsin.

"He probably had the most athletic background of any president," says presidential historian Fred Greenstein of Princeton University.

The Washington years

A year after earning his law degree from Yale in 1941, Ford joined the Navy and served aboard the USS Monterey in the South Pacific, including the allied assaults on Wake Island and Okinawa. He was discharged as a lieutenant commander in 1946 and later said that his experience in the war prompted him to become an internationalist rather than adopting the pre-war tendency of Republicans to support keeping the United States in isolation from the rest of the world.

Ford returned to Grand Rapids and joined a law firm. In 1948, he challenged the isolationist congressman in his home district, won the Republican nomination and got 61% in the general election.

During the campaign, he married Elizabeth Bloomer Warren. She was divorced, a dancer and a fashion consultant for a department store.

Ford represented the Grand Rapids area in Congress from 1949 to 1973. He described himself as a "moderate in domestic affairs, an internationalist in foreign affairs and a conservative in fiscal policy," according to his official biography.

He rose through the ranks to become House minority leader in 1965, leading GOP opposition to President Lyndon Johnson's social programs and urging Johnson to escalate the bombing in Vietnam. Johnson said Ford was a "nice guy, but he played too much football with his helmet off."

In 1963, Johnson appointed Ford to the Warren Commission, which had been charged with investigating President Kennedy's assassination. It found that Lee Harvey Oswald had acted alone and not as part of a conspiracy.

Throughout his career, Ford was widely seen as a decent, honorable man. "He was someone who was regarded as wholesome, unpretentious," Greenstein says. "He had a long, responsible public career."

The accidental president

A friend of Nixon, Ford backed his successful presidential campaigns in 1968 and 1972. In 1973, Nixon chose him to replace Vice President Spiro Agnew, who had resigned after pleading no contest to charges of tax evasion.

By then the Watergate scandal had erupted. It began with men working for Nixon's re-election campaign attempting to plant wiretaps at Democratic National Committee campaign headquarters in the Watergate hotel and office complex in Washington. The attempted coverup culminated in impeachment proceedings against Nixon and his resignation on Aug. 9, 1974. That same day, Ford became the 38th president.

Thirty days later, on Sept. 8, Ford announced his decision to pardon Nixon after attending historic St. John's Episcopal Church by himself that morning. Of the Nixons, Ford told the country: "Theirs is an American tragedy in which we have all played a part. It could go on and on and on, or someone must write the end to it. I have concluded that only I can do that, and if I can, I must."

Ford acknowledged that he badly misjudged the public outcry over his decision, and fallout continued through his two years in office. His first press secretary, Jerald terHorst, resigned. Speculation grew so rampant of a deal between Nixon and Ford that Ford took the unprecedented step of testifying under oath on the matter to the House Judiciary Committee in October 1974.

He never really outran the shadow of Watergate, but Ford moved on to concentrate on the faltering economy, which was in recession and plagued by the 1973 Arab oil embargo. Ford negotiated bills with the Democratic Congress to cut taxes and deregulate some industries, but he was also remembered for vetoing more bills — 66 — than all but three other presidents.

"Ford was very proud of the veto strategy," says Mieczkowski, the biographer. "Democrats thought it was government by impasse, but Ford viewed it as one of the great accomplishments of his entire presidency."

In foreign policy, Ford continued the diplomatic policy of detente with the Soviet Union. In 1975, the war in Vietnam ended with the fall of the South Vietnamese government.

Ford also displayed an eye for talent. He chose Dick Cheney as his chief of staff, Donald Rumsfeld as his Defense secretary and Alan Greenspan as chairman of his council of economic advisers. All would go on to serve in subsequent administrations.

"It was a White House that was an incubator for later presidencies," Princeton's Greenstein says.

Inside the White House, Ford's family made news. In 1974, Betty Ford was diagnosed with breast cancer. She acknowledged it publicly, which was rare at the time.

Later, she would admit to alcoholism and prescription-pill addiction. The Betty Ford Center in Rancho Mirage, Calif., was established to treat those with drug and alcohol addictions.

Ford faced other crises. On two trips to California in September 1975, he was the target of assassination attempts. Lynette "Squeaky" Fromme and Sara Jane Moore went to prison for the assaults. Ford was not struck either time.

The pressure and trappings of the office didn't change Ford as a man, says Nessen, Ford's press secretary.

"If you spend 20 years of your life running for president, it changes your personality," Nessen says. "His personality did not have those distortions built into it. He never expected to be president, he didn't want to be. He's a very down-to-earth guy."

By 1976, Ford had a tough primary race for his party's nomination. He beat Ronald Reagan and chose Kansas Sen. Bob Dole as his running mate.

But a tougher test awaited in Carter. Watergate and the Nixon pardon shadowed Ford's campaign, as did his debate stumble about Eastern Europe in a key debate with Carter. "His staff let him down," Nessen says. "We should have acknowledged the mistake. It did, I think, contribute to an unfair image of him not being very bright."

Even so, Nessen says an increase in unemployment before the election probably was a greater factor in Ford's loss to Carter.

Ford left office in January 1977.

In retirement, Ford lectured and hosted public policy conferences. Until recently, he attended annual reunions of Ford administration alumni in Washington.

From Carter to President Bush, occupants of the Oval Office have hailed his counsel and good judgment. After Carter's loss to Ronald Reagan in 1980, he and Ford took to the speaking circuit together and became what Ford described in a 2001 speech to Congress as "very warm and dear friends."

The Ford Presidency (LAT)

GERALD R. FORD WAS the regular-guy president. Friendly and unassuming, Ford, whose death at 93 was announced Tuesday, came into office after the Watergate affair forced out Richard Nixon. Ford's openness and humanity was a refreshing contrast to the icy awkwardness and extensive covering up of his predecessor.

"Our long national nightmare is over," Ford proclaimed memorably on the day he assumed office. He and his wife Betty immediately telegraphed a more affable mood in Washington. Ford engendered a more candid relationship with reporters and a less combative stance toward Congress, where he had served for 25 years in the House representing Grand Rapids, Mich., including eight years as minority leader.

Two accidents of history propelled Ford to the presidency. After Vice President Spiro Agnew resigned in 1973, Nixon wanted a loyal No. 2, someone who could win easy approval in Congress and, some historians suggest, a man whose lack of presidential bearing might blunt the efforts that were brewing to remove Nixon. Ten months later, Nixon was out, and for the first time in U.S. history, a man who had never run for president or vice president became commander in chief.

In his two-plus years as president, Ford faced a tortuous gamut of foreign and domestic challenges, including the communist takeover of Vietnam, disarmament talks with the Soviet Union and raging inflation domestically. In day-to-day governing, his heavy reliance on the presidential veto opened him to criticism that he was less of a leader and more of a reactor. After all the controversies that have dogged presidents since, however, the Ford presidency looks relatively calm.

Ford will be remembered most for one act: his pardon of Nixon, just one month after the resignation. Ford wanted to govern as the president who led his nation out of the long shadow of Watergate. Yet his ill-timed and ill-considered pardon actually drew the shadow of Watergate over Ford's own presidency, destroying the Republican Party's chances in midterm elections that year and perhaps contributing to Ford's reelection loss to Jimmy Carter in 1976.

The pardon was a mistake, inconsistent with the fundamental principle that everyone, including the president, is equal before the law. Nixon tried hard to defy that principle and, coming so soon after his resignation, the pardon did the same. Some of those who once criticized Ford's pardon have softened their views over time, arguing that we needed healing and forgiveness. In 1974, however, after so much Nixonian stonewalling and evasiveness, our system of government would have been better served by letting the legal process take its course, no matter how uncertain.

History shows that Ford's top advisors were baffled by his determination to forgive Nixon right away. Ford's intention, some believe, was to prove that he could act as his own man and follow his own conscience. Others suggest he was influenced by the ghost of his own father, an abusive man who was devastated when Ford's mother divorced him and who died before the son had a chance to forgive him. Ford himself wrote in his memoirs that he knew the pardon was the right move and that he did not anticipate the virulence of the reaction against it. He may have been too nice a guy.

Retailer Settles Dispute With D.C. (WP)

By Annys Shin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

USA Discounters Agrees to Cap Charges for Credit Customers

USA Discounters, a Virginia Beach retailer, has agreed to limit what it charges District customers paying with credit and to pay $50,000 into a consumer-protection fund to settle allegations that it imposed finance charges that weren't properly disclosed.

The company sells furniture, electronics, computers and other items, largely to customers with poor credit and with a special focus on members of the military. In addition to locations in the District and Lanham, it has eight other stores near Fort Belvoir, the Norfolk naval installation, Fort Bragg and Camp Lejeune in North Carolina, Fort Benning in Georgia, and Fort Hood in Texas.

The company denies any wrongdoing, said Timothy W. Dorsey, USA Discounters' vice president and general counsel.

The voluntary agreement, reached Thursday with the D.C. attorney general's office, stemmed from agency concerns that the majority of the company's customers, who buy merchandise using the chain's in-house financing program, routinely paid substantially higher markups than did customers using cash.

Customers buying on credit typically pay in installments over a limited period. For example, at the USA Discounters in Northeast Washington yesterday, a recliner upholstered with the Redskins logo was on sale for twice-monthly installments of $36 for 24 months -- for a total of $1,728. A coffee table was being offered for twice-monthly payments of $19 for 24 months, or a total of $912.

Customers can try to negotiate for a reduced price, Dorsey said. Those armed with cash can often get better deals.

But because credit customers regularly paid substantially more, the D.C. attorney general's office alleged that USA Discounters was making customers pay finance charges without telling them. Under the federal Truth in Lending Act, costs imposed on credit customers and not on cash customers are considered finance charges and must be disclosed, the agency said.

Those charges also must be used to calculate the annual interest rate credit customers pay. By the agency's calculations, USA Discounters charged interest rates greater than 24 percent, a violation of D.C. consumer-protection laws.

"Prices for customers who buy on credit cannot be artificially inflated to hide the true cost of credit," said Eugene Adams, interim attorney general

Dorsey denied that the company hid finance charges from credit customers and that its annual interest rates exceeded 24 percent. He said that as with car buying, customers end up paying different prices because of a variety of factors, including the negotiating skill of the buyers.

"There is absolutely nothing wrong with permitting persons to negotiate prices. The Attorney General's unfortunately presumed that the difference in price was because some customers paid by credit," Dorsey said in an e-mail.

By signing the agreement, the company did not admit to breaking any laws. USA Discounters said it would ensure that on some items, the negotiated sales price wouldn't exceed a certain level. In rare cases, that could mean as much as a 21 percent savings to a customer, Dorsey said.

The company also plans to track how much cash customers pay compared with credit customers, to make sure they don't diverge substantially.

The five-year agreement applies only to the retailer's D.C. store.

Strategy, Not Drama, In 'I Intend To Run In '08' (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 25 — On Thursday, John Edwards is planning to announce what has been clear to much of the world since the end of the last presidential election: He is running for president in 2008. A similar declaration is expected shortly from Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, followed, in all probability, by Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton, Barack Obama and John McCain.

For all the very orchestrated hoopla about to be heaped on American voters over the next few weeks, presidential announcements have become, more often than not, vestigial remnants of the way presidential politics were once conducted (or at least the way they are remembered).

Rather than being big moments in which candidates lay down ideological markers and discuss what they would do as president, announcements are more of a pro forma exercise of the obvious. Campaigns grab at a political opportunity for attention with events that, ultimately, are of relatively small consequence.

For Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Romney, Mr. Edwards and Mr. McCain, it would be noteworthy, after all they have done, if they were to announce that they were not running. Mr. Edwards's 2008 campaign arguably began on Election Day 2004, when he lost as his party's vice-presidential candidate.

But if formal announcements hold little drama, they are hardly meaningless. Their timing and staging reflect how presidential politics are changing in the United States in 2008, and offer a glimpse at problems each candidate faces one year before the Iowa caucus. The announcements are an insight into how campaigns are adapting to the pressures of the Internet, the demands of fund-raising, the broad range of avenues for reaching voters and mobilizing supporters, and the particular dynamics of the '08 campaign, crowded with candidates, many of them celebrities.

Most strikingly, the announcements are being made extraordinarily early. In the 1992 cycle, Bill Clinton did not formally announce his candidacy until October 1991, three months before the Iowa caucus. When Mr. Edwards announces, with a round of morning talk show interviews and a press conference in the Lower Ninth Ward in New Orleans, he will become the third Democrat to enter the race formally.

As of now, about a half-dozen candidates have formed presidential exploratory committees, a preliminary step that allows them to raise money as they take soundings about a race. And Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., Democrat of Delaware, told reporters Tuesday that he planned to set up his exploratory committee next month.

In this crowded field, few candidates in either the Democratic or Republican Party can afford to wait and risk watching a rival pick off big-name elected officials, campaign consultants and contributors. And since aides to many of the candidates say they are likely to bow out of the public campaign finance system and raise money on their own, there is pressure to start raising money now.

"Timing is becoming much more of an issue," said Joe Trippi, who managed the 2004 presidential campaign of Howard Dean. "You're seeing it now in the urgency of these people to get out and announce. I'm worried that we're going to see people announce four years ahead of time next time the way this thing is moving."

Understandably, candidates are going to do what it takes to get publicity. Mr. Edwards's aides said they chose this slow-news time of year, and the backdrop of New Orleans neighborhoods ravaged by Hurricane Katrina, in part to command the maximum amount of attention. Camera crews will be permitted to film Mr. Edwards as he helps with the cleanup efforts.

But there are less obvious advantages as well. Mr. Trippi said that when Mr. Dean declared for president in June 2004, they timed his announcement for a week before the deadline for the release of campaign finance reports. The idea was that the excitement built by the announcement in Vermont would result in a surge of contributions that would allow Mr. Dean to surprise the political world with a display of his grass-roots financial support. Mr. Dean's big fund-raising report that month proved to be one of the biggest boosts of his campaign.

Mr. Edwards, who is arguably the most Web-savvy candidate in the '08 race to date, is using Thursday's event to try to gin up his supporters via the Internet. He sent out an e-mail message earlier this week, saying he was on the verge of making a decision that his aides say has, in fact, already been made.

"If you want to take this effort to the next level, send me an e-mail and let me know: JohnEdwards@readytochangeamerica.com," he wrote.

The decision of how to time the announcements also reflects the particular needs of the candidates.

For Mr. Edwards, there is clearly interest in trying to win attention after two months in which Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama dominated the coverage of the Democratic contest. The decision by Senator Evan Bayh of Indiana not to run has left a clear opportunity for Mr. Edwards to position himself as the alternative to the other two senators.

For Mr. Romney, it is a chance to try to reset his bearings after a month in which he has struggled to reconcile his effort to be the most socially conservative candidate in the race with a more liberal record, as Massachusetts governor, on such issues as abortion and gay rights.

The motivation for the announcement of Gov. Tom Vilsack, the Democratic governor of Iowa, was in many ways more typical: a fairly unknown politician trying to get his name on the board with a thematic speech delivered in early primary states.

There may still be a few stop-the-presses surprises lurking out there. There is still a smidgen of doubt about the candidacy of Mr. Obama, who is spending this week in Hawaii with his family discussing his future, and even a smaller smidgen of doubt about Mrs. Clinton.

Although Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts has said he is likely to make a second effort at running, some Democrats say they would not be shocked to see him bow out. And it will be interesting to see if Al Gore succumbs to pleading by Democrats to run.

Mr. Edwards has been preparing for this moment since the second in 2004 when he knew he and Mr. Kerry had been defeated. His relatively high standing in some early polls in Iowa is testimony, in part, to how much time he has spent there in the last two years. Mr. Edwards has also offered a spray of speeches, op-ed essays and interviews on the subject of poverty in the United States, so even the themes he unveils to begin his campaign are likely to be familiar.

Mr. Romney's intentions are also no mystery: he spent 212 days out of state last year, The Boston Globe reported last week, and has methodically moved over the past year to the right side of the Republican ocean.

And if Mrs. Clinton or Mr. McCain end up not running, that will come as sobering news to the stable of high-powered political talent they have recruited in recent months. Both even have putative campaign managers in place: Terry Nelson for Mr. McCain and Patti Solis Doyle for Mrs. Clinton.

Schwarzenegger's Leg Is Repaired In Surgery (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0109217

SANTA MONICA, Calif., Dec. 26 (AP) — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's broken leg was put back together with wires and screws on Tuesday, and he should make a full recovery, though he will probably be on crutches during his inauguration next week, officials said.

Mr. Schwarzenegger broke his right thigh bone over the weekend while skiing with his family in Sun Valley, Idaho. He underwent a 90-minute operation.

"Following the surgery, the governor was awake, alert and talking," said Dr. Kevin Ehrhart, who performed the operation at St. John's Health Center. "He is now fully coherent, and I have cleared him to resume his duties as governor."

Mr. Schwarzenegger will remain hospitalized for three days, and his full recovery will take about eight weeks, Dr. Ehrhart said.

The fracture is the governor's third medical problem in just over a year. In January, he needed 15 stitches to repair a cut lip after colliding with a car while riding his motorcycle in Los Angeles. He also spent several hours at a hospital last December with a rapid heartbeat.

Accident Is A Bad Break For Gov.'s Privacy (LAT)

By Peter Nicholas

The Los Angeles Times, December 27, 2006

Three days after he tripped and fell on an Idaho ski slope, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger underwent surgery Tuesday morning for a broken leg — a 90-minute procedure that his doctors termed successful.

While the governor was under anesthesia, he relinquished the powers of office to Lt. Gov. Cruz Bustamante. Schwarzenegger resumed his duties about 10:45 a.m. when his doctors pronounced him fit.

Schwarzenegger was expected to make a full recovery. He will remain hospitalized for three days; afterward, he will walk on crutches without a cast.

Dr. Kevin Ehrhart, Schwarzenegger's orthopedic surgeon, said recovery will take about eight weeks. The surgery proceeded "without complication," Ehrhart said in a statement, and "the post-operation X-rays looked great."

Schwarzenegger fractured his femur Saturday while skiing on Bald Mountain in Sun Valley, Idaho — one of many out-of-state trips the governor has made without public notice. The episode focused renewed attention on Schwarzenegger's continuing quest to keep his private life out of the public eye — standard procedure for a movie star but unusual for a sitting governor.

A friend who spoke to Schwarzenegger after the accident said the governor was "aggravated" about what happened, describing the accident as a "slow fall" on an icy surface.

Schwarzenegger's press office would not release any details about the accident. But Adi Erber, a ski instructor who was with him at the time, said Schwarzenegger was standing still before the accident, preparing for the final 200 yards of the Lower Warm Springs run.

The governor's ski pole became caught in one of his skis, causing him to trip and fall, Erber said, describing it as a "freak accident."

He said the governor was in pain and that a rescue team took him down the hill on a toboggan.

The governor is being treated at St. John's Health Center in Santa Monica, according to people familiar with his medical care. Schwarzenegger's office would not disclose the hospital, citing security reasons.

In a prepared statement, First Lady Maria Shriver said: "When we checked Arnold into the hospital on Christmas night, he was looking forward to his surgery. He had been in good spirits. He asked when he could get back to work and he's looking forward to his inauguration next week. Our children and I are grateful for everyone's support and prayers."

Schwarzenegger loves to have fun on his own terms, even if there is an element of danger — a dimension of his personality that is seldom on public display.

He relishes long rides on his motorcycle. He goes on rafting trips. And he skis.

Pat O'Brien, a television personality and longtime friend of Schwarzenegger and Shriver, said Tuesday that the governor "lives his life to the fullest, and with that comes risks — whether it be on the slopes or on a motorcycle."

DOJ_NMG_0109218

In January, Schwarzenegger was riding his Harley-Davidson with his son Patrick in a sidecar when he got into a crash. The accident occurred when the driver of a Volvo SUV pulled out of a driveway on Mandeville Canyon Road in Brentwood. Schwarzenegger received 15 stitches on his lip. His son was not injured.

Schwarzenegger conceded that he had been driving for years without a proper motorcycle license; he has since gotten one.

In December 2001, Schwarzenegger broke six ribs when he fell off his motorcycle. He was hospitalized for four days at St. John's.

Few Californians would have known their governor spent hours skiing near his Idaho vacation home this weekend if Schwarzenegger had not broken his leg.

Following its standard practice, the governor's press office on Friday revealed only that Schwarzenegger had left the state. The press release said that Schwarzenegger would have no public activities from Dec. 23 to 25. But in a private letter to Bustamante's office, the governor's staff said that he would be out of state from Dec. 22 to Jan 1.

Cloaking the governor's itinerary ensures at least some measure of privacy when Schwarzenegger is taking a break, aides contend.

"The governor is an international celebrity who values his privacy when he's with his family," said Adam Mendelsohn, the governor's communications director.

But secrecy carries an added advantage: minimizing the chance of an unflattering photograph or a spontaneous quote from a vacationing Schwarzenegger that veers off message.

Early in his term, Schwarzenegger revealed his out-of-state whereabouts. That ended after a trip to Hawaii in April 2004.

The Times found the governor at the Four Seasons Resort in Maui and in an interview, Schwarzenegger said he wanted to see the Legislature reduced to part-time status. He never pursued that option.

Schwarzenegger frequently travels outside California — either on business or for pleasure.

He has been out of state for 204 of the 1,136 days he has been in office — or 1 of every 5.6 days, according to records kept by Bustamante's office.

In contrast, former Gov. Gray Davis was out of state for 113 of 1,779 days in office — or 1 of every 15.7 days.

Though Schwarzenegger has often been away as part of his job, he has also gone to Nevada and Ohio for bodybuilding competitions that had no connection to state business.

Locating the governor can be a game of cat and mouse. In 2004, Schwarzenegger addressed the Republican National Convention in New York. Aides said he was returning afterward to California. Instead, he veered off to Sun Valley. No one from his staff announced that his itinerary had changed.

In August 2005, he made a trip to the Bahamas that was never announced.

A survey of some western governors Tuesday showed practices vary when it comes to fully disclosing private out-of-state travel.

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson reveals his whereabouts on private trips on a case-by-case basis, according to his office. Nevada Gov. Kenny C. Guinn's office said he might not necessarily issue a news release if he is on a family vacation. Washington Gov. Chris Gregoire's office said she does not reveal her destination when she takes personal trips out of state.

When Schwarzenegger leaves California, Bustamante becomes acting governor.

Bustamante has taken little dramatic action in the time Schwarzenegger has been away. One exception came in December 2003. Schwarzenegger had gone with his family to Sun Valley for the holidays.

While he was away, Bustamante declared a state of emergency in Santa Barbara County in response to an earthquake.

A spokesman for Bustamante said that California, a state prone to natural disasters, is at greater risk when the governor is gone as much as Schwarzenegger.

"You need someone on the ground who can take action immediately when it's needed — activating the National Guard or getting fire crews where they need to go," said Bustamante aide Stephen Green. "When you're gone one day out of five, a lot of things just don't get done."

Bustamante gave his office the day off Tuesday and exercised no powers in the hours Schwarzenegger was under anesthesia.

"I wanted him to appoint me to the Supreme Court, but he wouldn't," Green said.

Schwarzenegger Cleared To Resume Duties After Surgery (CHIT)

By Peter Nicholas

Chicago Tribune, December 27, 2006

SACRAMENTO -- Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's broken right femur was repaired today and he was cleared to resume his official duties, the governor's office announced.

The surgery to fix his thigh bone, which the governor broke Saturday while skiing in Sun Valley Idaho, lasted an hour and a half. Schwarzenegger was cleared to resume his duties at approximately 10:45 a.m., according to the news release.

In the prepared statement, orthopedic surgeon Dr. Kevin Ehrhart said the surgery "involved using cables and screws to wire the two main fragments of the governor's broken femur bone back together. It lasted approximately an hour an a half, was without complication, and the post-operation x-rays look great.

"Following the surgery, the governor was awake, alert and talking in the recovery room. He is now fully coherent and I have cleared him to resume his duties as governor," Ehrhart said.

Schwarzenegger will remain in the hospital for three days and will take approximately eight weeks to heal, said Ehrhart, who predicted a full recovery. The governor is not in a cast and will use crutches to walk while his leg heals, he said.

Aides said that preparations are being made for the governor to work from the hospital on his inauguration next month, the state of the State address and the 2006-07 budget proposal.

Adi Erber, a ski instructor who was with the governor at the time of the accident, said that Schwarzenegger was standing still, preparing for the final 200 yards of the run on Bald Mountain in Sun Valley, Idaho. The governor's ski pole got caught in one of his skis, causing him to trip and fall.

Erber described it as a "freak accident."

He said the governor was in pain, and that a rescue team took him down the hill on a toboggan. Schwarzenegger was then taken to the hospital for X-rays.

The two men, accompanied by security guards, had been skiing for about two hours prior to the accident, Erber said.

"It was the last run down," Erber said. "He was trying to take off again and he tripped."

Erber, a fellow Austrian, said that skiing is one of Schwarzenegger's favorite sports, and predicted that once the governor's leg heals he would be back at it.

"I've skied with him for 18 years," he said. "He's an expert skier."

He added that the governor "will be back in shape in no time. And I'm sure he will ski again."

While Schwarzenegger was on the surgery table, Lt. Governor Cruz Bustamante was in charge. He was notified this morning that Schwarzenegger had been cleared, according to a prepared statement by Andrea Hoch, his legal affairs secretary.

Selling Couples On Marriage (WT)

By Jon Ward [part Two Of Four]

The Washington Times, December 27, 2006

Second of four parts.

The lesson would be how to keep "the fire burning," Nisa Muhammad told nine couples at her Tuesday night marriage class in the District.

"I need this session," said Rossalyn Parks, whose boyfriend had yet to arrive or call with an explanation. She was on fire, all right.

All nine couples were black, and most live in low-income neighborhoods in the District or Prince George's County.

Mrs. Muhammad's "Wedded Bliss" program, which will receive $1.3 million in federal money over the next four years, is aimed at helping black couples.

"We've kind of bought into the hype that marriage doesn't matter ... in the culture, the music, the movie, on TV," said Mrs. Muhammad, a 49-year-old mother of five who was divorced after 12 years and remarried last year.

Mrs. Muhammad said that TV provides an unrealistic portrayal of single parents and that life is "very different if you're ... Tamika in Southeast D.C."

In this series, The Washington Times examines the changing views of marriage and what institutions -- such as religious groups, government and businesses -- are doing to preserve it.

Mrs. Muhammad's program is one of many that churches and religious groups are using to strengthen marriages and foster new ones. Wedded Bliss is an eight-week class that encourages couples to marry by helping them build intimacy and teaching communication skills.

Airing grievances

At the Tuesday night meeting, Mrs. Muhammad -- who converted to Islam in 1980 and writes for the Nation of Islam's national newspaper, the "Final Call" -- gave a short talk to the couples.

She then asked each woman to share her "vision" of their husband or boyfriend.

Ms. Parks' cousin, Deidra Arnold, a 40-year-old divorced U.S. postal worker, said her boyfriend, Donald Aikens, a 45-year-old construction worker and lifelong bachelor, loves to serve others.

"We can go to the store, Home Depot or whatever, and he helps everybody," said Ms. Arnold, who got married when she was 21 and has a 21-year-old daughter.

The atmosphere in the room softened. The other couples, seated at tables arranged in a horseshoe, thought about what they would say.

"Great," said Mrs. Muhammad, wearing a dark green suit and a matching head scarf. "Rossalyn?"

Ms. Parks, 40, hesitated. She and William Thompson, 40, also a postal worker, began dating in August.

"I'm going to be honest with y'all. I am kind of angry with William, so I don't even have a vision," she said.

Jamil Muhammad, a national spokesman for the Nation of Islam who helps Mrs. Muhammad facilitate the class, jumped in.

"You're angry on the basis of sight," he told Ms. Parks. "You've got to look into the future on the basis of vision."

Ms. Parks sighed.

"It's kind of hard to say," she said before opening up about Mr. Thompson's work ethic.

"He wants to be at work every day. He'll probably have 1,500 hours of sick leave, ready to sell some vacation time," Ms. Parks said, pausing for several moments. "But I don't see him committing to a marriage by then."

"Ooh," whispered Mr. Muhammad, as if he'd been stung by a bee.

Mrs. Muhammad didn't blink.

"OK, well, we've got some work to do," she said. "Thank you, Rossalyn."

Then she was on to the next couple.

Later, Mrs. Muhammad said she has seen growth in Ms. Parks and Mr. Thompson, who arrived at her class "with no sense of vision."

"We're trying to change the hearts and minds of people who look at marriage in a negative way and say, 'You know, we have something to celebrate,' " she said.

Remembering religion

Churches and religious groups have always played a crucial role in sanctioning marriages, encouraging them and providing couples counseling. Marriage is an essential part of the three Abrahamic faiths -- Judaism, Christianity and Islam.

But modern culture continues to question the definition and validity of marriage.

"Increasingly, it is not obvious to our young people, the singles, the twentysomethings, why they should go ahead and get married," said Michael Lawrence, associate pastor at Capitol Hill Baptist Church in the District. "That case has to be made."

Peter Murphy, family life director for the Archdiocese of Washington, agreed.

"The images of marriage are very negative," he said. "Couples think it's going to restrict their freedom. ... There is fear of commitment to something long term in a culture that is so short term and noncommittal."

DOJ_NMG_0109221

In response, some churches are teaching more often and more robustly about marriage and challenging teens and singles on their attitudes about marriage.

"We try to show that marriage is actually freeing and will bring life," Mr. Murphy said.

Churches also are creating small groups for newly married couples, led by older couples, and adapting counseling to meet challenges unique to second marriages.

Marriage, Christians believe, is primarily a way to imitate the Triune God. Husbands are to love and lead their wives sacrificially, in the same way that Jesus Christ died to save His church. Wives, equal in value but with different roles, are to support their husbands.

"Marriage is a picture of the Gospel," Mr. Lawrence said. "Marriage was created by God to help us understand that he loves us in Jesus Christ."

Marriage is also a "crucible" in which each person's weakness and sinfulness is exposed, leading to repentance and change by God's power.

"God puts us with another person that is sometimes very different because it forces us to put aside selfishness and pride," said Pastor Paul Petry, who oversees family ministries at Mars Hill Church in Seattle. "If we fix our eyes on Christ and make it a goal to love that other person in a sacrificial way, there is something mysterious that happens, and that marriage becomes a wonderful thing."

Judaism views marriage as "a relationship that is set apart from all others," said Rabbi Jack Moline of the Agudas Achim Congregation in Alexandria.

"It is uniquely intimate and exclusive, and as such, it is a reflection of the nature of the relationship between the Jewish people and God," he said.

For Mr. Moline and other rabbis, a Jewish wedding can be performed only if the bride and groom are Jewish.

"All of the things that define marriage are matters of Jewish law, and Jewish law posits that it applies only to Jews, and not to non-Jews," he said.

Many Christian pastors counsel against marrying non-Christians as well.

Muslims also see marriage as a fundamental part of practicing their faith.

"Marriage is the most important aspect of a Muslim life," said Imam Mohamed Magid of the All Dulles Area Muslim Society, one of the largest mosques in the area.

"The whole Koran talks a lot about marriage and the relationship between husband and wife and the family," he said. "There is so much emphasis in the Koran on teaching about this issue."

Mr. Magid said he began offering six-session, premarital-counseling courses to couples a few years ago, when he saw a study showing that 33 percent of Muslim marriages ended in divorce. But, he said, there are few mosques in the United States that offer such counseling.

"The extended family in the countries of the immigrant [Muslims] creates a very strong support network for young couples," Mr. Magid said. "Here in America, there is no extended family. The wisdom has to come through a structured counseling that tells them about communication, conflict resolution, decision-making ... and also to talk about the issue of intimacy."

Saving marriage

Michael J. McManus thinks churches are not only doing too little for marriages, but in many cases, they are part of the divorce problem.

"Most churches are wedding factories today," said Mr. McManus, who created a Marriage Savers program in 1986. "They have good intentions, but their marriage preparation is not that helpful."

About 10,000 pastors and rabbis in 215 cities across the country have signed an agreement to uphold higher standards for premarital counseling. Marriage Savers focuses on marriage preparation, enrichment, restoration, reconciliation of separated couples and counseling for stepfamilies.

Mr. McManus said his program has proven results. In cities where religious leaders have signed "community marriage policies," divorce rates and cohabitation rates are decreasing and marriage rates are increasing, he said.

"The churches need to do this work, but we need to do a better job," said Mr. McManus, a nationally syndicated ethics and religion columnist who attends Fourth Presbyterian Church in Bethesda. "The disintegration of marriage is the most important domestic problem of our time. It lies behind so many other problems."

Ted and Peg Kupelian of Rockville have mentored 20 couples through the Marriage Savers program.

"I saw a lot of divorces at work," said Mr. Kupelian, 60, a public-affairs specialist in the federal government. "This was one thing we could do together to really make a difference."

Tim and Kristen Bibo of Baltimore had never met the Kupelians but traveled to their home for eight weeks before getting married Oct. 28.

"When you have people you're friends with ... there are certain barriers," said Mr. Bibo, 28, an analyst with the state government. "Meeting new people that you develop a new relationship with, and you start it off with this openness, is something you really can't do with people that you know."

Mr. Bibo said the Kupelians, who have been married 26 years, "really challenged [us] about things that are going to be challenges."

The Kupelians took the Bibos through a 156-question inventory, going over the answers to questions about all aspects of their life.

"We're trying to open their eyes so they know exactly what to expect, to minimize surprises once they get married," said Mrs. Kupelian, who stayed at home with the couple's two daughters and now volunteers at Bible studies and in Montgomery County public schools.

The couples talked about how the Bibos would handle the demands of extended family during the holidays and helped them work on a budget.

"We want the trouble in our kitchen rather than in their bedroom or their kitchen," Mrs. Kupelian said. "We don't want people to be afraid to have conflict."

Mr. McManus said most marriages fall apart because people "don't know how to argue." Mrs. Kupelian said they teach young couples to "attack the problem, not each other."

Mrs. Bibo, 31, who works in philanthropy, said she appreciated the structure.

"It's a lot about being really intentional and having the space to do it," she said. "I loved the space of talking about marriage in its seriousness and its difficulty. That gives you a sense of security, that it's OK if you are fighting."

Out of the 20 couples mentored by the Kupelians, one has divorced, and one is struggling. Three of the couples they mentored decided not to get married.

"I don't see that as failure," Mr. Kupelian said. "I see that as one less divorce."

Meeting in the middle

Ms. Parks married at 24. She and her high-school sweetheart divorced after 12 years, and she now has a 12-year old daughter.

Mr. Thompson has never married.

Despite her pessimistic comments at Mrs. Muhammad's meeting, days later Ms. Parks said the program had "enhanced" her relationship with Mr. Thompson and she is hopeful about the relationship.

Specifically, she said, the class helped Ms. Parks and her daughter, Angel, to adapt to Mr. Thompson's three nieces and nephews, ages 20, 18 and 2, who live with him and are often visiting.

"My daughter was used to going in the refrigerator, getting what she wants, doing her laundry when she wants to," Ms. Park said. "They were teaching us that we now are sharing our lives with others, and we can't be selfish."

Ms. Parks took notes during the eight-week class in a journal given to her by Mrs. Muhammad. Mr. Thompson could not read it until the end of the class.

The journal -- and the conversations between her and Mr. Thompson during the classes -- helped them grow much closer, she said.

"Now we're better equipped to communicate," Ms. Parks said. "I don't just stay angry. We talk about it and we get through it. It's also good to know that people are going through the same problems."

Ms. Parks estimates her chances of marrying Mr. Thompson are about 70 percent.

"I'm not saying we have to get married tomorrow, but you have to be open to that idea," she said. "I don't feel like I'm running out of time, but I don't feel like I have time to be wasting on a relationship that's not going anywhere."

"I don't see him wasting my time, and I don't see him hurting me," Ms. Parks said. "I do think he'll commit. My problem is, when?"

Part I

U.S. out of love with marriage?

Of Public Debt And Private Wealth (WP)

By Steven Pearlstein

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

With Democrats about to take charge on Capitol Hill, we're going to be hearing a lot about the widening income gap between rich and poor.

There are a variety of different measures for inequality and lots of factors that drive the data, ranging from winner-take-all labor market competition and the weakness of unions to the pace of immigration and the tendency of high-income people to marry each other.

Furthermore, during different periods, this widening of the gap has been most apparent at various rungs of the income ladder -- between the poor and the middle class in the '80s, between the middle class and the upper class in the early '90s, and, most recently, between the very rich and just about everyone else.

All of this is about to become grist for a great national debate on inequality, with everyone picking the income measures, gaps and causes that best support their economic views or their preferred solutions. As it plays out, it's important to remember that there isn't one correct analysis or any silver-bullet solution.

In that spirit, I'd like to toss out an idea borrowed from a reader in Canada with no particular training in economics but an intuitive sense about the connection between trade flows and income inequality. The idea goes something like this:

In terms of the global economy, the elephant in the room for much of the last 25 years has been the large and persistent U.S. current account deficit (loosely, the trade deficit), which this year is likely to exceed $800 billion. Roughly speaking, the richest country in the world spends 106 percent of its income.

If the United States were almost any other country, we wouldn't be able to sustain this huge imbalance for very long because the rest of the world would be unwilling to finance it. But, as it happens, developing nations suddenly have more savings than they know what to do with, much of it denominated in dollars as a result of selling us inexpensive clothing and electronics and very expensive oil.

These countries know that if they were to try to exchange all those dollars for their own currencies, it would drive down the value of the dollar -- and with it, demand by American consumers for all the things they sell. Rather than accept slower growth and higher unemployment, they have decided to keep their currencies loosely pegged to the dollar by investing those trade-surplus dollars in U.S. assets.

One obvious effect of this decision is to drive up demand for U.S. stocks, bonds and real estate, which foreigners have purchased either directly or through such intermediaries as hedge and private-equity funds. Their money was a significant factor in the tech and telecom bubbles of the 1990s, the current bubble in corporate takeovers and commercial real estate, and the just-ended bubble in residential real estate. Indirectly, it also helps explain why stock prices are at or near all-time records.

Moreover, because so much of the trade deficit is reinvested in debt instruments such as Treasury bonds, it has had the effect of lowering interest rates below where they would otherwise be. Low interest rates, in turn, encourage both foreign and American investors to use more borrowed money in their investment strategies, allowing them to buy more assets with the same amount of their own money.

So what does this have to do with income inequality? Quite a bit, actually.

We've known for a long time that increased trade with low-wage countries depresses wages of workers who produce goods and services now imported. A trade deficit equal to 7 percent of economic output obviously magnifies that effect.

But as the trade deficit is depressing wages at the bottom, it is now boosting incomes at the top by significantly inflating the value of stocks, bonds and real estate -- assets whose ownership is concentrated heavily in the hands of high-income people. By buying and selling these assets, and borrowing against them, these people have been transforming their paper wealth into spendable (and measurable) income at a record pace.

Finally, let's remember that all this buying, selling and monetizing of assets has created lots of fat fees for handling these transactions or serving as financial intermediaries. Those fees, in turn, translate into eye-popping bonuses for Wall Street investment bankers, hedge fund managers and partners in private-equity firms.

It would be an exaggeration, of course, to argue that our large and persistent trade deficit is the major factor in rising inequality. After all, inequality also is rising in countries with trade surpluses.

But I think the deficit does help explain why so much of the country's income gains have gone into the pockets of investment bankers, money managers, real estate developers, wealthy families and corporate executives loaded up with stock options. I'm sure these folks believe they are pulling away from the pack because they work harder and create more economic value than the rest of us. But in the coming debate, we need to remember that they are also the lucky beneficiaries of a runaway trade deficit and the bubble-prone economy it has created.

Myths And The Middle Class (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

Almost all Americans see themselves as "middle class." To declare yourself middle class is to say you've succeeded without openly bragging that you're superior -- a no-no in a democratic culture. You're like everyone else, only a little more or less so.

Not surprisingly, a recent poll done for the Economic Policy Institute, a liberal think tank, finds that only 2 percent of Americans put themselves in the "upper class" and a mere 8 percent consider themselves "lower class." The large majority classify themselves as "upper-middle class" (17 percent) or "middle class" (45 percent). The rest (27 percent) see themselves as "working class," a stepping stone to the middle class.

Because the "middle class" isn't really the middle -- it's a huge blob -- describing how "it" feels and thinks is usually an act of simplification, exaggeration or invention. Yet that's routine because politicians and commentators want to show that they grasp the hopes and fears of everyday Americans.

The middle class today is said to be angry and anxious. It's worried about jobs, health insurance and retirement income. The EPI poll explores these discontents. Up to a point, it confirms conventional wisdom. One question asked respondents to agree with one of the following statements:

Most people today face increasing uncertainty about employment, with stagnant incomes, paying more for health care, taxes, and retirement, while those at the top have booming incomes and lower taxes.

Or:

Our economy faces ups and downs, but most people can expect to better themselves, see rising incomes, find good jobs and provide economic security for their families.

By an overwhelming 61 to 34 percent, respondents preferred the first statement. They didn't like oil companies (66 to 13 percent), drug companies (49 to 25 percent) and corporate CEOs (35 to 18 percent). One interesting exception to the anti-big-business sentiment was Wal-Mart, whose favorable rating (45 to 29 percent) almost equaled Social Security's (48 to 24 percent). Globalization wasn't especially popular either; by 59 to 32 percent, respondents favored more limits on imports.

So the middle class is furious, as portrayed. Well, not exactly. What's striking is the huge gap between people's views about "the economy" -- an abstraction -- and their own personal situations:

? Although only 32 percent rate the overall economy as "excellent" or "good," 52 percent judge their personal situation as excellent or good (35 percent said "fair" and 13 percent "poor").

? Most Americans (60 to 37 percent) think their own living standards are rising; parents of children under 18 overwhelmingly (54 to 24 percent) think the same will be true for their children.

? Almost 70 percent of Americans say they've attained or will attain the "American Dream," as they define it. More than half say success comes from a good education and hard work, not from connections (18 percent) or being born wealthy (13 percent).

Just as Americans often criticize public education but like their local school (or hate Congress while supporting the local congressman), they rationalize personal economic success with national economic shortcomings.

Both "conservative and liberal elites" are out of touch with typical Americans, say the pollsters who conducted the survey. Conservatives' focus on overall economic performance (say, gross domestic product) minimizes individuals' "hard work" to improve "their living standards against the odds." But liberals underestimate Americans' "emphasis on personal responsibility and overestimate the degree to which [people] see themselves as victims."

Maybe. But there's a simpler explanation for the confusion: Americans' optimism and perfectionism are constantly mugged by reality. Consider why this will continue.

People value stability and security. They also want higher incomes. Unfortunately, the two sometimes collide. In a recent book, "Economic Turbulence," three economists show that the constant turnover of companies and business locations ("establishments") improves economic growth -- but creates disruption and stress. In the five industries studied (trucking, computer chips, financial services, software and food stores), the productivity of the best establishments is often double that of the worst. Replacing the less efficient with the more efficient ultimately lowers costs and raises living standards.

Compounding the stress, the price of entry into the middle class is always rising. The more we can have, the more we must have. Keeping up with the Joneses is the curse of our advances and ambitions. Thirty years ago a middle-class existence didn't include central air-conditioning, computers, cellphones or cable television. It will soon include flat-panel TVs. Similarly, new drugs and surgeries raise the cost of health insurance, reducing coverage and take-home pay. From 1991 to 2005 the cost of fringe benefits (mainly health insurance) rose nearly twice as fast as wages.

Americans cannot escape these realities. The economy will remain precarious if it remains productive. The new technologies and products we celebrate inflict anxiety by redefining middle-class society. The causes of our success are also the sources of our stress. Of course, many of today's complaints (growing inequality, eroding health insurance) are legitimate and, to some extent, might be corrected. But the remedies -- assuming they didn't make matters worse -- would succeed only temporarily, because they would not erase the basic dilemma.

The middle-class "squeeze" never vanishes. Sometimes the economy so outperforms expectations (say, after World War II or during the late 1990s) that it creates a lull. But that merely elevates expectations to more unrealistic levels and ensures later disappointment. The economy pleases most people most of the time -- but can never please everyone all of the time.

Bumping In Schools (NYT)

The United States has a long and shameful history of dumping its least effective, least qualified teachers into the schools that serve the neediest children. The No Child Left Behind Act requires the states to end this practice. But the states are unlikely to truly improve teacher quality — or spread qualified teachers more equitably throughout the schools — until they pay more attention to how teachers are trained, hired, evaluated and assigned.

To get control of the assignment process, districts will need to abandon union rules that basically guarantee senior teachers the right to change schools whenever they want — even if the principal of the receiving school does not want them — by bumping a less senior teacher out of his or her job.

Obviously, not every teacher who moves to a new school is a bad egg. But principals who wish to shed ineffective teachers often induce them to transfer by threatening negative evaluations, turning the transferring teacher into the receiving school's problem. A study by a nonpartisan New York research group, the New Teacher Project, found that the transfer dance goes on well into the summer, creating a logistical train wreck in staffing. Unable to determine their hiring needs in a timely fashion, school administrators delay making decisions — thus losing better-qualified applicants who grow frustrated and take jobs elsewhere.

Talented novices, with no seniority rights to protect them, often quit the field after being shunted from one place to another. Others give up on the urban school systems where the bumping process is most prevalent and high-tail it to the suburbs.

Meanwhile, back in the city, schools are still cobbling together their staffs after the school year has begun. The revolving door turns, instructional time is lost and children suffer.

States and localities are beginning to recognize the problems with this system. New York City, for example, eliminated the forced transfer right in contract negotiations. In California, the State Legislature has passed a law giving principals at low-performing schools the power to veto forced transfers. The law also requires that seniority-based transfers be completed for all schools by April 15 for the following school year.

Urban systems all over the country need to move toward reform. A senior teacher who has been forced out elsewhere or who simply wishes to move elsewhere should be guaranteed an interview at the preferred school, but not a job. School managers, who are increasingly being held accountable for student performance, need to be able to hire the candidate best suited for the position.

Somalian Troops Advance Toward Capital (AP)

By Mohamed Olad Hassan

AP, December 27, 2006

Somalia government soldiers, joined by troops from neighboring Ethiopia, advanced toward Somalia's capital Tuesday as Islamic fighters dug in and promised a "new phase" in the war — a chilling pronouncement from a movement that has threatened suicide attacks.

Somalia called on the Council of Islamic Courts militias, bloodied by a week of artillery and mortar attacks, to surrender and promised amnesty if they lay down their weapons, government spokesman Abdirahman Dinari said.

A U.N. official, meanwhile, said Tuesday that Ethiopian-backed government troops were advancing on Mogadishu, the capital, from two directions and facing stiff resistance.

Francois Lonseny Fall, the top U.N. envoy to Somalia, also said 35,000 Somalis had crossed into neighboring Kenya to escape the fighting, which forced the U.N. to suspend aid delivery to two million Somalis.

As many as 1,000 people may have been killed and 3,000 wounded in the fighting, many of them foreign radicals, Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi said.

Meles said about 3,000 to 4,000 Ethiopian forces, which entered Somalia on Saturday, may soon wrap up their offensive against the Islamic militias that until recent days controlled most of southern part of the country.

"As soon as we have accomplished our mission — and about half of our mission is done, and the rest shouldn't take long — we'll be out," Meles told reporters in the Ethiopian capital, Addis Ababa.

The U.N. envoy, Fall, called the fighting "disastrous" for the Somalian people and asked the Security Council to call for an immediate cease-fire.

The council took no immediate action on a draft presidential statement circulated by Qatar calling for a cease-fire and withdrawal of foreign forces, specifying Ethiopian troops. The United States and several other nations objected to singling out Ethiopia and the call for a truce, saying talks and a political agreement are needed for stability before foreign forces can leave. The council agreed to continue discussions Wednesday.

A U.S. State Department spokesman in Washington appeared to endorse Ethiopia's military action, saying it had "genuine security concerns" about the growth of powerful Islamic militias next door.

The spokesman, Gonzalo Gallegos, said he had no information on whether the U.S., which is concerned about the militia's ties to foreign Islamic militants, was aiding the Ethiopian military with supplies.

Ethiopia sent fighter jets streaking deep into militia-held areas Sunday to help Somalia's U.N.-recognized government push back the Islamic militias. Ethiopia bombed the country's two main airports and helped government forces capture several villages.

Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed, a top leader of the Islamic group, accused Ethiopian troops of massacring 50 civilians in the central town of Cadado. Ethiopian officials were not immediately available to respond.

Ahmed said his fighters are in tactical retreat in the face of superior Ethiopian firepower. But the military struggle has just begun, he added.

"The war is entering a new phase," Ahmed said from Mogadishu, the capital. "We will fight Ethiopia for a long, long time and we expect the war to go everyplace."

Ahmed declined to elaborate, but some Islamic leaders have threatened a guerrilla war to include suicide bombings in Addis Ababa.

Ismael Mohamoud Hurreh, Somalia's foreign minister, said Tuesday that the government's small military force has been training for this offensive for five months.

"We will hold our line very, very well, don't worry about that," Hurreh told reporters in Nairobi, Kenya.

Experts fear the conflict in Somalia could engulf the region. Islamic courts leaders have repeatedly said they want to incorporate ethnic Somalis living in eastern Ethiopia, northeastern Kenya and Djibouti into a Greater Somalia.

For months, foreign Islamic radicals — including Pakistanis, Arabs and Chechens — have been trickling into Somalia to fight on behalf of the Islamic movement. According to a U.N. report in October, Eritrea — Ethiopia's neighbor and longtime adversary — has dispatched 2,000 soldiers to Somalia to fight against the Ethiopian-backed central government.

Ethiopia's Meles said his goal is not to defeat the militias but severely damage their military power — and allow both sides to return to peace talks on an even footing.

"The rank and file of the Islamic Courts militia is not a threat to Ethiopia," he said Tuesday. "Once they return to their bases, we will leave them alone."

Ethiopian troops will not enter Mogadishu, he said. Instead, he said, Somali forces would encircle the city to contain the militias that control it.

Any effort by the Somali government or Ethiopia to take the capital risks a disaster similar to the U.S. intervention in Somalia in 1992.

That U.N.-sponsored mission ended in 1993, after Somali militiamen shot down a U.S. Army Black Hawk helicopter. Eighteen American servicemen were killed in the crash and vicious street fighting that preceded and followed, made famous in the book and movie "Black Hawk Down."

Somalia has not had an effective government since warlords overthrew longtime dictator Mohamed Siad Barre in 1991, pushing the country into anarchy.

Two years ago, the United Nations helped set up a central government for the arid, impoverished nation on the Horn of Africa. But until the past week, it had little influence outside of its seat in the city of Baidoa, about 140 northwest of Mogadishu.

The country was largely under the control of warlords until this past summer, when the Islamic militia movement pushed them aside.

One critical issue is whether the central government can win the support of Somalis. Many resent Ethiopia's intervention because the countries have fought two wars over their disputed border in the past 45 years.

Hurreh, the Somali foreign minister, said Somalis will embrace the fall of the Islamic militias. Their severe interpretation of Islam is reminiscent, to some, of Afghanistan's Taliban regime — ousted by a U.S.-led campaign in 2001 for harboring Osama bin Laden.

"A lot of people in Mogadishu will be very happy to chew some qat and have the Islamic courts out of their way," Hurreh said, referring to the narcotic leaf banned by many of the Islamic courts.

U.S. Signals Backing For Ethiopian Incursion Into Somalia (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

WASHINGTON, Dec. 26 — The United States on Tuesday signaled its support for the Ethiopian offensive in Somalia, calling it a response to “aggression” by Islamists who have since the summer been consolidating power in the country.

A spokeswoman for the State Department, Janelle Hironimus, said Ethiopia was trying to stem the flow of outside arms shipments to the Islamists. Ms. Hironimus added that Washington was concerned about reports that the Islamists were using child soldiers and abusing Ethiopian prisoners of war.

The statement was the most detailed by the United States since last week, when the long-simmering tension between Ethiopia and Somalia boiled over.

Ethiopia has long been a strong ally of Washington in the Horn of Africa. The American military has for years trained Ethiopian troops at bases in the eastern region. The training is part of a Pentagon effort to build the Ethiopian military into a bulwark against regional terrorist networks.

Maj. Marie Boughen of the Army, a spokeswoman for the United States Central Command, which has military responsibility for the horn, said no American troops were participating in the Ethiopian offensive or working as advisers for it.

The Ethiopian military presence in Somalia, while tacitly blessed by Washington, has nonetheless been awkward for American officials. They have publicly urged a return to peace talks by warring Somali factions, but some officials have also said an Ethiopian invasion could be the only factor to prevent the Islamists' complete takeover of Somalia.

On Tuesday, a day after an Ethiopian jet strafed the airport in Mogadishu, the capital, the State Department issued internal guidance to staff members, instructing officials to play down the invasion in public statements.

"Should the press focus on the role of Ethiopia inside Somalia," read a copy of the guidelines that was given to The New York Times by an American official here, "emphasize that this is a distraction from the issue of dialogue between the T.F.I.'s and Islamic courts and shift the focus back to the need for dialogue."

T.F.I. is an abbreviation for the weak transitional government in Somalia.

"The press must not be allowed to make this about Ethiopia, or Ethiopia violating the territorial integrity of Somalia," the guidance said.

The Bush administration is using American ambassadors throughout the region in an effort to have African nations press the Islamists to return to the negotiating table.

Senior leaders of the Islamist coalition, the Islamic Courts Union, have issued a global call to jihad for Muslims to travel to Somalia to fight troops from Ethiopia.

American intelligence officials said they did not believe that foreign fighters had traveled to Somalia in great numbers and that mostly Somalis made up the force fighting the Ethiopians.

American intelligence officials theorize that the Islamists, who wrested control of Mogadishu in June from a coalition of warlords supported by the Central Intelligence Agency, have ties to a Qaeda cell based in East Africa that is responsible for the bombings of the American Embassies in Kenya and Tanzania in 1998.

This year, the C.I.A. began a covert operation to arm and finance the warlords, who had united under the banner of the Alliance for the Restoration of Peace and Counterterrorism. Operated from the intelligence agency's station in Nairobi, Kenya, the effort involved frequent trips to Mogadishu by case officers from the agency and paying hundreds of thousands of dollars to the warlords.

The operation backfired. When the payments to the warlords shifted the military balance of the country in their favor, the Islamists started a strike against the American-backed coalition and ran it out of Mogadishu.

Since June, the State Department has reasserted its control of Somalia policy, trying to build support for a plan to bolster the transitional government with peacekeeping troops from other African nations.

Ethiopia Forces Somali Islamist Retreat (FT)

By Andrew England

Financial Times, December 27, 2006

Islamist forces withdrew from frontline positions in central Somalia on Tuesday after days of bombardment by Ethiopian fighter jets and artillery that marked a dramatic escalation of the conflict in the Horn of Africa nation.

Ethiopia, which backs the weak Somali government, launched air strikes in Somalia on Sunday, following several days of fighting between the Islamists and the transitional administration's troops around the town of Baidoa, the government's seat.

Meles Zenawi, Ethiopia's prime minister, on Tuesday said between 3,000 and 4,000 Ethiopian troops had "broken the back" of the Islamist forces and that up to 1,000 Islamic fighters had been killed. "We have already completed half our mission, and as soon as we finish the second half, our troops will leave," he said.

The Somali parties have been at loggerheads since June after the Islamists seized the capital Mogadishu from a group of US-backed warlords. The Islamic Courts Union, an alliance of militias, then extended its area of control throughout much of southern Somalia, while the government, which is divided, unpopular in many areas and includes some of the country's notorious warlords, exerted little influence outside Baidoa.

However, the administration, formed two years ago at a UN-backed conference, is recognised by the international community. Addis Ababa repeatedly warned it would protect the government and its borders against any threat from the Islamists, but only acknowledged its direct military involvement in the conflict on Sunday with Mr Meles saying it had been "forced to enter a war".

Ethiopia is a key regional ally of the US and has a long history of Christian rule, but it also has a large Muslim population.

The air strikes were seen as an attempt to weaken and divide the Islamic alliance - which includes both conservatives and militant hardliners - and it was unclear how far Ethiopian troops would go inside Somalia, analysts said. The danger Addis Ababa faces is being dragged into a protracted guerrilla war it is unlikely to win if its forces move deeper into Somalia or attempt to enter Mogadishu. It could also increase support for the Islamists through its actions.

There have also been mounting concerns that an escalation could attract foreign Muslim militants and suck in neighbouring countries – both Ethiopia and Eritrea are accused of using Somalia as a proxy for their own border dispute.

"They [Ethiopia] could get bogged down and there would be no way out, like the Americans in Iraq," said Yemane Kidane, a former senior Ethiopian government official and analyst. "I don't think there will be a military solution but the Islamic courts have to calm down and realise they cannot do everything by force."

Mr Yemane and others said Eritrea's response to the escalation would be crucial as it backs the Islamists, a move thought to be motivated solely to counter Addis Ababa.

Sheikh Sharif Ahmed, a senior leader with the Islamists, said the war was "entering a new phase," and indicated the Islamists were preparing for guerrilla fighting. "We will fight Ethiopia for a long, long time and we expect the war to go every place," he said.

Analysts say that while the Islamists, which have no air power, had suffered losses, their withdrawal from positions around Baidoa appeared coordinated, suggesting it was not a spontaneous retreat.

The African Union, which is based in Addis Ababa, said it would meet today with the Arab League, which has mediated talks in Khartoum, and the Intergovernmental Authority on Development, a regional eastern African body, to see how a faltering peace process could be revived.

However, there appeared to be divisions within the AU, with Patrick Mazimhaka, the deputy AU commission chairman, saying Ethiopia had the right to defend itself.

"We think the situation was definitely getting out of hand because the Islamic courts took it upon themselves to threaten all the neighbours with war, including Ethiopia, and we say if Ethiopia found itself vulnerable they have the right to defend themselves," he told the FT. "What we are saying is the international community as a whole, the UN, the AU, we do support the transitional government of Somalia which took so much to put in place."

But Alpha Omar Konare, the commission's chairman, was later quoted in a statement saying he deeply regretted the escalation, calling for an end to the fighting and the resumption of dialogue.

Analysts, however, said Ethiopia's actions could embolden the Somali government and make it less willing to negotiate. Mr Meles has justified Ethiopia's action by saying it was forced to take "defensive measures," which would be "limited and proportional to the attacks launched against us and the dangers facing our country."

Both Addis Ababa and Washington accuse the Islamists of including and sheltering al-Qaida suspects, charges repeatedly denied by the courts' alliance. Somalia, a Muslim nation, has been without an effective government since 1991, and has been ruled by clan-based factions.

Many Somalis, while concerned about the extreme nature of some of the courts' leaders, had welcomed the Islamists for bringing a semblance of order to many areas for the first time in 15 years and filling the vacuum created in the absence of a state.

Ethiopians Closing In On Capital Of Somalia (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0109230

By Stephanie McCrummen

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

LONDON, Dec. 26 -- Ethiopian troops fought their way closer to the Somali capital of Mogadishu on Tuesday, pushing back militias loyal to the Islamic Courts movement that has until now controlled much of the country and vowed to wage a guerrilla war against Ethiopia lasting "years and years and years."

Aid workers said the number of injured had surpassed 800, as thousands of civilians battered by drought, floods and now rockets and mortars continued to flee villages in droves.

U.N. officials warned of a humanitarian crisis in Somalia, while fears remained high that Ethiopia's aggressive military campaign could have disastrous consequences not only for Somalia but across the Horn of Africa.

"I find it perplexing what the Ethiopians are up to," said David Shinn, a former U.S. ambassador to that country. "Over the long term, I don't see where this gets them. And one wonders how long they can hang on in this situation, because eventually it's going to turn into a nasty guerrilla war, and I don't think the Ethiopians have the stomach to carry on with that kind of campaign."

It was unclear Tuesday whether Ethiopian troops were preparing to invade Mogadishu or merely surround it.

But Shinn and others noted that a force of 15,000 troops had failed to subdue the capital in 1993, when 18 U.S. troops were killed in an incident depicted in the book and film "Black Hawk Down."

At a news conference in Addis Ababa, Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi said that he had no plans to push into Mogadishu but that the campaign was only half-completed. The only option now, he added, was to win.

He said that he was pleased at how swiftly the campaign had gone and that 3,000 to 4,000 Ethiopian troops had "broken the back" of the Islamic Courts movement, which he has repeatedly accused of supporting secessionist groups in Ethiopia.

As Ethiopian troops pushed ahead, however, the Islamic Courts militias appeared to withdraw almost simultaneously from their front line positions, suggesting a coordinated strategy rather than a chaotic retreat, analysts said.

It was unclear where the Islamic fighters went. Some were spotted with their battle gear around Mogadishu; analysts said it was likely that most headed into the bush to prepare for a war on their own terms.

"The Islamic Courts know they can't confront Ethiopian tanks and airplanes" with trucks mounted with machine guns and ground troops, Shinn said. "I think they'd love to suck Ethiopia deep into Somalia and then slowly try to pick them off as they get bogged down."

On Tuesday, Islamic Courts leader Sharif Ahmed again condemned the international community for failing to stop the Ethiopian attack, which is widely perceived to have U.S. support, and he said the war had "entered a new phase."

As the fighting continued, members of the U.N. Security Council called an emergency meeting in New York to discuss the conflict and consider a joint statement put forward by Qatar.

Ambassadors from the 15 countries on the council were briefed first by Secretary General Kofi Annan's special representative for Somalia, Francois Lonseny Fall, and then began debating the text of a statement calling for the withdrawal of Ethiopian forces from Somalia.

But U.S. diplomats said they would seek changes to the draft.

"We don't want to single out Ethiopia in that way and believe they have legitimate security concerns," a U.S diplomat said. "Our position is that we need all parties to return to dialogue."

The diplomat, who agreed to discuss aspects of the U.S. position in exchange for anonymity, said the United States would also push for a condemnation of the Islamic Courts' use of child soldiers in the conflict.

It was unclear whether the Security Council would be able to reach consensus on the statement before Wednesday. Meanwhile, a Somali envoy to Ethiopia said Ethiopian troops could take over Mogadishu in 24 to 48 hours.

State Department spokesman Gonzo Gallegos reiterated the U.S. position that Ethiopia "has genuine security concerns with regard to developments within Somalia and has provided support at the request of the legitimate governing authority."

President Bush spoke to Ugandan President Yoweri Museveni by telephone about the tension in the region, a White House spokesman said.

This month, faint hopes for a peaceful resolution to the conflict were pinned on a U.S.-sponsored U.N. resolution authorizing deployment of an African Union force, excluding Ethiopia and other neighboring states, to protect Somalia's interim government, which is in quasi-exile in the town of Baidoa, about 70 miles from Mogadishu.

The theory was that the force would remove Ethiopia from the volatile equation. But only Uganda has tentatively agreed to send troops to the African Union force, a commitment more recently in serious doubt. African Union officials have said any deployment could take months. And the Courts movement has said deployment of any such force would be considered an invasion.

Given those circumstances, some diplomats in the region have advanced a logic opposite that of the African Union deployment: to push for the complete withdrawal of all foreign forces.

A U.N. report this year found that at least 10 countries were in some way involved in the conflict in Somalia, a sign of the country's strategic importance in the region. And Monday, witnesses said fighters from Eritrea, a bitter foe of Ethiopia, as well as from Pakistan were among those fighting alongside the Islamic militias.

For his part, Meles has described his own military intervention as self-defense.

Ethiopia and the United States have accused the Courts movement of harboring terrorists, a charge the organization has denied. Opposition groups in Ethiopia have said Meles, who supplies intelligence to the United States on Somalia, has exaggerated the terrorism claim to win U.S. support as his increasingly authoritarian government stands accused of human rights violations.

The United States and Ethiopia have been of one mind that a complete takeover of Somalia by the Islamic Courts is unacceptable, because of fears that the country could become a base for Muslim extremists.

Yet U.S. policy in Somalia has been widely criticized for having the opposite of its intended effect, often encouraging the expansion of the Courts movement.

This year, the United States supported warlords who called themselves an "anti-terrorism" coalition. The warlords generally bribed and terrorized ordinary Somalis, who came to despise them. The Islamic Courts came to power as an alternative to the hated warlords, establishing order based on Islamic law village by village and earning widespread support from beleaguered Somalis tired of 15 years of near-anarchy.

More recently, perceived U.S. support for Ethiopia, and the U.S. sponsorship of the U.N. resolution calling for the African Union deployment, appears to have been used by the Courts movement to rally support.

Islamists Retreat In Somalia (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya, Dec. 26 — The Islamist forces once in control of much of Somalia are crumbling faster than anyone expected and beat a hasty retreat back to their stronghold in Mogadishu, Somalia's battle-scarred capital, on Tuesday.

By dawn, Buurhakaba, a large inland town, had fallen to the Islamists' rivals, along with nearby Dinsoor and Bulo Burti, where just a few weeks ago the clerics in charge were threatening to behead people who did not pray five times a day.

The Islamist fighters, who had seemed invincible after taking Mogadishu from the city's warlords in June, now seem powerless to stop the steady advance of the internationally recognized transitional government and the Ethiopian forces that are backing it.

By nightfall, the transitional government's troops were 50 miles from Mogadishu, calling for the Islamists to surrender. The Islamist leaders refused, saying they would take their fight "everywhere," possibly a threat to unleash guerrilla tactics and suicide bombers, which they have already used.

The fast-moving developments seemed to confirm what United Nations officials and witnesses in Somalia have been saying since the fighting erupted a week ago: that the teenage troops of the Islamists, however religiously inspired, were no match for the better-trained Ethiopian-backed force, with its tanks and fighter jets.

Ethiopia's prime minister, Meles Zenawi, said Tuesday that his soldiers and their Somali allies had "broken the back" of the Islamists and killed more than 1,000 fighters, though United Nations officials have put the toll substantially below that.

But the conflict is hardly over. Thousands of people continue to march through the streets of Mogadishu, rallying for the Islamists, and analysts are unanimous that an Ethiopian occupation of Mogadishu, a city thick with weapons and xenophobia, could become a bloodbath.

In Baidoa, the seat of the transitional government, leaders said they were planning to take the capital, where they had been afraid to work until now.

"It's just a matter of time," said Hussein Saylan, chief of the transitional cabinet, from a command center where radios crackled in the background. "We're moving swiftly toward Mogadishu, and the Islamists are panicking. We're finishing them off as we go."

Witnesses said Ethiopian fighter jets and helicopter gunships fired missiles at the retreating Islamists in pickup trucks — easy targets in the open desert.

In Mogadishu, the Islamists began fortifying the airport, radio station and other important buildings, preparing for a siege. Shopkeepers emptied their stores. Some families fled their homes and drove off with tents and water jugs in the back of their cars.

Western intelligence officials said soldiers from Eritrea were furiously distributing antiaircraft missiles to the Islamists, and residents in Mogadishu said they had already heard them being test fired. According to United Nations officials, thousands of fighters from Eritrea, Yemen, Syria and Libya have streamed into Somalia to wage a holy war against Ethiopia, a country with a long Christian history that today is about half Muslim.

Ethiopia and Eritrea are bitter enemies, having recently fought a costly border war that is still unresolved.

On Tuesday, Mr. Meles said, "The only forces we are pursuing are Eritreans who are hiding behind the skirts of Somali women."

Though diplomats in Africa have expressed concerns about the conflict in Somalia exploding into a wider regional war, most have been noticeably silent about Ethiopia's aggressive tactics. Ethiopian officials have said they sided with the transitional government because Somalia's Islamist movement was a regional menace.

Patrick Mazimhaka, a high-ranking African Union official, told the BBC that Ethiopia was within its rights to strike.

"It is up to every country to judge the measure of the threat to its own sovereignty," he said.

American officials have given Ethiopia, one its closest allies in Africa, their tacit approval to do what is necessary to neutralize the Islamists, whom American intelligence agents have accused of sheltering terrorists with Al Qaeda. But American officials have asked Ethiopia to avoid strikes that could kill large numbers of civilians, and so far Ethiopia seems to be cooperating.

On Tuesday, analysts in Nairobi said American surveillance planes were funneling battlefield intelligence to Ethiopian forces.

Maj. Kelley Thibodeau, spokeswoman for the task force of American military personnel based in nearby Djibouti, said she was "not at liberty to discuss" the matter.

Though there are more than 100 American soldiers training Ethiopian troops, Major Thibodeau said: "Officially, we haven't put anybody in Somalia. The Americans don't go forward with the Ethiopians. They are training Ethiopians in Ethiopia."

As the Ethiopian-backed forces continued their rout, it seemed that the Islamists might have overplayed their hand. Just a few months ago, the Islamists were the most powerful force in Somalia and popular in many areas for restoring order after 15 years of anarchy. The transitional government, an assortment of clan elders and former warlords, had been marooned in Baidoa, too weak to extend its authority beyond the city limits. Instead, it had been urging the Islamists to return to peace talks to discuss sharing power.

But all that changed last Wednesday at dawn, when the Islamists attacked Baidoa from two directions. Witnesses said waves of young fighters were summarily mowed down by the more experienced Ethiopian-backed troops. Then on Saturday, the Islamists announced that Somalia was open to Muslim fighters across the world who wanted to wage a jihad against Ethiopia.

The next day, Ethiopia struck, its military pushing deep into Somalia to begin wiping out the Islamist forces.

DOJ_NMG_0109233

"Our entire defense system was instantly overrun," said Ibrahim Diris, a medic for the Islamist forces who narrowly escaped capture in Buurhakaba. "They attacked us with tanks, planes, helicopters and infantry. Thank God they spared the ambulances."

The question now is whether Ethiopian forces will try to seize Mogadishu.

At the United Nations on Tuesday, the special envoy for Somalia, François Lonseny Fall, urged the Security Council to call for a cease-fire, saying that although the interim government's forces were advancing toward Mogadishu, they were "still facing stiff resistance" in several areas. Speaking at an emergency session, he said he feared that continuing violence could have "serious consequences" for the entire region.

Ethiopia's deputy foreign minister, Tekeda Alemu, said taking Mogadishu was not part of the plan.

"We are a poor country and we know that what we can accomplish is limited," he said. "We don't want to go into Mogadishu. We want the two sides to talk."

But neither side seemed ready to negotiate. "The war is entering a new phase," said Sheik Sharif Ahmed, a top Islamist leader. "We will fight Ethiopia for a long, long time and we expect the war to go everywhere."

The toll is piling up. At Benadir hospital in Mogadishu, a crowd of women pushed at the gates to see wounded sons and husbands. Some women threw stones at the Islamist commanders and shouted, "Fight your own holy war!"

What's Going On In Somalia? (WSJ)

By Jonathan Stevenson

The Wall Street Journal, December 27, 2006

Though 98% Muslim and long without a functioning government, southern Somalia has not, so far, ripened into the fully fledged terrorist threat that many have feared it would. This week, however, as Ethiopia engaged Islamist Somali militiamen, Somalia became the site of a nascent regional war. The primary combatants are Somalia's secular Transitional Federal Government (TFG), which is internationally recognized and politically supported by the U.S., and the Islamist "Islamic Courts Union" that holds sway on the ground. They are backed militarily by two fierce rivals, Ethiopia and Eritrea, respectively. The military balance appears indeterminate. Ethiopia has deployed 15-20,000 troops in Somalia. Eritrea has provided arms to the Islamic Courts militias and sent only about 2,000 troops to support them; but the Islamic Courts hold more territory than the TFG and have greater indigenous assets and popular support. Even if Somalia does not become a terrorist redoubt, it could become a potent fount of regional geopolitical instability and perhaps the next "field of jihad" unless diplomatic attention is rallied to rescue the situation. * * *

Ethiopia has a politically dominant Christian tradition and is vigorously opposed to Islamism. Al-Ittihad al-Islamiah, a Somali Islamist group aligned with the Islamic Courts, has sought to force the secession of Ethiopia's heavily ethnic Somali Ogaden region, and Ethiopian troops were responsible for eliminating several terrorist training camps run by al-Ittihad in the late 1990s. Although about half Muslim and half Christian, Eritrea's support for the Islamic Courts rests on its strategic enmity toward Ethiopia. The Islamic Courts are also politically and financially backed by several Muslim states, including Egypt, Djibouti, Iran, Saudi Arabia, Yemen, Libya and Sudan. Ethiopia's preventive intervention against the Islamic Courts -- tacitly approved by the U.S. -- prompted them to declare jihad against Ethiopia in November. Meanwhile, on Dec. 7 the U.N. Security Council unanimously adopted U.S.-sponsored Resolution 1725, authorizing the deployment of an African force in Somalia to protect the TFG and partially lifting a weapons embargo to Somali factions, which stands to strengthen the TFG and secular militias. The resolution spurred the Islamic Courts to declare jihad against any U.N.-sanctioned force, and the Eritrean government branded it "an attack on the Somali people." Foreign jihadists are reported to be infiltrating Somali territory already.

The volatile situation in Somalia presents the West with a thorny and immediate problem. To quell geopolitical tensions created by Ethiopia and Eritrea's intervention, a U.N.-sanctioned force would have to be led by a major power. Yet even if such a power could afford the troops and materiel, the insertion of a significant number of Western-led foreign troops would run the risk of attracting (as in Iraq) still more foreign jihadists to Somalia and inspiring terrorist attacks worldwide.

The U.N. and the African Union (AU) support the TFG, and the former has authorized peacekeeping troops. In hopes of minimizing regional tensions, the Security Council resolution bars the participation of neighboring nations Kenya and Djibouti as well as Ethiopia in any peacekeeping contingent, and limits the notional outside force to physically protecting the TFG in and near Baidoa, and to training TFG security forces. But there is little manpower available for any serious effort. The resolution also does not deal with foreign forces already in Somalia. While the resolution is nobly intended to promote political negotiations between the TFG and the Islamic Courts Union, coupled with Ethiopia's substantial military commitment to the TFG it may have had the effect of providing the TFG with enough political cover to defer dialogue. Furthermore, only Uganda has offered troops, and has done so ambivalently and against domestic public opinion. In any case, though trained by the French and the British, Ugandan troops would probably be both numerically and professionally inadequate.

Although Washington would probably provide logistical support and some funding for a Uganda-led force, it has essentially charged Uganda and the Intergovernmental Authority on Development (IGAD) -- most of whose members (Djibouti, Eritrea, Sudan and, less rigidly, Kenya) oppose intervention -- with executing Resolution 1725. Accordingly, the military mission, in any case of dubious political value, is unlikely to gather momentum. Meanwhile, rough military parity allows the two Somali factions to procrastinate diplomatically.

While at times disingenuously denying that it has deployed troops in Somalia, Ethiopia has indicated that any troops are intended as a deterrent and that it is not eager to engage in a long war. The Islamic Courts, for their part, have demonstrated a degree of caution. Fatalities still probably number only dozens rather than hundreds. Thus far, the major powers have tacitly allowed Ethiopia and Eritrea to keep assets deployed in Somalia while pressuring both to refrain from escalating to all-out war. But these weak constraints cannot produce operational equilibrium between the TFG and the Islamic Courts Union for long enough to allow effective major-power attention to gravitate to Somalia before war arises.

Absent an unattainably strong peace-enforcement contingent, the only solution would appear to be robust diplomacy aimed at stabilizing the Somali situation by a power-sharing arrangement between the TFG and the Islamic Courts. Both the U.N. and the AU, as well as the U.S. and key European capitals, however, have their hands full with even more pressing regional matters, such as Darfur. Indeed, all save the AU are overstretched by Iraq, Afghanistan and the campaign against Islamist terrorism. They cannot be expected to devote serious diplomatic attention to Somalia in the short term. While Yemen and the Arab League have made attempts to facilitate dialogue, they are not likely to have the influence to close a sustainable deal.

The EU, however, has shown appreciation for the gravity of the crisis. On Dec. 8, EU development minister Louis Michel held separate talks with the TFG and the Islamic Courts in hopes of lowering tensions, albeit to no clear avail. Kenya, the most effective broker in the region on Somali issues, has sponsored the TFG. But Nairobi -- constrained by a rising cross-border threat from the Islamic Courts and political pressures from its own substantial ethnic Somali population -- has defaulted to a position of "neutrality." Since open conflict could send hundreds of thousands of refugees over its border, however, Nairobi may abandon timidity and push for negotiations. Religious leaders in Kenya have urged as much. With the EU's diplomatic sponsorship and residual U.S. support, such an effort might enforce a pause and bring the four principals -- the TFG, the Islamic Courts, Ethiopia and Eritrea -- to the table. Otherwise, only further escalation is likely to bring decisive major-power attention to the Horn of Africa.

IN THE PAST week a dangerous round of warfare has erupted in Somalia, a failed state in the Horn of Africa that the United States tried in vain to rebuild in the early 1990s. Troops from neighboring Ethiopia who were defending a U.N.-backed transitional government were attacked by forces of the Islamic Courts movement, which for the past six months has controlled much of the southern part of the country. Ethiopia responded by launching a full-scale offensive against the Islamists; by yesterday its forces had captured several towns and were said to be advancing toward Mogadishu, the capital.

For the Bush administration there was both good and bad news in these developments. The Islamic Courts movement poses a potentially serious security threat to the United States: Its leadership includes a U.S.-designated terrorist, and it is known to be harboring al-Qaeda militants, including several who helped carry out the 1998 bombings of U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania. In recent months it has been inviting radical Muslims to Somalia, and thousands have reportedly arrived from such countries as Syria, Yemen and Libya. In short, the Courts-controlled portion of Somalia has begun to look a lot like Afghanistan under the Taliban before Sept. 11, 2001.

Ethiopia's actions, however, are problematic. The country's autocratic government and a slight majority of its population are Christian; this has fueled resistance to its intervention from Somalis and Muslim governments that might not otherwise support the fundamentalist Courts. According to U.S. and U.N. reports, millions of dollars in funding and arms have flowed to the Islamists from Saudi Arabia, Egypt and other Arab states, while neighboring Eritrea, a bitter adversary of Ethiopia, has deployed its own troops. Some experts warn that the fighting could morph into a regional war; others say Ethiopia could get bogged down in a prolonged guerrilla war with local and foreign Muslim insurgents.

Having floundered through a series of failed Somalia strategies, the administration appears to have a somewhat confused view of the latest fighting. Earlier this month it pushed for a U.N. Security Council resolution that called for an end to foreign intervention, the deployment of a peacekeeping force and negotiations between the rival Somali governments. President Bush spoke yesterday with the president of Uganda, which had offered peacekeepers. Yet even while reiterating its call for negotiations, the administration also appears to be supporting the Ethiopian offensive: The State Department said that Ethiopia had a right to defend itself against the Islamists and that its troops were there at the invitation of a legitimate authority, the transitional government.

Maybe the Ethiopian forces will crush the Islamists and their al-Qaeda allies and thereby rescue the United States from its predicament. More likely, the administration will have to prepare for much more active U.S. engagement in what is emerging as a hot new front in the war on terrorism.

TEHRAN, Iran (AP) — Iran's parliament voted Wednesday to urge the government to "revise" ties with the U.N. nuclear agency in a move seen as likely to reduce the country's cooperation with the international atomic authority.

The vote came four days after the U.N. Security Council decided to impose limited sanctions on Iran for its refusal to cease enrichment of uranium — a process that produces the material for either nuclear reactors or bombs.

Members of Iran's ruling hierarchy had repeatedly urged the government to cut ties with the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N.'s nuclear watchdog, if the Security Council imposes sanctions.

Wednesday's vote in parliament stopped short of recommending a severance of relations with the IAEA, but it put the Vienna-based agency on notice that business would not be as usual.

The bill said that the government was "obliged to accelerate the country's peaceful nuclear program and revise in its cooperation with the International Atomic Energy Agency based on national interests."

In a session broadcast live on state radio, parliamentary speaker Gholam Ali Haddad Adel said: "Some 161 out of 203 present legislators voted in favor of the bill."

Fifteen legislators voted against the bill, and another 15 abstained.

The government supported the bill. "This is a very helpful proposal," Deputy Foreign Minister Hamid Reza Asefi told the assembly. "I ask legislators to vote for it."

The Guardian Council, a constitutional watchdog controlled by hard-line clerics, approved the bill very quickly — showing how seriously the ruling hierarchy regarded the move.

"I was informed that the Guardian Council also approved the bill, minutes after the parliament," said deputy speaker Mohammad Reza Bahnoar.

Before the vote, speaker Haddad Adel said the bill would not bind the government to a particular course of action.

"The bill gives a free hand to the government to decide on a range of reactions — from leaving the Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty to remaining in the International Atomic Energy Agency and negotiating. We trust the government," Haddad Adel said.

Some legislators pushed for a bill that took a more aggressive line against the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency, which they accused of being dominated by the United States.

"The draft is not appropriate to the United States' animosity to Iran," said legislator Hassan Kamran. "This is a weak draft. It should be stronger."

But other legislators said the bill should be thrown out.

"There is no need for the bill. We should lessen tensions," said legislator Noureddin Pirmoazzen.

The bill will take effect 15 days after it is signed by President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who has ardently championed the nuclear program.

The United States and some allies accuse Iran of using a civilian nuclear program as a cover for developing a nuclear bomb. Iran denies this, saying its program is strictly for generating electricity from nuclear fuel.

Iran Parliament Debates Reply To U.N. Penalties (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

TEHRAN, Dec. 26 — Parliament began debate on Tuesday on how to respond to sanctions imposed by a United Nations Security Council resolution on Saturday, but two high-level officials said they doubted that Iran would bar nuclear inspectors and drop out of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

Before the Security Council vote, hard-line politicians and conservative newspapers in Iran had called for taking those strong actions.

Kazem Jalali, an influential member of Parliament and its foreign policy committee, said it did not appear to be the right time to bar United Nations' inspectors or withdraw from the treaty, although he reserved Iran's right to do so later.

Muhammad Saeedi, the deputy leader of the country's Atomic Energy Organization, doubted a majority in Parliament wanted to pull out.

"They are upset about the resolution, but Parliament will make a reasonable decision," he said.

The Security Council resolution is meant to curb Iran's nuclear program and bans the import and export of materials and technology used in uranium enrichment, reprocessing and ballistic missiles. The resolution, weaker than what the United States proposed, has been debated in the United Nations since Iran ignored Council calls to suspend nuclear activities by Aug. 31.

Iran says its nuclear program is allowed under the treaty and is intended for domestic energy production. The United States and others contend that the program is a cover for a plan to produce nuclear bombs.

The discussions in Parliament were at an early stage on Tuesday, and no consensus was reached about what action should be taken, if any.

Newspapers here have been prohibited from criticizing Iran's nuclear policy, and none have done so.

But this week, several moderate newspapers indicated in editorials that the sanctions might have a greater economic effect than the government had acknowledged. Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, has vowed that the sanctions will not prevent the country from proceeding with its nuclear program.

An editorial on Tuesday in the daily, Aftab-e-Yazd, said an "unreasonable and emotional" reaction to the sanctions could be very dangerous.

Iran 'revises' Co-operation With IAEA (FT)

By Najmeh Bozorgmehr

Financial Times, December 27, 2006

Iran's parliament on Tuesday considered a plan to "revise" the country's co-operation with the International Atomic Energy Agency in response a vote by the UN Security Council to impose sanctions on Iran's trade in sensitive nuclear materials and technology.

Saturday's UN vote, aimed at dissuading Iran from carrying out uranium enrichment activities that could produce material to be used in a nuclear weapon, was dismissed by President Ahmadi-Nejad on Sunday as "illegal" and "superficial".

Manouchehr Mottaki, Iran's foreign minister, who attended a closed parliamentary session on Tuesday to discuss Iran's response, told reporters that the government fully endorsed parliament's plan, although it was not clear whether the move would be anything other than symbolic.

Iran's policy seems to be neither to accept the UN demand, nor make any immediate threats to withdraw from the Non-Proliferation Treaty or to deliberately upset the oil market.

"MPs reiterated that we should not take any provocative step," Ali Asgari, an MP told reporters after the meeting. "But we should have some surprising moves."

He may have been referring to a statement by Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear official immediately after the UN vote, who said Iran would go ahead with installing 3,000 centrifuges in its pilot plant of Natanz. Mr Mottaki said the centrifuges would start enrichment "soon".

Experts believe that 2,000 centrifuges can produce sufficient highly-enriched uranium for a reactor or a bomb. Iran denies any military purposes for its nuclear programme, which it says it is merely for civilian purposes.

Analysts say Iran's president believes sanctions will not hurt Iran and that the country should not show any sign of retreat. However, the country's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, who is thought to be the key decision maker, has not yet reacted to the UN resolution.

Iran To Hasten Nuclear Work Despite U.N. Vote (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 26, 2006

Iran condemned a U.N. sanctions resolution as "a piece of torn paper" that wouldn't scare Tehran and vowed over the weekend to speed up uranium-enrichment work.

The U.N. Security Council voted unanimously Saturday to impose sanctions on Iran's trade in sensitive nuclear materials and technology, in an attempt to stop uranium-enrichment work that could produce material to be used in bombs. Iranian analysts said it could chase away foreign investment needed to create jobs.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said the U.N. resolution -- drawn up by Britain, France and Germany and supported unanimously by the Security Council -- could change Iran's relationship with the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N.'s nuclear watchdog. Iran has already banned IAEA snap inspections of its nuclear plants in February as a response to the referral of its nuclear case to the Security Council.

Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, said the resolution made his country more "decisive in realizing our nuclear aims." He said it would step up enrichment activities. "From Sunday morning, we will begin activities at Natanz" the site of 3,000 centrifuge machines, Iran's Kayhan newspaper quoted Mr. Larijani as saying. It was unclear whether the work began Sunday.

China urged a resumption of talks to defuse the confrontation, and French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy said on France Inter radio, "I would not want to see Iran fall into a spiral that would be an isolationist spiral."

Iran, which has said it is making uranium for civilian-power purposes, has refused to end its nascent uranium-enrichment work in exchange for economic incentives. The resolution demands Iran end all research on uranium enrichment, which can produce fuel for nuclear power plants as well as for bombs, and halt all research and development on methods of producing or delivering atomic weapons.

The sanctions ban imports and exports of dangerous materials and technology relating to uranium enrichment, reprocessing and heavy-water reactors, as well as ballistic-missile-delivery systems. A ban on Iran's oil exports wasn't considered.

Russia was successful in scrapping a mandatory travel ban. Instead, the resolution calls on states to notify a Security Council sanctions committee if any of the individuals on the list are in their countries. Russia, which is building an $800-million light-water reactor for Tehran that is exempt from the resolution, has tried to maintain close ties with Iran but is also concerned about any bomb-making intentions Iran may have.

The resolution brought is under a section of the U.N. Charter that makes enforcement mandatory but restricts action to nonmilitary measures. It includes a freeze on financial assets abroad of 12 individuals and 10 organizations from Iran associated with nuclear programs to prevent them from buying dangerous materials. There are numerous qualifications, including exempting contracts made prior to the adoption of the resolution.

Iran Summons UK Ambassador Over Blair Remarks (AFP)

AFP, December 27, 2006

Iran summoned Britain's ambassador in Tehran to its foreign ministry to hear its "strong objections" to British Prime Minister Tony Blair's claim that the Islamic republic poses a threat to the region.

DOJ_NMG_0109238

The official IRNA agency said Geoffrey Adams was told by Ibrahim Rahimpour, the foreign ministry's director general for western European affairs, that Iran expects Britain "to stop the tirade of allegations" against it.

"Tony Blair has brought up baseless charges against Iran to cover up his failure in Iraq, Afghanistan and the Middle East, but to no avail," Rahimpour was quoted as telling the ambassador.

Rahimpour also criticised Britain for misrepresenting Iran's civilian nuclear program, after it co-sponsored a UN Security Council resolution last Saturday that imposed sanctions on Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programmes.

"The resolution will not have any impact on the national resolve to produce nuclear energy in line with Non-Proliferation Treaty," he said.

In a speech in Dubai on December 20 during a Middle East tour, Blair accused Iran of being an obstacle to peace and urged moderate countries in the region to form an alliance to oppose Tehran's support for extremism.

"We must recognise the strategic challenge the government of Iran poses, not its people, not possibly all of its ruling elements but those presently in charge of its policy," Blair said.

IRNA reported that Rahimpour recalled to Adams "the well-known strategy of the British colonial 'divide and rule' (policy), and said that Blair resorted to anti-Iran propaganda during his Middle East tour".

On Israel, Rahimpour was quoted as saying that "the occupying regime is passing through critical condition and Blair could do nothing to change the situation in Israel".

"Palestinian and Lebanese people are defending their own rights to the dismay of the occupying regime," Rahimpour said.

IRNA quoted Adams, who has been London's ambassador to Tehran since April 1 this year, saying that he could not interpret Blair's statement, but that he would pass along Iran's protest to his government.

Regarding the "anti-Iran resolution" adopted unanimously by the Security Council, Adams said that Britain was not the only state to vote for it.

Iran Irresolution (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 27, 2006

Among the least surprising news coming out of the holiday weekend is that Iran denounced even the U.N. Security Council's tepid sanctions resolution against its nuclear weapons program. More surprising -- and encouraging -- is that the U.S. State Department also seems unenthusiastic.

"From Sunday morning we will begin activities at Natanz," said Ali Larjani, Iraq's top nuclear negotiator about the site of its 3,000 centrifuge machines for enriching uranium. "And we will drive it with full speed. It will be our immediate response to the resolution."

And why should Iran react with any greater concern, since the language of the U.N. resolution was at most a wrist slap at Tehran for years of violating its promises under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty? Four months after Iran rejected the U.N.'s August 31 deadline for ending its nuclear enrichment plans, the most the Security Council could unite behind was a narrow freeze on the assets of 10 companies and 12 individuals related to the program.

The resolution's order that countries stop supplying material for Iran's nuclear effort carves out a huge loophole for Bushehr, the Russian-supplied light-water reactor. Even a proposed international travel ban on Iranian officials was dropped in the end at Russian insistence. As John McEnroe might describe this resolution: "You cannot be serious!"

The charade was even more than the State Department could bear to endorse wholeheartedly. Nicholas Burns, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's right-hand man, praised the resolution for isolating Iran but added that "We don't think this resolution is enough in itself." And he suggested that the U.S. would now work to form coalitions outside of the U.N. to add pressure on Tehran. It's about time.

The aftermath of the resolution coincided with reports that coalition troops had captured Iranians helping insurgents in Iraq. This ought to underscore to Americans just how much Iran's leaders are trying to damage U.S. interests in the Middle East. These are the same Iranians with whom Jim Baker and Lee Hamilton and most of the U.S. foreign policy establishment want to negotiate; perhaps if the U.S. allows them to become a nuclear power, Iranian leaders will then agree to help kill fewer GIs.

As his Presidency grows shorter, Mr. Bush is going to have to decide how much longer he can afford to let diplomacy dominate his Iran strategy. The mullahs in Tehran have made clear their determination to build a nuclear weapon; the West has yet to show any comparable determination to stop them.

Assad Inspires 'Flip' Theories (WT)

By Iason Athanasiadis

The Washington Times, December 27, 2006

TEHRAN -- Recent visits by Syrian President Bashar Assad to U.S.-allied Yemen and the United Arab Emirates are prompting speculation that Syria is seeking to leave the Iranian orbit and pursue closer ties with the West.

Such a move would fulfill a major recommendation of the Iraq Study Group, headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton, which suggested it might be possible through diplomacy to pry Syria away from Iran.

"Bashar was recently invited to Tehran by [President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad as part of the Iranian effort to demonstrate regional leadership -- but he failed to show up, without even offering a public excuse," said Gary Sick, a U.S. foreign policy analyst who served on the National Security Council under Presidents Ford, Carter and Reagan.

"If you put this together with the 'Obaid initiative' to mobilize Arab action to stop Iran's encroachment in Iraq, it almost has the appearance of a regionally coordinated campaign."

Nawaf Obaid was fired this month as a Saudi foreign policy adviser after publishing an article saying, among other things, that Saudi Arabia could reduce Iran's regional prominence by raising oil production high enough to slash the price by half. Oil revenues are a crucial source of foreign currency for Iran.

Mr. Assad's talks in Yemen 11 days ago reportedly dealt with regional issues, including the infighting in the Palestinian territories, instability in Lebanon, Iran's nuclear program, Iraq and Somalia.

But eyebrows were raised by the timing of the trip, which came just two days after a visit to Yemen by U.S. Assistant Secretary for Near Eastern Affairs David Welch.

"I'll leave it to President [Ali Abdullah] Saleh to convey their views to President Assad," Mr. Welch said of the timing. "They know the views of the United States."

In another apparent overture yesterday, Mr. Assad told visiting Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, that he was willing to host a conference where all the factions of Iraq could seek a consensus on the country's future.

Graham Fuller, former vice chairman of the U.S. National Intelligence Council, expressed skepticism that Mr. Assad's travels represented some kind of back-channel negotiation with Washington.

He said he considered it "much more likely that Gulf leaders are wooing Assad as an intermediary to Iran to transmit their concerns and hopefully to achieve greater Iranian moderation."

Iranian analysts also doubt that Mr. Assad will give up his role as the western anchor of an anti-U.S. axis running from Tehran through Iraq and Syria to Hezbollah-controlled southern Lebanon.

"It would be rather unrealistic to consider that Syria, a poor and isolated country, would distance itself from Iran, a rich and effective actor, which can offer Syria security and financial help in an unfortunate situation," said Kayhan Barzegar, a professor of foreign affairs at Tehran's Islamic Azad University.

"The two have strategic interests to stay together right now."

Hasan Akhtari, Iran's ambassador to Damascus, acknowledged to the London-based pan-Arab newspaper Al-Hayat that "some people" think Syrian-Iranian relations are deteriorating. But, he said, "We aren't worried ... because we know that this isn't happening and will not happen."

Nevertheless, Syria has faced immense pressure since the assassination two years ago of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, for which it has been widely blamed. Lacking a strong army and without substantial oil reserves, it is the weak link -- and the only Sunni member -- in the Iranian Shi'ite-led alliance.

The report of the Iraq Study Group urged the United States to try to "flip" Syria, disrupting the uninterrupted land bridge from Tehran to the Mediterranean and cutting off the arms supply chain to Hezbollah.

"If that's what's going on, the UAE visit after the snub of Iran may be early signs of success," Mr. Sick said.

Any successful effort to woo Mr. Assad away from Iran would likely involve a deal with Israel for the return to Syria of the Golan Heights, which Israel captured in 1967.

Syria's political class is almost unanimous in the belief that now is the time to negotiate such a deal, while Israel is on the defensive over failing to crush Syrian ally Hezbollah during its August offensive in southern Lebanon. Mr. Assad has made repeated overtures to Israel seeking peace talks.

Former Iranian Deputy Foreign Minister Mahmoud Vaezi indicated last year that Tehran was less than fully confident of Syria's loyalty, saying Mr. Assad "will receive our diplomatic support. More than that depends on what kind of positions Syria will adopt."

Several analysts, however, cautioned against expecting a quick change of direction from the Syrian president.

"The Assads of Syria are currently being wooed by one and all," said Ammar Abdulhamid, a Syrian dissident and fellow of the Saban Center for Middle East Policy at the Brookings Institution. "But soon everybody will be wowed by how little they actually have to offer and by how bent they are on overplaying their hand."

'Syria Is Ready And Willing To Engage' (USAT)

Imad Moustapha, Ph.D., Ambassador of the Syrian, Arab Republic to the USA - Washington

It is always refreshing to hear moderate, wise voices from the United States calling for what diplomacy is really about: dialogue and engagement ("A two-way street with Syria," The Forum, Dec. 20).

Syria has repeatedly called upon this administration to abandon its policies toward Syria and work together toward a more constructive policy in the Middle East. Former secretaries of State Colin Powell, Madeleine Albright and James Baker — who, unlike Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, had a direct working relationship with Syria — consider their engagement with Syria as one that served U.S. national interests.

Syria is ready and willing to engage, but this needs courage and vision from the other side.

Israel Settlement Breaks Promise To U.S. (AP)

By Ravi Nessman

AP, December 27, 2006

Israel has approved a new settlement in the West Bank to house former Jewish settlers from the Gaza Strip, officials said Tuesday, breaking a promise to the U.S. to halt home construction in the Palestinian territories.

Construction in the northern West Bank town of Maskiot began months ago, but the project only received final approval from the Defense Ministry last week, said Dubi Tal, head of the Jordan Valley regional council.

Saeb Erekat, an aide to Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, condemned the construction and urged the government to revoke its authorization, saying it violated the spirit of cooperation inaugurated by a meeting Saturday between Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

"What message are they trying to send?" Erekat asked.

The settlement will house 23 families who were evacuated when Israel withdrew from the Gaza Strip last year, and will eventually house 100 families, Tal said. "I estimate that within two or three weeks the foundations for temporary housing will begin," he said.

Olmert has signaled in recent weeks that he is ready to make broad territorial concessions to the Palestinians under a final peace settlement, but he has also said he wants Israel to retain large settlement blocs. The Palestinians claim all of the West Bank, captured by Israel in the 1967 Middle East war, as part of a future independent state.

Under the stalled, U.S.-backed "road map" peace plan, Israel pledged to freeze all settlement expansion, while the Palestinians promised to crack down on militants. Neither side has followed through.

"The U.S. view on settlements remains unchanged," said Geoff Anisman, a spokesman for the U.S. Embassy in Tel Aviv. "The U.S. continues to urge both sides to meet their road map obligations and to avoid taking steps that could be viewed as predetermining the outcome of final status negotiations."

Saturday's Olmert-Abbas summit sought to build on momentum from an Israeli cease-fire with the Palestinians in the Gaza Strip, which took effect last month. Olmert made a series of gestures to the moderate Palestinian leader, offering to lift some West Bank checkpoints and unfreeze hundreds of millions of dollars in withheld tax funds.

On Sunday, Olmert indicated he might release some Palestinian prisoners in the coming days, softening his long-standing opposition to such a move.

Despite the truce, Gaza militants launched seven rockets into Israel on Tuesday, hitting a street in the town of Sderot and seriously wounding two 13-year-old boys, Israeli officials said. The Islamic Jihad militant group claimed responsibility for all the attacks.

Militants have launched about 60 rockets since the truce was declared, and Israeli officials have warned their patience is waning.

"Israel has been displaying restraint, but this restraint will not continue indefinitely while Israelis continue to be attacked," said David Baker, an official in Olmert's office.

Security officials said Defense Minister Amir Peretz urged Olmert late Tuesday to reconsider his policy of restraint in the face of the rocket barrages.

Meanwhile, Israeli troops shot and seriously injured a Palestinian near the fence separating Israel and the Gaza Strip. Palestinian officials said the man was a farmer working near the fence. The army said two Palestinians were attempting to sabotage part of the fence and ignored warning shots before troops opened fire, hitting one in the legs.

In an effort to push forward with peace efforts, Olmert and Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, a key mediator between Israel and the Palestinians, will meet next week in the Red Sea resort of Sharm el-Sheik, an Israeli government official said.

The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the meeting had not been officially announced, did not say what day it would take place.

Egypt has played a major role in mediating between Israel and the Palestinians, and has been trying to negotiate the release of an Israeli soldier captured by militants linked to Hamas, the militant group that controls the Palestinian parliament and Cabinet and is a rival to Abbas' Fatah.

The rivalry between the two Palestinian groups has broken out into open street battles in Gaza in recent weeks.

Jordanian leaders have invited both Abbas and Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas for talks in Amman in an effort to bridge the divide. Negotiations over forming a national unity government broke down last month, and Abbas has threatened to call early elections.

Jordan's Prime Minister Marouf al-Bakhit told reporters Tuesday that his country "has specific ideas to help the two sides to reach a unity government solution." He did not elaborate or say when the meeting would take place.

Haniyeh said Tuesday that he planned to accept the invitation. "We hope this will be a blessed opening for national unity."

Despite Pledge, Israel Approves New Settlement (WP/AP)

JERUSALEM, Dec. 26 -- Israel has approved a new settlement in the West Bank to house former Jewish settlers from the Gaza Strip, officials said Tuesday, breaking a promise to the United States to halt home construction in the Palestinian territories.

Israel Plans First Settlement In 10 Years (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

JERUSALEM, Dec. 26 — Israel announced plans on Tuesday to construct a Jewish settlement in the occupied West Bank for the first time in 10 years, prompting Palestinian anger and American concern.

The announcement, by the Defense Ministry and settler groups, seemed to run counter to the prevailing effort by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who had offered a series of gestures to the Palestinians several days ago, after meeting with the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas.

Even before that meeting, Mr. Abbas was being criticized by his political rivals, Hamas, who preach Israel's destruction, for carrying out what they called an Israeli and American agenda with little to show for it.

One Israeli official hinted that the new settlement might be part of a deal with Jewish settlers to get their tacit acceptance of the removal of illegal settlement outposts from the West Bank.

Another Israeli official, however, insisted that the settlement was not "new," exactly, but a revival of a settlement approved in 1981, which had become a military training site by the mid-1990s.

The defense minister, Amir Peretz, the dovish leader of the Labor Party, gave his approval to a promise made by his predecessor — Shaul Mofaz, the current transport minister — that houses would be built on the site of an army base in the northern Jordan Valley to resettle some Israelis forced to leave settlements in the Gaza Strip in 2005, according to a Defense Ministry official.

Pressed by Washington to help build up Mr. Abbas, Mr. Olmert promised last week to give him $100 million in Palestinian funds withheld by Israel, about 20 percent of the amount being held, but only for humanitarian purposes.

Abbas aides, however, said the money would be used to strengthen his Fatah movement and pay salaries to Fatah loyalists. Mr. Olmert also promised to dismantle 27 of the 400 or so checkpoints in the West Bank, despite criticism by Israel's West Bank commander.

Additionally complicating matters, Islamic Jihad on Tuesday fired seven more Qassam rockets into Israel from Gaza, including one that seriously wounded two teenagers in the border town of Sderot.

The planned new settlement will be called Maskiot, and approval was given for the construction of some 30 houses. The Israeli official insisted that all construction would be privately financed.

The housing will be used by the 20 families of the hawkish Gaza settlement Shirat Hayam, which resisted evacuation. To get them to leave Gaza peacefully, the army promised to keep them together.

The decision, the official said, "sort of went through and now it's done and would be very hard to undo."

Israel essentially decided to stop the building of settlements in 1992 when Yitzhak Rabin became prime minister, although it has allowed existing settlements to grow, even as it has publicly promised to freeze settlement activity under the so-called road map for peace.

Emily Amrusy, a spokeswoman for the settlers' council known as Yesha, said that the families would move into trailers on the site while construction began on more permanent housing.

A spokeswoman for the American consulate in Jerusalem, which deals with the West Bank, said a new settlement would be troubling. "We're looking into it, and if turns out to be a new settlement, we would be very concerned, given Israel's obligations under the road map," said Micaela Schweitzer-Bluhm, the spokeswoman.

The road map calls for a freeze in settlement building in the first phase and a Palestinian push to dismantle terrorist groups. Israel says that the dismantling should come first and that no such action has taken place. But it has separately promised the Bush administration that it would build only within existing settlement structures to account for natural growth, "thickening" the settlements but not expanding them physically.

Israel also promised that it would dismantle more than 20 illegal outposts set up since March 2001, but it has dismantled only one, under an Israeli court order. Peace Now, a leftwing Israeli lobby that opposes the settlements and follows them closely, says that there have been more than 50 outposts established illegally since March 2001, and that there are more than 100 illegal outposts in the West Bank altogether, many of them, like the semi-settlement of Migron, built on private Palestinian land.

Much of the world considers all Israeli settlements in the West Bank to be illegal under international law; the United States, which used to call them illegal, now calls them "obstacles to peace" that prejudge final-status negotiations. The outposts are illegal under Israeli law because the government has not authorized them.

An aide to Mr. Abbas said the announcement ran counter to understandings Mr. Olmert and Mr. Abbas reached at their meeting Saturday night. "We condemn this act and this decision, especially as it comes after the Israeli side committed itself to stop all unilateral actions," the aide, Saeb Erekat, told Agence France-Presse. "This is certain to destroy the atmosphere created after the meeting with Olmert, where they committed to many issues, especially to stop unilateral actions."

The Palestinians want to establish an independent state in the West Bank, Gaza Strip and East Jerusalem and consider any Israeli building there to be an act of thievery. Israel says that it accepts the idea of a Palestinian state but that the exact contours have to be negotiated.

Yariv Oppenheimer, director of Peace Now, criticized the decision on new construction as contrary to the government's stated aims and programs and noted that it had not been approved by Parliament. "This is a veritable scandal, all the more so that this decision was taken by Amir Peretz," himself a former advocate with Peace Now, Mr. Oppenheimer said. What may begin with 30 houses could easily become more because of "thickening," Peace Now said.

There have also been reports that some settlers have moved temporarily into the ruins of the Homesh settlement in the West Bank, one of four West Bank settlements destroyed along with the Gaza settlements in 2005.

Of the seven Qassam rockets fired into Israel on Tuesday by Islamic Jihad from Gaza, one hit Ashkelon and two reached Sderot, seriously wounding the two teenagers, one critically; both were being treated at a hospital.

The injuries will put more pressure on Mr. Olmert to respond militarily. Since a supposed cease-fire was agreed to on Nov. 26 between the Palestinians and Israel, more than 55 Qassams have been fired from Gaza, about half of which have landed in Israel. The truce did not include the West Bank, but Islamic Jihad says its rocket firing is a response to Israeli military actions there.

On Tuesday, Israel arrested an Islamic Jihad commander, Mahmoud Saadi, 26, in the northern West Bank town of Jenin. Israel also announced the arrest in Ramallah on Nov. 2 of a senior commander of Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades, Muhammad Sayidi, 36, who had been wanted for several years on charges of killing an Israeli in 2000.

Separately, Israeli officials said that Mr. Olmert would travel to Egypt, probably on Jan. 4, to meet the Egyptian president, Hosni Mubarak, and Palestinian officials said that Mr. Abbas and Prime Minister Ismail Haniya of Hamas were expected to meet soon in Jordan for further discussions on how to end their political impasse and the violence between their factions.

Israel's Mixed Messages (NYT)

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

The Israeli prime minister, Ehud Olmert, took some encouraging steps over the weekend to ease the frustrations Palestinians face at West Bank and Gaza checkpoints. He hoped in that way to strengthen Mahmoud Abbas, the embattled moderate who presides over the Palestinian Authority. Unfortunately, Israel's defense minister, Amir Peretz, has undercut these moves by approving the first new West Bank settlement in more than a decade.

Israel's space for peace diplomacy is tightly constrained. It must reckon with a Hamas-led Palestinian cabinet that denies its right to exist and rejects the very notion of a negotiated peace. Yet those facts of Mideast life do not justify authorizing a new settlement. That self-defeating move adds nothing to Israel's security and needlessly complicates the quest for an eventual negotiated peace.

We hope Mr. Olmert or Israel's Parliament can reverse Mr. Peretz's damaging decision, taken in defiance of the international road map for Middle East peace, which Israel's governing coalition has pledged to support.

Meanwhile, Mr. Olmert's positive gestures still deserve recognition, although the hoped-for benefits to Mr. Abbas may now be lost. More than two dozen military checkpoints in the West Bank will be removed and Israel will take steps to ease the passage of goods in and out of the Palestinian-ruled Gaza Strip. These steps should reduce the day-to-day humiliation and economic suffering of hundreds of thousands of ordinary Palestinians.

In addition, Israel will turn over $100 million of the $500 million in Palestinian tax revenue it has withheld since Hamas came to power. This page supports freezing aid to the Hamas government. But tax revenue to which the Palestinians are legally entitled should never have been withheld.

Compared to the sweeping visions of the Oslo peace agreements, or Ariel Sharon's bold Gaza withdrawal, Mr. Olmert's gestures look modest. Yet in today's unpromising circumstances, with Mr. Olmert damaged by the Lebanon war and Mr. Abbas so far unable to nudge Hamas toward moderation, they approach the limits of the possible. Unfortunately, it has become traditional in Israel to balance constructive gestures with sops to the politically potent settlers movement. The settlers' agenda is not supported by a majority of Israelis. But no recent government has felt strong enough to resist their demands. Even when Mr. Sharon faced them down over Gaza, he compensated them with promises to expand existing West Bank settlements. Mr. Peretz has gone one regrettable step further by approving a wholly new settlement whose aim is to relocate settlers uprooted from Gaza last year.

Today, the idea of a comprehensive peace between Israelis and Palestinians seems a distant dream. Yet it represents the best long-term assurance of Israel's survival as a secure Jewish democracy at peace with its Arab neighbors. Every new settlement planted on the West Bank creates a needless obstacle to the realization of that dream.

Mubarak Vows Greater Democracy (WP/AP)

CAIRO, Dec. 26 -- President Hosni Mubarak said Tuesday that laws to be passed in 2007 would improve democracy and abolish Egypt's 25-year state of emergency, but rights activists said they doubted the long-serving leader would liberalize the country.

Laying out his agenda, Mubarak asked lawmakers to amend 34 articles in the Egyptian constitution to "consecrate the people's sovereignty as a source of power and give parliament more authority to monitor the government."

Hesham Kasem, president of the Egyptian Organization for Human Rights, said that during his 25 years in power, Mubarak has often promised greater democracy.

Opposition parties have long accused Mubarak, 78, of rigging elections and using the emergency laws -- introduced after the 1981 assassination of his predecessor, Anwar Sadat -- to stifle dissent. The emergency gives the government sweeping powers to detain suspects and restrict public gatherings.

Mubarak had made similar pledges during his 2005 election campaign, but none reached parliament this year.

South Korea: U.S. Made North An Offer (AP)

AP, December 27, 2006

The United States offered to remove North Korea from Washington's list of states sponsoring terrorism if the communist regime dismantles its atomic weapons program, South Korea's main nuclear envoy said Tuesday.

The proposal was just one of the incentives the U.S. spelled out last week at six-nation nuclear disarmament talks with the North, along with offers of security guarantees, a peace treaty and normalization of relations, Chun Yung-woo said.

"The point of the proposal is that everything is possible if North Korea denuclearizes and nothing is possible if it refuses," Chun told news cable channel YTN.

North Korea was not prepared to review the U.S. offer at the talks, but promised to study it and bring a response to the next round of negotiations, he said.

U.S. diplomats have declined to discuss specifics of their talks with the North Koreans, and State Department spokeswoman Amanda Rogers-Harper would not confirm Chun's report.

Referring to North Korea's promise more than a year ago to give up nuclear arms in return for security guarantees and aid, she said: "The Sept. 19, 2005, joint statement offers North Korea a clear path to a positive future and concrete benefits in return for carrying out its commitments to denuclearize."

Removal from Washington's list of terrorism-sponsoring states has long been a key North Korean demand. The listing effectively blocks a country from getting low-interest loans from international lending agencies.

North Korea was first put on the list for its alleged involvement in the 1987 mid-air bombing of a South Korean airliner that killed all 115 people aboard.

The six-nation talks in Beijing — the first since North Korea's Oct. 9 nuclear test explosion — produced no breakthrough as the North's delegation refused to discuss disarmament, demanding Washington first lift financial sanctions imposed for the North's alleged involvement in dollar counterfeiting and money laundering.

A date for a resumption of the talks — involving China, Japan, the two Koreas, Russia and the U.S. — has not been set.

North Korea says the financial sanctions are evidence of Washington's "hostile policy" and indicate its intention to overthrow the regime, and the North therefore needs nuclear weapons for protection.

Washington says the restrictions against a Macau-based bank holding North Korean accounts is a law enforcement matter unconnected to the nuclear issue.

The U.S. and North Korea held separate bilateral talks on the financial issue on the sidelines of the nuclear negotiations, but failed to narrow differences.

Chun said the U.S. and the North exchanged views on when and where to hold the next financial talks, but he declined to elaborate.

South Korea's new foreign minister, Song Min-soon, went to Tokyo on Tuesday to discuss the North Korean talks, officials said.

Making his first overseas trip since becoming South Korea's top diplomat in early December, Song was to meet with Japan's chief Cabinet secretary, Yasuhisa Shiozaki, on Tuesday and Prime Minister Shinzo Abe and Foreign Minister Taro Aso on Wednesday, the Foreign Ministry said.

Song also planned to seek ways to mend South Korea's strained relations with Japan.

Ties have been frayed by territorial disputes and by former Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi's repeated visits to a war shrine that honors Japan's war dead, including convicted war criminals. The visits angered many on the Korean peninsula, which Japan ruled as a colony in 1910-45.

The Book On North Korea (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

On the surface, "A Corpse in the Koryo," by James Church, is a crackling good mystery novel, filled with unusual characters involved in a complex plot that keeps you guessing to the end. It has received rave reviews -- as a mystery novel.

But the book has also caused a stir among Asia specialists because it offers an unusually nuanced and detailed portrait of one of the most closed societies on Earth -- North Korea. Much like Martin Cruz Smith's novel "Gorky Park," which depicted life in the Soviet Union in the early 1980s through the eyes of police inspector, "A Corpse on the Koryo" provides a vivid window into a mysterious country through the perspective of its primary character -- Inspector O.

Peter Hayes, a North Korea expert who is executive director of the Nautilus Institute for Security and Sustainable Development, a research group, described the novel as "the best unclassified account of how North Korea works and why it has survived all these years when the rest of the communist world capitulated to the global market a decade ago," and said, "This novel should be required bedtime reading for President Bush and his national security team."

That was precisely the point of writing the book, according to the author. James Church is a pseudonym for what the book jacket describes as "a former Western intelligence officer with decades of experience in Asia" who "has wandered through Korea for years." In an interview, Church said he was frustrated by the limitations of his intelligence reports. He was often required to frame any information through the moral lens of Western society, which regards North Korea as one of the most repressive regimes in the world. So he decided to see if he could take his intimate knowledge of North Korea and make it accessible to a wider audience by placing it in a thriller.

In the academic or intelligence world, an analyst who wrote about North Korea without the standard "moral bubble" immediately would be accused of being blind to the "awfulness of the place," Church said. "You don't have to do that in a mystery story."

The result is fascinating. Much of Church's writing is quite beautiful -- one wonders what his intelligence reports read like -- with keen observations of even the smallest details.

The traditional stereotype of North Korea is that it is a bare, broken place, but the book races across the northern half of the Korean Peninsula providing elaborate descriptions of its virtually unspoiled beaches and mountains. (The book, however, is sadly lacking maps.) Church said it is very difficult to look at any horizon in North Korea without seeing mountains or hills. So he sought to show how important the landscape is to the North Korean people -- and demonstrate their deep psychological attachment to it.

The characters are caught up in a blindingly complex system of cross and double-cross, a world in which every step is watched and reported on by someone else. Inspector O, who is very smart and has a sense of humor, must carefully navigate between friend and foe as he tries to unravel the connection between the death of a mysterious foreigner in a Pyongyang hotel and two rival smuggling schemes run by different government ministries. But Church shows how the North Korean government is unlike the Soviet regimes imposed on Eastern Europe, how it has adapted and in many ways become uniquely Korean.

The characters have their complaints about the strange society -- Inspector O is always in search of sandpaper for his woodworking and a cup of tea -- but also defend it. When Inspector O encounters a Finnish woman and mentions how the river in Pyongyang "sparkles on sunny days," she asks him, "Have you ever been anywhere real?" He lashes out that he has been overseas, but "some things are good, some things aren't, same as here. Nothing is perfect. This godforsaken country, as you call it, is where I live. This is my home."

The plot of the investigation is interwoven with scenes of an interrogation of Inspector O by an Irish intelligence officer who has a stereotypical view of the country, allowing Church to explore how the Western and North Korean realities rub against each other. The conversation at times seems an echo of fruitless conversations between Americans and North Koreans over North Korea's nuclear weapons programs.

But the book does not mention politics, nuclear weapons or even North Korean leader Kim Jong Il, keeping it grounded in the everyday existence of the North Korean people. It has been such a success that a second novel on the travails of Inspector O is in the works.

Sudan May Allow U.N. Force In Darfur (WP)

By Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

NEW YORK, Dec. 26 -- Sudan's president has suggested that he would be willing to accept a peacekeeping force with United Nations troops in Darfur, where his counterinsurgency campaign has left hundreds of thousands of civilians dead and millions homeless.

President Omar al-Bashir has rejected calls for foreign troops and U.N. intervention to end the bloodshed. But under mounting pressure from the Bush administration to respond to U.N. plans for a cease-fire, Bashir appeared to accept some of Secretary General Kofi Annan's proposals in a letter sent over the weekend.

U.S. and U.N. diplomats were guarded in their reactions to the letter, which was made public Tuesday.

Although Bashir wrote to Annan that he would accept a proposal for U.N. forces to bolster African Union peacekeepers in Darfur, the Sudanese president wants the plan to be implemented through a three-member panel on which Khartoum has a seat. Diplomats said that arrangement could effectively give Sudan veto power over how the plan is implemented.

"While we would like to be cautiously optimistic, we have heard positive sounds before like this before," said Benjamin Chang, a spokesman for the U.S. mission to the United Nations. "We need to see actions on the ground, and we need a U.N. presence in Darfur now."

Chang said Annan or one of his advisers will brief the Security Council on Wednesday with an assessment of Bashir's letter.

In the meantime, U.S. military experts and U.N. force commanders were studying the letter, diplomats said.

Bashir's letter came after a meeting in Khartoum earlier this month with Andrew S. Natsios, President Bush's special adviser on Sudan.

Natsios said he urged Bashir to accept all aspects of Annan's plan and warned that if he did not do so by the end of the year, the United States would take a more aggressive stand.

"We have told the Sudanese that we have to move along to our own strategic processes in the United States government, and we will do that beginning in the new year if we do not see some kind of progress on Kofi's plan between now and the end of the year," Natsios said last week.

U.S. and U.N. officials have long suspected that Bashir may try to buy time until Annan leaves office at the end of the year, then begin new negotiations for more favorable terms with Annan's successor, Ban Ki Moon of South Korea.

Darfur has experienced some of the worst violence in Africa in more than a decade. The Sudanese government, backed by local Arab militia, has mounted a violent campaign against civilians suspected of supporting Darfur rebel groups. The conflict has left as many as 450,000 people dead and has driven more than 2 million people from their homes.

Last week, Annan asked the Sudanese leader for his formal consent for a joint African Union-U.N. force of at least 22,000 troops and police. Bashir has opposed a force made up of only U.N. troops, saying it would be tantamount to an invasion of his country.

The idea of a combined force was endorsed by African nations in October, but Bashir has been unclear about whether he would accept it.

In the letter, made public by Annan's office in New York, Bashir wrote that he is ready to begin talks on a cease-fire and explicitly accepted a joint force.

New U.S. Strategy In Latin America: Turn On The Charm (MCT)

By Pablo Bachelet

McClatchy, December 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Bush administration has refused to talk to foes such as Iran, North Korea and Cuba, but it has no such qualms about some of its sternest critics in Latin America, including Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez.

Chavez relishes calling President Bush names like Mr. Danger and a donkey, and over the years the State Department has accused Chavez of various misdeeds, from undermining democracy to cutting ties with U.S. agencies fighting terrorism and drug traffickers.

Yet, less than two weeks after Chavez won re-election earlier this month, the U.S. ambassador in Caracas met with the Venezuelan foreign minister to ease tensions between the two countries.

Chavez responded by attacking U.S. counter-drug efforts, so it's unclear if the charm offensive will work. But the move is part of a broader effort by U.S. officials to court leftist leaders who just weeks ago were warily viewed as pro-Chavez populists. This includes President-elects Daniel Ortega of Nicaragua and Ecuador's Rafael Correa, who recently heralded the rise of a socialist Latin America.

The Bush administration has long sought out moderate socialists, such as Brazilian President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva, and relations with once-prickly opponents like Argentine President Nestor Kirchner have improved lately.

The thinking is that while these leaders don't see eye to eye with Bush, they were democratically elected and, unlike Iran or North Korea, their countries pose no obvious national security threats to U.S. interests, officials say.

Many observers welcome the diplomatic move.

"We have to really pursue a path of quiet pragmatism," said Eric Farnsworth, a vice president with the Council of the Americas, an organization that promotes more contacts with Latin American nations. "Stay out of the headlines, get out of the ideological debates."

The contacts are the Bush administration's adjustment to the results of a dozen elections this year. Nine of them were won by leftist leaders, ranging from moderates to far left, including several who declare themselves allies of Chavez and Cuba's Fidel Castro.

"One thing we've made clear as we deal with leaders across the region is that we don't care much if they're left, center or right, as long as they're committed to democracy and committed to working with us," Thomas Shannon, the State Department's top diplomat to Latin America, said recently.

The Bush administration changed its tone after Ortega won his election last month. Just a year ago, the State Department accused his Sandinista party of conspiring to topple a sitting pro-Washington government, and several top Sandinista officials had their U.S. visas stripped.

Last month, Shannon traveled to Nicaragua and met with Ortega, who in recent years had moderated his criticisms of U.S. policies.

Shannon described the encounter as "a really good meeting" in which Ortega expressed his support for the Central American Free Trade Agreement and several U.S. aid programs for Managua.

Ortega's friendly relations with Chavez and Castro weren't a problem, Shannon said.

"Our focus wasn't on how he relates to others," Shannon said. "Our focus was on how he's going to relate to us."

The Bush administration is also reaching out to Ecuador's President-elect Correa. On the campaign trail, the charismatic U.S.-educated economist called Bush "dimwitted," though he later toned down his rhetoric and held a meeting with the U.S. ambassador in Quito that was widely broadcast in the local media.

Correa opposes an agreement that lets the U.S. military use Ecuador's Manta air base for counter-drug operations, but the United States seems to harbor no ill feelings. Bush called Correa to congratulate him on his victory.

U.S. officials also have been courting Bolivia's feisty President Evo Morales, an Aymara indigenous leader who, like Chavez, often rails against Washington's "imperialism" and is a frequent visitor to Havana.

U.S. officials have been critical of Morales' reluctance to limit a crackdown on coca farming, which produces the raw materials to make cocaine. Coca is traditionally used by indigenous peoples for legitimate purposes.

In a goodwill gesture, the United States certified in September that Bolivia was doing enough to combat drug traffickers, even though Washington will take another look at Bolivia's efforts in March. The Bush administration this month pushed Congress to include Bolivia and Ecuador among a group of Andean nations that obtained unilateral trade preferences from Washington.

William Brownfield, the American ambassador to Venezuela, characterized the Dec. 14 encounter with Foreign Minister Nicolas Maduro as "very positive." But five days after the Brownfield-Maduro meeting and one day after Brownfield made a public call for cordiality, Chavez called Brownfield a liar for suggesting that drug trafficking in Venezuela was on the rise, and he reiterated his claims that Drug Enforcement Agency officials were spies.

"The battle against drug smuggling has been an excuse that imperialists have used for several years to penetrate our country, trample our people and justify a military presence in Latin America," Chavez said.

No Cancer For Castro, Surgeon Says (CHIT)

By Gary Marx

Chicago Tribune, December 27, 2006

HAVANA -- In the first independent diagnosis of Fidel Castro, a prominent Spanish surgeon said Tuesday the ailing 80-year-old leader does not have cancer and is recuperating slowly from intestinal surgery.

Dr. Jose Luis Garcia Sabrido traveled to Havana last Thursday to examine Castro at the request of Cuban authorities. Garcia Sabrido has returned to Madrid, where he told reporters that Castro's condition is stable and he does not require additional surgery.

But Garcia Sabrido declined to clarify what ailment Castro is suffering from. Cuban officials have said Castro's health condition is a state secret, and his Cuban doctors reportedly are sequestered.

"Fidel Castro does not suffer from any malignancy," Garcia Sabrido said at Madrid's Gregorio Maranon hospital, where he is chief surgeon. "It is a benign process in which he has suffered a series of complications."

Garcia Sabrido said Castro's mind is active and clear and he could return to power if he recovers completely.

A U.S. diplomat in Havana who asked not to be identified said she heard Garcia Sabrido's diagnosis but declined to comment about "a statement from a private physician."

Cuba's state-run television did not cover the story in its Tuesday afternoon newscast.

Castro's health condition has been a mystery since Cuban authorities announced in late July that the nation's long-serving leader suffered intestinal bleeding, underwent surgery and ceded power to his younger brother, Defense Minister Raul Castro.

In a statement signed July 31, the Cuban leader attributed his illness to a heavy work and travel schedule. He has said little else since then.

In recent months, Cuban Vice President Carlos Lage and other officials have asserted that Castro is not suffering from cancer, but they have offered no evidence to back up their statements.

Castro has not been seen in public since late July, and the few photographs and short videos of him carried in the Cuban media showed him to be thin and fragile.

Absent information, many Cubans have come believe that Castro had undergone two or perhaps three surgeries and was suffering from cancer or another terminal illness.

U.S. intelligence chief John Negroponte said earlier this month that Castro had "months, not years" to live.

But Garcia Sabrido's diagnosis appears to confirm what Cuban officials have been saying all along about Castro's illness, though they have recently softened earlier statements that he soon would return to full duties.

"He is getting better," Ramon Castro, Fidel's older brother, said in a brief interview last week.

Rodrigo Alvarez Cambras, a leading Cuban physician who is not among the doctors treating Castro, said in an interview last week that he believes Castro is suffering from diverticulitis, a complication of a common illness in people older than 50 in which pockets develop in the colon.

In moderate cases, the pockets become inflamed and infected, causing abdominal pain, diarrhea and bleeding. In severe cases, the colon is perforated, a condition known as peritonitis, in which stool leaks into the abdominal cavity and requires immediate surgery.

"They usually cut out the piece of the colon that has a hole in it, suck out all of the stool in the cavity and give the patient a temporary colostomy bag," explained Dr. Sunanda Kane, a gastroenterologist at the University of Chicago Hospitals.

Kane said the condition could be fatal if the patient develops sepsis, a general body infection, which can cause organs such as the kidneys to shut down and require dialysis treatment.

"Eighty-year-olds who are on dialysis tend to have a poorer prognosis," she said.

But Garcia Sabrido said Tuesday that Castro's rehabilitation now involves mostly muscular and nutritional support, indicating to Kane that the worst may be over for Castro.

Responding to critics who argued that he should not have treated the communist strongman, Garcia Sabrido said his trip to Havana was motivated by humanitarian concerns and not politics.

"When a physician is called upon as a physician, his duty is to be a physician," Garcia Sabrido said. "If I am asked my opinion about a patient, I don't ask about his religion or his political ideas.

"I am a professional doctor and I devote myself to that," he said. "For me, President Castro is an exceptional patient, but he's still a patient."

Spanish Doctor Denies Castro Has Cancer (NYT)

By James C. McKinley Jr.

DOJ_NMG_0109250

MEXICO CITY, Dec. 26 — A Spanish surgeon who examined Fidel Castro last week said Tuesday that the 80-year-old Cuban president did not have cancer and could return to work after recovering from the intestinal surgery he had last summer.

"His physical activity is excellent, his intellectual activity intact," the doctor, José Luis García Sabrido, head of surgery at Gregorio Marañón Hospital in Madrid, said at a news conference in Madrid. "I'd say fantastic. He's recovering from his previous operation."

This is the first time since Mr. Castro dropped out of public view in the summer that a medical expert outside the Cuban government has commented on his health.

Cuban officials have said Mr. Castro's condition is a state secret.

United States intelligence officials have said Mr. Castro is not long for this world, especially after he failed to appear at a weeklong celebration of his birthday, held this month.

Speculation has been rampant in Washington and among Cuban exiles in Miami that Mr. Castro, a leftist icon who has thumbed his nose at the White House for nearly five decades, has colon cancer.

The director of national intelligence, John D. Negroponte, told The Washington Post this month that American intelligence agencies believed that Mr. Castro was "terminally ill" and that he would be dead in "months, not years." Other American intelligence officials have said they believe that Mr. Castro is dying of cancer.

On Tuesday, a spokesman for Mr. Negroponte, Ross Feinstein, said the director had nothing to add to his earlier assessment.

Dr. García Sabrido, who examined Mr. Castro in Cuba last week, said the intestinal bleeding that prompted the handing of power to his brother Raúl and small group of cabinet ministers in the summer did not stem from a malignancy. He added that Mr. Castro could make a full recovery, but "required muscular rehabilitation and a strict diet."

"He does not have cancer, he has a problem with his digestive system," Dr. García Sabrido told reporters in Madrid. "President Castro has no malign inflammation. It's a benign process in which he has had a series of complications."

The surgeon flew to Havana last week with medical equipment not available in Cuba to determine whether Mr. Castro needed further surgery. In keeping with Havana's wishes, he did not say specifically what ailed Mr. Castro.

"It is not planned that he will undergo another operation for the moment," Dr. García Sabrido said. "His condition is stable. He is recovering slowly but progressively."

Cuban officials have steadfastly denied that Mr. Castro has cancer, although they have stopped insisting that he will return to power. On Oct. 28, video images released to the public showed that the once towering leader had become a shuffling and frail man.

A number of noncancerous ailments can cause serious intestinal bleeding. A common problem in the United States is diverticulitis. It is an inflammation of small pouchlike balloonings in the large bowel, or large intestine, and can require a number of surgical procedures. Examples of other noncancerous intestinal conditions are inflammatory bowel diseases like regional enteritis (Crohn's) or ulcerative colitis.

Serious bleeding could also develop as a complication of surgery to correct an insufficient blood supply to the intestine. Such a condition may be caused by arteriosclerosis and is analogous to the insufficient blood supply that can lead to angina, heart attack or stroke.

To correct the problem, surgeons may have to remove a large part of the small intestine, sometimes creating a difficulty known as short bowel syndrome. That syndrome can lead to difficulty in digestion.

Besides his absence from a military parade in his honor on Dec. 2, other signs have indicated Mr. Castro's weakened condition. On Friday, he missed the last session of the year of the National Assembly for only the second time in 30 years.

News reports last week said Mr. was too ill to receive a longtime friend, the Colombian author and Nobel Prize winner Gabriel García Márquez.

Cuban officials told visiting American congressmen this month that Mr. Castro did not have a terminal illness and would make a public appearance shortly.

Castro Called Cancer-free (WT/AP)

By Ciaran Giles

The Washington Times, December 27, 2006

MADRID - A Spanish surgeon who treated Fidel Castro said the ailing Cuban leader does not have cancer, insisting yesterday that he was recovering slowly but progressively from a serious operation.

The comments by Jose Luis Garcia Sabrido, the chief surgeon at Madrid´s Gregorio Maranon Hospital, were the first independent medical assessment of Mr. Castro´s condition since the Cuban leader underwent emergency intestinal surgery in July. The Cuban government has kept Mr. Castro´s condition a state secret, occasionally releasing photographs and videos of him to show that he is convalescing.

Dr. Garcia Sabrido visited Havana last week to examine Mr. Castro and consult with his medical team.

"He hasn´t got cancer," Dr. Garcia Sabrido said, adding that he thinks Mr. Castro will become physically capable of running the country again. "While respecting confidentiality, I can tell you that President Castro is not suffering from any malignant sickness."

Mr. Castro, 80, has not appeared in public since temporarily ceding power to his younger brother, Raul, after his surgery this summer. Dr. Garcia Sabrido declined to give details about Mr. Castro´s condition but said it was "a benign process in which there have been a series of complications."

Cuban authorities have denied that Mr. Castro is suffering from terminal cancer, but his prolonged absence has fueled increasing speculation that he will not return to power.

Asked whether he thought Mr. Castro would be physically capable of once again governing Cuba, Dr. Garcia Sabrido said: "If his recovery is absolute, then naturally, yes.

"I think that in these moments his decision to delegate power implies that he must now be dedicated to his recovery. What happens in the future will be an absolutely personal matter."

He said he was impressed by Mr. Castro´s good spirits.

"His intellectual activity is intact, I´d say fantastic," the surgeon said. "I was amazed at his capacity to relate personal and historical anecdotes.

"He wants to return to work every day, but medical recommendations demand caution," he said.

Some U.S. doctors say Mr. Castro may suffer from diverticular disease, which can cause bleeding in the lower intestine, especially in people over 60. In severe cases, emergency surgery may be required.

Dr. Garcia Sabrido´s specialty is in the digestive system and in transplants. In 1988, he wrote in the medical journal Archives of Surgery about a temporary stomach "zipper" that Spanish doctors had used on patients to provide repeated easy access for draining and treating abdominal infections.

On Monday, Spanish authorities confirmed that Dr. Garcia Sabrido had traveled to Cuba´s capital with advanced medical equipment to determine whether Mr. Castro needed additional surgery. Dr. Garcia Sabrido said yesterday that another operation was not immediately necessary.

"It is not planned that he will undergo another operation for the moment," he said. "His condition is stable. He is recovering from a very serious operation."

There was no mention of Dr. Garcia Sabrido´s visit in Cuba´s state press.

Castro's Ailment Not Malignant, Spanish Surgeon Says (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

MADRID, Dec. 26 -- A Spanish surgeon who treated Fidel Castro said the ailing Cuban leader does not have cancer, insisting Tuesday he was recovering slowly but progressively from a serious operation.

The comments by Jose Luis Garcia Sabrido, the chief surgeon at Madrid's Gregorio Maranon Hospital, represented the first independent medical assessment of Castro's condition since the Cuban leader underwent emergency intestinal surgery in July. The Cuban government has kept Castro's condition a state secret, occasionally releasing photographs and videos of him to show he is convalescing.

As Castro Fades, A Crop Of New Leaders (CSM)

By Tom Fawthrop

The Christian Science Monitor, December 27, 2006

HAVANA, CUBA

In a country that is in the process of bidding a long farewell to its ageing revolutionaries, Mariela Castro brings an expectation of change along with an air of youthful passion. As the director of Cenesex (the National Sex Education Center) Ms. Castro is eager to consider where Cuba should go in a postrevolutionary era.

"We have many contradictions in Cuba," says Castro, the daughter of Raúl Castro, Cuba's de facto leader and brother of ailing President Fidel Castro. A Spanish doctor arrived in Cuba last week, reenergizing speculation about the health of the Cuban leader, who has not been seen in public since undergoing surgery in July. "We need to experiment and to test what really works, to make public ownership more effective, rather than simply adopting wholesale free-market reforms," Ms. Castro says.

Leaders like Ms. Castro may indicate the extent to which a post-Castro Cuba may be willing to liberalize, both economically and socially. As Cuba's old-guard leadership fades, this new generation - made up primarily of the sons and daughters of those who fought in the 1959 Communist revolution - is perhaps more sympathetic to economic reforms and more-liberal social policies.

Nevertheless, Cuba-watchers and experts have ruled out any dramatic lurch toward a liberal market economy that might undermine the island nation's heritage as the persistent holdout of traditional Communist policies. More relaxed social attitudes may also evolve gradually.

Still, no one doubts that change is afoot.

"The transition in Cuba has already taken place" and this new generation has a key role to play, says Richard Gott, a Latin American analyst and former foreign correspondent for the London-based The Guardian newspaper. "Carlos Lage will be the brains behind the new government. He, together with Julio Soberon at the central bank, will seek to chart a new economic course."

Now Raul Castro has started to echo some of his daughter's sentiments. Addressing university students, he urged that they should "fearlessly engage in public debate and analysis," according to Granma, the Communist Party newspaper.

Cuba is one of several Latin American countries that once harassed homosexuals as a matter of policy. But Mariela Castro, who is also an executive member of the World Association for Sexual Health, insists that job discrimination and mass arrests are a thing of the past.

"[Homosexuals] still sometimes face arrest by bigoted police" says Castro, adding that she has sometimes clashed with the authorities in her efforts to release gay men and women from prison.

"Now, society is more relaxed. There is no official repression of gays and lesbians," she argues confidently. A writer turned politico

Cuban writer and culture minister Abel Prieto has also emerged as an influential power broker in a changing Cuba. Since joining the state bureaucracy and the politburo, the long-haired, middle-aged minister still exudes a passion for culture and a common touch.

In response to a question about the conflict of interest between writers and the state, Mr. Prieto laughs, saying that, "sometimes I feel like Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, but I hope that artists and writers feel that I am still one of them."

Unlike many members of the government, Prieto is very candid as he speaks about allegations that the Cuban government censors political websites.

"It would be a delusion to think we could hide that torrent of information," he insists, referring to anti-Castro websites. "The only possibility is to beat them with a better concept of life."

Prieto also defended the arrest of the dissident writer Raul Rivero in 2003.

"He was not arrested for his views, but for receiving US funding for his collaboration with a country that has besieged our island," argues the minister, referring to the 45-year-long US trade embargo.

An avid fan of the Beatles since the 1970s when their music was essentially banned by the Cuban state, Prieto has led an appreciation campaign of John Lennon. In 2000, he unveiled a statue and dedicated "John Lennon Park" to the musician's memory. Many Cubans joke that he is not as much a Marxist-Leninist as a "Marxist-Lennonist."

Prieto, because of a moment on Cuban television five years ago, is known as one of the few Cabinet ministers who has ever dared to challenge the president. Cubans recall a news segment in which Castro and Prieto appeared together.

After Castro blamed his minister for the fact that so many artists were leaving the country to work abroad, Prieto defended himself.

Millions watched as their supreme leader accepted his error and apologized to Abel Prieto.

"Prieto is extremely important. He has carved out a sizable space for cultural expression [for] many Cuban artists and writers since he became minister of culture," says Julia Sweig, director of the Latin American Studies at the Council on Foreign Relations in Washington.

In a Foreign Affairs article, written after a lengthy visit to Cuba in November, Ms. Sweig indicated that expectations were high among Cuban officials that the government could move forward after Castro.

"People at all levels of the Cuban government and the Communist Party were enormously confident of the regime's ability to survive Fidel's passing," Ms. Sweig wrote.

That confidence was apparent in Raúl Castro's speech to the opening session of the new parliament last week. "Tell it like it is - tell the truth without justifications, because we are tired of justifications in this revolution," the acting president urged his ministers, according to the youth newspaper Juventud Rebelde. US economic sanctions irrelevant

Attempts by the Bush administration to set the agenda for change in Cuba, says Sweig, appear to be increasingly irrelevant to the reality inside the country, as a new generation gains increasing clout.

Gott, the Latin American analyst, says that both Ms. Castro and Prieto are figures to watch.

"Mariela Castro is a more than competent member of the Castro clan - she will have an important role in social affairs," he says. "The genial Abel Prieto might well be promoted from the culture ministry to something more taxing."

Russian Continues The Tantrum Tradition At U.N. (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

UNITED NATIONS -- Russia has brandished a new weapon in its diplomatic arsenal: the Security Council tantrum.

Russian Ambassador Vitaly Churkin barged out of the U.N. chamber Dec. 11, canceling a crucial meeting on Iran's nuclear program. Asked to explain why the 15-nation council's major powers would not be able to address the Iranian nuclear crisis, Churkin said: "Because. Because I said so."

The Russian's outburst reflected anger over a U.S. decision to raise concern about political developments in Belarus, a Russian ally that has gained international condemnation for its repressive policies.

But it also echoed a classic Soviet practice at the United Nations dating back to 1945, when Soviet strongman Joseph Stalin's envoy, Andrei Gromyko, also used bluster to exact political concessions, threatening to pull out of the new organization unless the Security Council veto was expanded. Stalin won that fight. The practice reached its peak more than a decade later when another Soviet leader, Nikita Khrushchev, famously banged his shoe on his table in the U.N. General Assembly.

"It's something we used to associate with the Soviets, but the Russians have sort of taken this over," said Edward Luck, a Columbia University historian who studies the United Nations. "This is a negotiating tactic. The other side has to make it up to you as though you have been deeply offended. We've done it at times, and others do it."

Churkin's angry reactions to diplomatic affronts have become so common that some U.N. diplomats have invented a word to describe it: Vitalyation (rhymes with "retaliation"). But the former Soviet official has parlayed Russian outrage into tactical diplomatic victories.

The United States dropped sanctions last month against Sukhoi, a Russian jetmaker that supplies Iran, after Churkin and other top Russian officials hinted that it could jeopardize negotiations over Iran. "If they want to go it on their own, you know, legislating unilateral sanctions, they are welcome to tackle the problem alone," Churkin said.

Churkin expressed confidence this month that the United States would drop its concerns about Belarus's rights record in the council.

"I don't think they will raise" the issue again, he said. "We have had some exchanges about it, and I think we now understand better a certain choice needs to be made: Either we use the Security Council as an important instrument to discuss and resolve serious international problems, or attempts can be allowed to use it as a platform for propaganda. Our preference is to focus on important things."

Senior Europeans said that the U.S. decision to raise the issue of Belarus needlessly provoked Russia at a critical stage in the Iran negotiations and that Churkin was right in asserting that the issue does not constitute a threat to international peace and security, the threshold for Security Council involvement in a crisis.

Britain, France and the U.S. mission to the United Nations had urged the State Department not to mention Belarus in the 15-nation body until after they had concluded talks over Iran. But the State Department dismissed those concerns, instructing the U.S. political counselor, William Brencick, to urge the council to remain vigilant about developments in Belarus, citing concern over the recent 54-day hunger strike by a jailed former presidential candidate, Alexander Kozulin.

A senior U.S. official said they were responding to a plea by Kozulin's wife, who said her husband would resume eating if the United States discussed her husband's plight in the Security Council. Kozulin ended the hunger strike on the same day.

"We did it to save his life; it was the right thing to do," said the senior official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

Some observers said the Russians have used negotiations on a variety of important issues, including Iran's and North Korea's nuclear programs, to secure concessions on others.

For instance, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov eased his opposition to a resolution sanctioning North Korea only after U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice agreed to support a Russian-sponsored resolution criticizing neighboring Georgia, which had detained seven Russian soldiers who were accused of spying. The United States had previously argued that the dispute was a domestic matter that should not be handled by the Security Council.

The bluster technique has not always turned out so well.

In 1950, the United States ushered through a Security Council resolution authorizing the deployment of a U.S.-led force to repel North Korea's invasion of South Korea. The Soviet delegation had boycotted the council because it failed to grant a seat to China's communist government, so it could not cast a veto to deny the United States international backing for entering the Korean War.

Churkin took offense when John R. Bolton, the outgoing U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, compared Khrushchev's shoe-banging to North Korea's defiance of the U.N. Security Council. He appealed to the council president, Kenzo Oshima of Japan, "to use your influence" to discourage the use of such an "inappropriate analogy."

China Urges Auto Makers To Limit Their Expansion (WSJ)

By Gordon Fairclough

DOJ_NMG_0109255

The Wall Street Journal, December 27, 2006

SHANGHAI, China -- China's economic planners are waving a yellow flag at the nation's auto industry, warning that growth in car makers' production capacity is outstripping demand and calling for limits on further expansion.

Passenger-car sales have been increasing at a torrid rate, making China the world's second-largest vehicle market by unit sales after the U.S. But car companies, rushing to cash in on the growth, have been adding assembly lines at an even faster rate, the planners said.

In a statement Tuesday, the National Development and Reform Commission, which sets China's industrial policy, said overcapacity is threatening the auto industry's health and laid out guidelines to rein in growth.

For years, China has promoted the auto business, viewing it as a critical driver of economic growth and industrialization, and all kinds of companies -- from motorcycle manufacturers to cellphone-battery makers -- have started assembling cars. Now, planners fret that the industry frenzy -- which has sparked a sharp price war -- will inhibit the emergence of manufacturers large and strong enough to compete with established car makers from the U.S., Japan and Europe.

Government officials are also increasingly worried about the environmental and social costs of China's rapid shift to car driving, which has helped shroud cities in air pollution, snarled traffic and contributed to a surge in roadway-accident deaths.

The commission has tried to slow investment in industries before, including auto making and steel, in efforts to keep China's economy from overheating. But local governments and companies often ignore its pronouncements, and it is unclear how effective the new limits will be.

"Local governments want to attract car-related investments and offer cheap land to investors, even though there isn't real market demand for the products," says Jia Xinguang, chief analyst with the monthly Chinese trade publication Auto Magazine. Still, Mr. Jia said, the new policies likely will mean that "capacity control will be stricter" -- putting the government at odds with the wishes of many smaller companies struggling to break into the car business and grow quickly enough to survive.

Under the new guidelines, a company must sell cars and trucks equal to 80% of its government-approved production capacity before it can seek permission to construct a new plant away from its home base. Auto makers that don't have an approved capacity must be making at least 100,000 cars or 50,000 sport-utility vehicles a year if they want to expand.

Planners also urged Chinese car companies to invest more in developing their own models and called on local and national government agencies to buy Chinese national brands, rather than foreign brands, that are environmentally friendly, in order to "set an example for ordinary consumers."

They also said the government should foster the creation of fewer, bigger Chinese car companies able to compete in global markets through mergers, acquisitions and other means.

Most passenger cars in China are built by joint ventures between state-owned Chinese auto makers and large international car companies. General Motors Corp. and Volkswagen AG are the biggest foreign brands in the market.

Chinese car makers' push to develop their own brands has boosted their combined share of the domestic market to more than 26%, and it is a potential source of friction with multinationals. GM's partner, Shanghai Automotive Industry Corp., for example, recently unveiled its own luxury car.

The National Development and Reform Commission said that, even as it seeks to promote Chinese national brands, the government must work to build trust and "mutually beneficial relationships" with foreign partners.

Illegal Power Plants, Coal Mines In China Pose Challenge For Beijing (WSJ)

By Shai Oster

The Wall Street Journal, December 27, 2006

JUBAO VILLAGE, China -- On the edge of this dusty farming hamlet, the massive smokestack of the half-finished Xinfeng Power Plant looms as a monument to China's out-of-control demand for energy.

Unlike two other power plants nearby, Xinfeng isn't supposed to exist. China's electricity regulators never authorized the $362 million coal-burning plant. But in 2004, the provincial government here in northern China's Inner Mongolia ignored Beijing's call to slow down investment and started building the plant anyway, hoping to ensure enough juice for the region's supercharged industrialization by tapping its rich reservoirs of coal.

Inner Mongolia's disobedience might have escaped notice. But in July 2005, in the rush to finish the plant before regulators found out about it, the housing for a turbine collapsed, killing six workers. During the yearlong investigation that followed, the central government discovered that Inner Mongolia had illegally built about 10 power plants, or 8.6 gigawatts of electricity-generating capacity -- equal to about a 10th of the United Kingdom's total capacity.

The illegal plants have had unintended -- and detrimental -- consequences. By eschewing even basic environmental safeguards, they stand out as polluters even in an industry that is one of China's leading sources of emissions, officials say. They also have driven up the demand for and price of coal, the country's most abundant source of fuel. That, in turn, has spawned thousands of illegal coal mines that have contributed to more than 4,000 coal-mining deaths in China this year.

The illegal power plants show how China's economic transformation is outpacing Beijing's ability to manage it. Never before has a country with such a big population grown as rapidly as China. The country's economy has expanded an average 10% a year since the late 1970s. The process of economic modernization is happening twice as fast in China as it did in the U.S. or Japan, where it took half a century or more.

One fifth of the power plants in China are illegal, according to government estimates -- enough to light up all of the U.K. While the electricity they supply is essential to power China's growth, the uncontrolled manner in which they are multiplying, often under the protection of local authorities, poses a challenge to Beijing's authority and its grip on energy policy.

"It is impossible for our central government to go everywhere to see, when the small power plants start building," said Zhang Guobao, vice chairman of the National Development and Reform Commission, China's top energy policy planner, in an interview.

The central government is likewise finding it hard to crack down on illegal coal mines. In past years it has shut down thousands of mines -- only to see thousands more spring up in their place. The primary reason: the soaring profits to be made from selling coal to China's power plants are a powerful temptation. Many regions have embraced coal mining to boost their growth rates, including Inner Mongolia, one of China's most coal-rich provinces.

Infuriated by the illegal Xinfeng power plant, central-government officials earlier this year demanded that the province's top leadership present self-criticisms before China's powerful State Council, or cabinet. Under China's Communist system, that's an unusually public form of rebuke, designed to send a message to others against defying Beijing's will.

Even so, construction continues today at the Xinfeng plant nearly a year after Beijing ordered it stopped. Officials at the company building the plant say they expect to get approval to complete it "sooner or later."

In China, more power plants almost invariably mean more coal consumption. The country has been unable to diversify away from coal, which is cheaper than alternative fuels, some of which are imported.

But China's coal consumption is costly in human and environmental terms. Amid the push to feed the country's power plants last year, 5,938 coal miners were killed in accidents, mostly in smaller, illegal mines. Such accidents are so commonplace here that only the larger ones rank as news.

Coal is one of the biggest pollution sources in China, which some experts think is on the verge of an environmental crisis. This year, the central government set a target of reducing the amount of energy the country consumes relative to its economic output. But the soaring demand for coal-fueled electricity has upended Beijing's efforts to rein in pollution.

"It will be very difficult to realize our targets of saving energy and reducing pollution," Ma Kai, China's top economic policy planner, said this fall.

The implications of China's mushrooming hunger for energy go far beyond its own borders. As incomes rise in China, energy use per person is starting to catch up with the richer West. The typical American consumes about eight metric tons of oil a year, or its equivalent in coal and other fuels. Japanese consume about half that sum. In China, per capita energy consumption now stands at just 1.2 metric tons.

It would require a doubling of world oil production -- an impossible feat -- for every Chinese to live the energy-intensive lifestyle of an American, as well as more coal than some believe China could ever dig up.

"We can't copy the big home and the big car" that so many Americans enjoy, said Zhou Dadi, a top researcher with the Energy Research Institute, a government-backed think tank. "It's just not doable."

China's current energy predicament is rooted in the decision it made three decades ago when it began to embrace a market economy. For the first 20 years of its transition, as China shifted from a mostly agrarian country to light industry, it was able to quadruple the size of its economy while only doubling its energy needs.

Throughout the 1990s, however, a new and faster phase of expansion quietly took hold as the government loosened restrictions on investment and the mobility of its citizens, accelerating China's industrialization and urbanization. Manufacturing accounted for a steadily greater share of the economy. Energy-intensive heavy industries boomed, from petrochemicals to auto production, aided by China's entry into the World Trade Organization in 2001.

Low energy prices, made possible in part by government controls, encouraged consumers to use more. Coal consumption initially crept up slowly, to around 1.5 billion metric tons a year in the mid-1990s, from just under one billion metric tons a year a decade earlier. Last year, however, China consumed about 2.2 billion metric tons of coal, one-third of the world's total and more than any other country.

Beijing's efforts to reduce reliance on coal have largely failed. China has plenty of coal -- an estimated 114.5 billion metric tons of recoverable reserves. Only the U.S. and Russia have more. Natural gas, which burns more efficiently and causes far less pollution, has proved too expensive to compete effectively. Planned increases in nuclear-power production would fill only a fraction of China's energy demand. Even China's more-ambitious plans for hydropower power and wind farms won't seriously challenge coal's dominance.

Coal miners are on the front lines of the battle to meet China's energy needs. It is dangerous work. As with power plants, China's government has had great difficulty regulating coal mines. In the U.S., which produces about half as much coal as China, 47 miners have been killed so far this year, up from 22 last year. In China, the number of deaths has declined slightly this year, but it is still enormous: 4,236 dead so far.

The number of casualties goes up in the winter. More than 400 miners died in November alone. "In winter, demand goes up, the market prices go up, and the profit motive goes up," said Huang Yi, spokesman for the State Administration of Worker Safety, the agency that investigates mine accidents.

Smaller, often inefficient, and dangerous mines account for about a third of China's coal production. They are so important to meeting its energy needs that the central government recently delayed plans to improve safety by shuttering many of them.

Whole regions of China are pockmarked with tiny, illegal mines like the one in Wangyu in central China's gritty Shanxi province, where an accident in early November killed 34 miners. Four tons of demolition explosives illegally stored in a shaft caught fire and destroyed the small mine, according to government safety officials. The dead, who had just started the night shift, were mostly from the same village some 250 miles away.

Wang Chenliang, from Sichuan province, had just ended his shift when the explosion occurred. He rushed back to help with rescue efforts. He and others pulled survivors from the wreckage and pumped air into the mine to aid anyone who was trapped but still alive.

"This work is tiring and dangerous," Mr. Wang said a few days after the accident, only moments before police detained a journalist attempting to interview survivors. Like others, he got his job through introductions from fellow villagers. "We came here to earn money. The money here is much higher than back home in Sichuan."

The mine's safety certificate and production permit had both expired, according to central-government officials. But the local government was protecting it, they said, because it held a financial interest in the mine.

That sort of corruption is common. Last year, the central government found that more than 4,500 government officials illegally held stakes in coal mines and frequently covered up safety violations. Many of these mines lack basic safety equipment. Workers scrabble down narrow pits, where the most modern tools may be the sticks of dynamite used to dislodge the coal. At the accident site in Wangyu, there was no rescue equipment on hand, another common problem.

Over the past few years, provincial officials in Inner Mongolia have decided to build power plants and encourage heavy industry to relocate to the region to take advantage of its coal resources. The strategy has paid off in economic terms.

Last year, the province's economy grew 21.6%, roughly double the national rate. In 2004, it grew 19.4%. Industrial output has grown an average 30% a year over the past four years. Such unbridled growth caught China's central government off guard.

In 2003 and 2004, massive power shortages in the south led to rolling blackouts. Local authorities across China decided to build power plants, often illegally, to keep their local economies humming. Around that time, officials in Inner Mongolia approved a plan to build the Xinfeng Power Plant in the small town of Fengzhen, in a bid to attract more factories.

"Inner Mongolia has a lot of coal. Other parts of China need the electricity. Of course Inner Mongolia should take advantage of its natural resources," said Yan Keji, a construction worker at one of the three power plants near Jubao.

It isn't just heavy industry that needs power. China's consumers are using more, too. Mr. Yan's hometown in the mountains of Hunan didn't have electricity until 1990. At first, his house had one light bulb. Now, the money he earns from construction has paid for a television, washing machine, refrigerator and air conditioning, a pattern repeated in millions of homes across China as people get richer.

China's sprawling cities are also driving up power demand. Inner Mongolia now provides Beijing with 20% of its electricity, according to Jim Brock, an independent energy consultant in the Chinese capital.

Nearly two years ago, China's central government started cracking down on the unauthorized power plants because they feared a surplus of power. In Inner Mongolia, local officials ignored orders to stop building the Xingfeng plant, figuring they could always get retroactive approval, according to the official Xinhua news agency. But the death of the six workers in July 2005 set in motion the investigation that culminated in the public castigation of the provincial chief and the order to stop work on Xinfeng.

Some construction work on the plant continues. Workers interviewed at the site said the plant would be able to produce electricity next year. They declined to give their names.

Na Guiting, an official at Inner Mongolia Energy Generation Investment Co. Ltd., the plant's owner, said the company is eager to finish building and has reapplied for approval. "Mongolia still has a very serious power shortage. If Xinfeng would be approved, it could be generating in three or four months," the official said.

Tony Blair On Jet That Struck Lights On Miami Runway (WP/AP)

MIAMI, Dec. 26 -- A commercial jet carrying British Prime Minister Tony Blair and his family missed a runway exit and struck some lights after landing at Miami International Airport on Tuesday. The plane was not damaged and no injures were reported, officials said.

British Airways Flight 209 from London ran over a couple of airfield lights after landing around 6:15 p.m., but it did not leave the pavement and it taxied to the gate under its own power, airport spokesman Marc Henderson said.

The plane stopped just past the official end of the runway, said Laura Brown, a Federal Aviation Administration spokeswoman.

"It landed safely on the runway. It slowed down. It was going at taxiway speed, and they just missed a turn," Brown said.

Blair was among the 343 passengers on the plane, but no additional information about his trip was available, U.S. Secret Service spokeswoman Kim Bruce said. Blair receives Secret Service protection when he lands in the United States.

A Downing Street official, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said the prime minister and his family were not hurt.

He did not say where the Blairs were going, but Blair and his family have taken vacations in Bermuda.

The pilot stopped the plane at the end of the runway because he could not see the lights to the taxiway, British Airways spokesman John Lampl said.

"Apparently they're doing some resurfacing work and relighting, so the lighting was poor. Just to err on the side of caution, the captain decided to stop at the end of the runway and called the tower," Lampl said.

The taxiway lighting met FAA standards, Brown said. She added that the FAA would look into the incident, but she did not know whether there would be a formal investigation.

TERRORISM NEWS:

US Tries To Assure Allies That Extraordinary Renditions Are Over (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, December 27, 2006

The US is telling its overseas allies that it has stopped "extraordinary renditions" and needs their help to empty Guantánamo's prison cells. But human rights groups dispute this assertion and a question mark hangs over 200 "war on terror" detainees who could be held indefinitely without trial.

European diplomats say Washington is reacting to pressure from parliamentary investigations, lawsuits from former prisoners, and calls by friendly governments, including the UK, to close Guantánamo, the prison camp at a US naval base in Cuba.

However, the administration's response is seen as confused and inadequate. Analysts attribute this to internal divisions over how far to roll back controversial counter-terrorism practices - including torture, secret prisons, detention without trial, and renditions - as the price for rekindling transatlantic relations.

Washington was particularly stung by a report last month by a committee of the European parliament that condemned the alleged complicity of governments in the CIA's illegal detention and transportation of prisoners.

It concluded that there were at least 1,245 overflights or stopovers by CIA aircraft in Europe, and that some probably involved prisoner transfers. Several highly publicised cases were documented.

Delegations from Europe visiting Washington since then have been assured that "extraordinary renditions" ended, or mostly ended, in 2003. US officials note that the lawsuits brought against the US by former detainees relate to events in 2003 or earlier, when even Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, has admitted that "mistakes" happened.

The European committee defined "extraordinary rendition" as an "extra-judicial practice whereby an individual suspected of involvement in terrorism is illegally abducted, arrested and/or transferred into the custody of US officials and/or transported to another country for interrogation which, in the majority of cases, involves incommunicado detention and torture".

Visiting Europeans have been told that the US reserves the right to carry out renditions, but - as Ms Rice declared in a major statement a year ago - it would respect the sovereignty of other countries and would not send detainees to countries where the US believed they might be tortured.

John Sifton, a researcher for Human Rights Watch, strongly disputes the assertion that extraordinary renditions stopped in 2003. He said there had been people arrested in 2006 who were still unaccounted for, and others transported by the US from Pakistan, outside all judicial process, to the Middle East.

Human rights groups believe there are large numbers of prisoners in US custody who are unaccounted for and were not included in the 14 transferred to Guantánamo when President George W. Bush acknowledged for the first time in September the existence of secret CIA detention facilities, which he then ordered to be closed.

The US had also crafted a concept of "constructive custody" or "proxy detention", Mr Sifton said. This involved allies, such as Pakistan, Jordan and Morocco, holding detainees at the request of the US and allowing the US free access to them.

Andrew Tyrie, a British opposition MP who recently visited Washington, said the Bush administration was engaged in a fierce debate over the impact of more controversial US practices in the wake of the September 2001 attacks by al-Qaeda. "It is vital we send a message to moderate Muslims that these practices are no longer in our armoury against terrorism," he said, adding the US was also keen to revive the strong transatlantic bonds that existed before the invasion of Iraq.

Mr Bush says he wants to close Guantánamo, which will be five years old next month. But it is far from clear how or when this will happen.

Low-risk prisoners are being sent to other countries, following complex negotiations over conditions of their release or continued detention. According to the Pentagon, about 380 prisoners have left the prison since 2002. About 395 remain, of whom some 85 are now eligible for transfer or release.

The Military Commissions Act, signed by Mr Bush in October, was intended to speed the process of putting on trial Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the alleged mastermind of the 9/11 attacks, and other prominent militants before special tribunals. Experts believe, however, that constitutional challenges will set this back a very long time.

Believing that only some 50 detainees would be tried, allies are concerned that 200 other prisoners, designated as high-risk, would be detained indefinitely without trial and barred from challenging their detention in the federal courts. Complicating the process is Washington's fear that releasing more detainees will lead to a flood of legal cases against the US.

Diplomats say Ms Rice has been influential in advocating change to detention policies she sees as damaging relations with allies, while Dick Cheney, vice-president, and David Addington, his chief of staff, are seen as obstacles. The removal of Donald Rumsfeld as defence secretary this month may have undermined the hardliners, however.

"We have no desire to be the world's jailer and do not hold detainees for any longer than necessary," said Jeffrey Gordon, a Pentagon spokesman.

But he also said there was a "significant amount of evidence" to justify holding "unlawful enemy combatants" and prevent their return to the battlefield.

US Creates Terrorist Fingerprint Database (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, December 27, 2006

The US government is building a massive database designed to identify individual terror suspects from fingerprints on objects such as a tea glass in an Iraqi apartment or a shell casing in an abandoned Al Qaeda training camp.

The database is being created in part by forensic specialists searching for and preserving evidence overseas. They are collecting unidentified latent fingerprints in places once occupied by Al Qaeda and other suspected terrorists.

The information is feeding into a computerized system designed to match a name with an unidentified fingerprint.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff calls the program "a quantum step forward in security."

"(It) gives us the ability to identify the unknown, unidentified terrorist," he said in a recent speech. "It also creates a powerful deterrent for anybody who has ever spent time sitting in a training camp, or building a bomb in a safe house, or carrying out a terrorist mission on a battlefield."

Not everyone sees the creation of such a database as progress. Privacy advocates and civil libertarians say it could lead to a dangerous erosion of American rights. Privacy advocates voice concern

"Our assessment of these systems is that many that are undertaken with a goal of identifying terrorists eventually become systems of mass surveillance directed toward the American public," says Marc Rotenberg, president of the Electronic Privacy Information Center in Washington.

"When Secretary Chertoff says we are trying to identify people who were in safe houses in Iraq with terrorists, that is a very small part of the story," Mr. Rotenberg says. "The technology used to identify a terrorist in a safe house in Iraq is the exact same technology that can be used to identify a war protester in a Quaker meeting house in southern Florida."

Last year, the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) announced the completion of a database system that collects electronic fingerprints of both the index and middle fingers of every noncitizen entering the US. The system now documents 64 million travelers. The Homeland Security database is being linked with the FBI's database of more than 40 million subjects.

The effort prevented 1,300 convicted criminals and immigration law violators from entering the US, and blocked 1,000 others from gaining visas, according to Mr. Chertoff.

Now, Homeland Security is upgrading from a two-finger to a 10-finger system. In effect, it requires foreign visitors to submit to the kind of extensive fingerprinting usually reserved for criminals. But officials say that collecting all 10 prints ensures compatibility with the FBI database, and increases the investigative utility of the computerized system.

"Ten prints allows us to run not only against the database of known felons or known terrorists where we have fingerprints linked to a particular name, it lets us run against the databases we are collecting for latent fingerprints that are picked up in battlefields or safe houses or training camps all over the world," Chertoff said.

An unidentified latent print from a known terror safe house could provide an early warning by triggering an investigation if it matches someone trying to gain entry into the US, officials say.

Privacy advocates say the system is being presented to the American public and Congress as an antiterrorism tool. But they warn it could vastly increase the government's ability to track and investigate US citizens.

"It makes it sound as though this will have a limited purpose - terrorism, and a limited scope - non-Americans, but the reality is that the system is not going to be so limited," says Lee Tien of the Electronic Frontier Foundation based in San Francisco. "They will be using it for every kind of law enforcement there is. They will be collecting fingerprints on Americans, and it will be used for every general purpose." Fingerprinting part of ID science

Fingerprinting is a subset of a rapidly developing area of identification science called biometrics. Researchers are studying how to identify individuals in a crowd by using computers to match unique facial characteristics to those same characteristics on a driver's license photo. The federal and state governments are assembling databases preserving the DNA of convicted criminals. And studies are underway to use eye scans to identify individuals. But by far the government's largest identifying database relates to fingerprints, and it may soon grow larger.

In 2005, Congress passed the Real ID Act, which instructs DHS to develop a single standard for all state-issued driver's licenses and identification cards. The ID is expected to include a biometric identifier. Many experts say the most likely candidate will be a fingerprint.

If adopted, that action would create for the first time a government database of fingerprints of virtually every adult American citizen. "This could come home to Americans very, very quickly," Rotenberg says.

Privacy advocates say they are hopeful that the new Democratic Congress will exert an aggressive oversight posture and study the implications of the fingerprint program before it is in place. An Oregon lawyer and his fingerprints

They point to the case of Oregon lawyer Brandon Mayfield.

The case began in mid-March 2004, shortly after terrorist bombs ripped through commuter trains in Madrid, Spain, killing 191 people and injuring 1,400. After the attacks, Spanish authorities found fingerprints on a plastic bag with detonators.

The FBI ran the prints through its computer system and found no matches, but identified several close nonmatches. Mr. Mayfield was the fourth of 20 close nonmatches.

Three FBI fingerprint examiners studied the Madrid fingerprint, and concluded that it had been made by Mayfield.

Mayfield's print was in the FBI's database because he had served in the armed forces and had earlier been charged with a crime.

FBI investigators learned that Mayfield had converted to Islam and had married an Egyptian immigrant. He also had served as the attorney in a custody case for a man who was convicted of conspiring to aid the Taliban and Al Qaeda.

Justice Department officials say this information was unknown to the three examiners when they matched Mayfield's print to the Madrid bombing.

Spanish officials had their doubts about the match. They rejected the FBI's conclusion and continued to investigate.

The FBI dismissed the skepticism of Spanish authorities. One official in the investigation wrote: "I spoke with the lab this morning and they are absolutely confident that they have a match on the print. No doubt about it!!!! They will testify in any court you swear them into."

The FBI began surveilling Mayfield and his family, including covertly entering his home and office. Mayfield was arrested and held in prison for two weeks.

Concerned about the possibility of a mistake, a federal judge ordered an independent analysis of the fingerprint. That analyst also concluded that the print belonged to Mayfield. Two million dollar settlement

That same day, Spanish authorities identified an Algerian man as the real source of the fingerprint.

Eventually, the FBI retracted its earlier conclusion. Last month the Justice Department agreed to pay Mayfield a $2 million settlement and issued a formal apology.

The Justice Department Inspector General's review of the case earlier this year warned about using a large database like the FBI's. "The enormous size of the (FBI) database and the power of the ... program can find a confusingly similar candidate print," the report says.

Mayfield says he was singled out because of his Muslim faith.

The Justice Department concluded that the fingerprint examiners were not aware that Mayfield was a Muslim with a connection to a convicted Al Qaeda supporter when they made the initial match. But later the examiners became aware of those facts, contributing to the FBI's reluctance to investigate whether they had fingered an innocent man, according to the Justice Department review.

Asked about the Mayfield case after his Nov. 30 speech, Chertoff acknowledged that mistakes had been made. But he added that mistakes are made in the criminal justice system, and no one suggests repealing the criminal code.

"We should make our techniques better but we shouldn't throw the whole process out because there are inevitable mistakes," he said.

Contractor's Handguns Missing From Homeland Security Vault (WP)

By Allan Lengel

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

The Department of Homeland Security said yesterday that it is investigating how four handguns recently went missing from its headquarters in Northwest Washington.

Jarrod Agen, a department spokesman, said the guns belonged to Paragon Systems of Chantilly, which provides security for the department's facility on Nebraska Avenue NW.

"DHS is investigating the report," Agen said. "Paragon guns do not belong to DHS nor are they under the control of DHS."

A person familiar with the investigation and who requested anonymity while the probe is underway said four .40-caliber handguns vanished about two weeks ago from a vault where Paragon security officers store their weapons.

Attempts to reach Paragon officials for comment yesterday afternoon and evening were unsuccessful.

Saudi Arabia Frees 18 Ex-Gitmo Detainees (AP)

AP, December 26, 2006

The Saudi government said Tuesday it had released 18 men who were detained after returning to their homeland from the U.S. military prison in Guantanamo Bay.

The Saudis, who returned to the kingdom in May and June, were released after they finished their sentences, Interior Ministry spokesman Lt. Gen. Mansour al-Turki said. His comments, which did not specify the men's alleged crimes, came in a statement carried by the official Saudi Press Agency.

Last week the kingdom freed 11 ex-detainees from Guantanamo who had completed short sentences after their return.

The United States says its military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, holds terror suspects — usually people captured in Afghanistan, Pakistan or other hotspots of the war on terror.

Saudi officials have said former Guantanamo inmates are taken into custody on their return to investigate whether they have any connections to Islamic militant groups.

So far, 53 Saudis have been released from Guantanamo — all this year. Another 75 Saudis remain at the prison in Cuba, according to Kateb al-Shimri, a lawyer who represents relatives of Saudis held at the U.S. base.

Guantanamo Needs Courthouse, Pentagon Says (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams,

The Los Angeles Times, December 27, 2006

GUANTANAMO BAY, CUBA — Although the Pentagon estimates that no more than 80 of the 400 or so terrorism detainees here will ever be tried, it is moving forward with plans for a $125-million legal complex.

Air Force Col. Morris Davis, chief prosecutor of the suspected Al Qaeda and Taliban supporters, says he expects to file charges against 10 to 20 prisoners soon after new trial rules are presented to Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates next month.

ADVERTISEMENT

The Supreme Court in June found the Bush administration's military tribunal system unconstitutional, and Congress passed the Military Commission Act in September to replace it. But less than 20% of the prisoners held here are expected to face charges under the new commissions. "At the end of the day, I think the total will be about 75, give or take a few," Davis says.

Much of the legal work is done in Washington or in other U.S.-based offices of the military's judicial network — not at Guantanamo Bay.

Still, Davis says, there is just one courtroom here, in a converted air terminal that also houses legal staff and a high-security lockup. The new compound would have three courtrooms, restaurants, parking and accommodations for at least 800 people.

"It's going to take longer to do these trials one at a time in one courtroom," Davis said. A more rigorous pace could be undertaken if the complex is ready by July, as the Pentagon envisions.

Cully Stimson, deputy assistant secretary of Defense for detainee affairs, insists the legal facility is vital to bringing terrorism suspects to justice. Even with back-to-back trials, he said, it would take over a decade to prosecute an expected 60 to 80 detainees using one courtroom.

"We're fiscal conservatives by definition. We're not building the Taj Mahal here, Stimson said.

Doubts about the future of Guantanamo and the logic of investing in an operation many U.S. allies want to see shut down may doom the building project.

Calling the complex "a massive boondoggle," the American Civil Liberties Union has urged the incoming Democratic-controlled Congress to deny funding.

"No one thinks more than a few dozen detainees will ever be tried there," said Chris Anders, the ACLU legislative counsel. "I just don't see the next Congress authorizing any significant construction for additional courtrooms."

There is nothing in either the Military Commissions Act or in the rules governing courts-martial that requires war-crimes trials to be conducted in a courtroom — or even at this remote naval base, Anders said.

The Pentagon earlier this month backed down from a plan to fast-track the legal compound without approval from Congress; it is expected to be part of a supplemental funding request in February or March.

"We want these procedures to be full and fair, and do not want the lack of facilities to be a reason to delay the process," Pentagon spokesman Navy Cmdr. Jeffrey D. Gordon said.

Davis says he expects to have cases ready to try by March. But Navy Cmdr. Pat McCarthy, the staff judge advocate, said no one is certain how long the rule-writing and legal challenges to the Military Commissions Act could take.

The dispute over whether and how much to invest in facilities for holding and trying terrorism suspects has been fueled by demands from European allies and human-rights activists for release or trial of the men here — most of whom will mark five years in detention in 2007.

"I think it is excessive," University of Richmond law professor Carl Tobias said of the legal-complex proposal. "They only scheduled 10 [trials] to date and with so much legal uncertainty, I think this is going to get a thorough review" by a skeptical Congress.

Joshua Colangelo-Bryan, a lawyer for a Bahraini prisoner being held without charges, said the Pentagon "will be lucky if they can even bring cases against the 10" charged earlier due to lack of evidence, lost contact with witnesses and shifting definitions of what amounts to terrorism.

Among those now at Guantanamo are 14 prisoners deemed by the U.S. government to be "high-value" detainees who were transferred from secret CIA prisons — including alleged Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Shaikh Mohammed.

At least 100 others at the facility have been cleared by annual Administrative Review Board hearings that deemed them to be negligible threats to U.S. or allied security.

And the governments of Saudi Arabia, Afghanistan and Yemen remain in negotiations with the State Department for transfer of their citizens.

Guantanamo jailers expect the prison population to drop to 200 and stay there, even if the rest of the inmates are never tried. Rear Adm. Harry B. Harris Jr., commander of operations here, said the number should be closer to 300 because "they are all dangerous men."

About 160 of the detainees have just been moved into concrete cells with steel doors at a new $38-million maximum-security prison, Camp 6. Another 90-plus are confined in a similarly restrictive facility, Camp 5, which was completed two years ago.

The new construction — Camp 6 has a medical clinic and two meeting rooms for legal visits — and existing cells were modified "to improve quality of life for both detainees and the guard force," said Cmdr. Robert Durand, spokesman for the Joint Task Force operating the prisons.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

U.S. Senators Put To Rest Conspiracy Theory Behind Military Analysis Of Sept. 11 Attacks (FINDLAW/AP)

By Anne Flaherty, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 27, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-A lengthy Senate investigation has debunked charges by a Republican congressman that military analysts identified Mohamad Atta and other Sept. 11 hijackers before the attacks, according to a committee aide familiar with the report.

In a letter to members of the Senate Intelligence Committee, Sens. Pat Roberts and John D. Rockefeller dismissed suggestions by Rep. Curt Weldon that defense analysts ignored analysis that could have prevented the attacks. Roberts, a Republican, is outgoing chairman and Rockefeller is the senior Democrat who will assume the chairmanship Jan. 4 month when the new Congress convenes. NB.

They concluded "there was no evidence Mohamad Atta or any hijackers were identified prior to 9/11," said the committee aide, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the aide was not authorized to speak publicly on the subject.

An internal Defense Department assessment already had dismissed Weldon's charges as unfounded. But the letter from Roberts and Rockefeller is the first rejection from Capitol Hill. The letter was obtained and first reported Tuesday by the Los Angeles Times.

Weldon, a 10-term Republican who lost his seat in the Nov. 7 election, repeatedly contended a secret military unit called "Able Danger" searched large amounts of data to link four Sept. 11 hijackers to al-Qaida more than a year before the attacks.

In September, the Pentagon's inspector general found some employees recalled seeing an intelligence chart identifying Atta as a terrorist before the attacks. But the report said those accounts "varied significantly" and witnesses were inconsistent at times in their statements.

At the time, Weldon questioned the "motives and the content" of the report and rejected its conclusions, which he said relied on cherry-picked testimony. Weldon could not be reached Tuesday for comment.

According to the committee aide, Roberts and Rockefeller found similar problems in their investigation.

Weldon lost his seat to Democrat Joe Sestak, a retired Navy admiral who called for troops to be withdrawn from Iraq by the end of 2007.

Just weeks before the election, the FBI raided the homes of Weldon's daughter and a close friend in an investigation of whether the congressman improperly helped the pair win lobbying and consulting contracts.

TSA Modifies Screening Machines (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, December 27, 2006

A new airport screening machine that peers through travelers' clothing has been modified so it won't show intimate body parts when it's tested at a U.S. airport for the first time starting next month.

RELATED: X-ray tests both security, privacy

The modification to the controversial "backscatter" X-ray machine seeks to quiet critics such as the American Civil Liberties Union who have helped block its use in airports by saying the vivid images seen by screeners invade passenger privacy. The altered images will show only cartoon-like black-and-white outlines of each passenger.

But the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) is facing questions from experts who say the agency has weakened the effectiveness of the low-intensity X-rays.

"You don't see fine detail," said Robert Gould, a radiology professor at the University of California, San Francisco. "It's conceivable to me that (the modified machines) would miss plastic explosives."

Plastic explosives are a major threat because they evade checkpoint metal detectors and a small amount could blow apart a jet.

"I would bet that I could take some plastic explosives, put them on my upper thigh, and the blurring would let me get the stuff on board," said Andrew Karam, a physicist and fellow at the Center for Advanced Defense Studies, a national security think tank.

Backscatter X-rays will debut at Phoenix Sky Harbor International Airport, and a few other airports will follow. The TSA has lab-tested the machines and will use covert agents to test them in airports before any broader rollout. "We aren't endorsing this particular technology, we're testing it," TSA spokeswoman Ellen Howe said.

Manufacturer American Science and Engineering of suburban Boston got $722,000 from the TSA to program its backscatter machine so body parts wouldn't be visible to security screeners. The machines will be used only on passengers who require extra screening beyond a metal detector and who opt for the X-ray over a pat-down.

American Science Vice President Joe Rice said the $100,000 machine finds ceramic weapons and small metal objects that metal detectors can miss. "I'm sure there are ways to defeat this technology," Rice said. "But this type of technology is a dramatic leap forward from what is available today."

Hope For New Orleans (column) (WP)

By William H. Chafe

The Washington Post, December 26, 2006

Nearly 16 months after Hurricane Katrina, New Orleans remains devastated. In the Lower Ninth Ward (primarily black and poor), mid-city (mixed-race and middle class) and Lakeside (richer and whiter), houses are boarded up and ruined; shattered windows reveal rooms full of debris; perhaps one in 10 places has a FEMA trailer parked outside, as a few returning residents desperately try to reclaim what they have lost. Thousands of small businesses have disappeared. Even in the French Quarter, which was left largely intact after Katrina, shopkeepers despair of being able to survive given the decline in tourism. Repeatedly, people declare: "I have not received a single dollar of federal aid."

DOJ_NMG_0109267

Yet in this season that celebrates the birth of a child in what today would be called a homeless shelter, a remarkable resiliency of spirit remains in New Orleans. Yes, only half the population there in August 2005 has returned. The suicide rate has increased 300 percent, and less than half of the schools and hospitals that existed 16 months ago are functioning.

But energy, engagement and love persist, creating tiny ripples of hope, from thousands of individual acts of courage -- ripples that can, in words Robert Kennedy uttered 40 years ago in South Africa, "build a current" able to topple the mightiest walls of oppression.

In the Lower Ninth Ward, more than a hundred volunteers gather in a Catholic school (St. Mary of the Angels) to help secure -- with the community -- a foothold toward starting anew. Some are college students, others grandparents and hippies. All have come to live and work with local residents. Most spend their days gutting houses so that returning residents can be eligible for federal rebuilding funds. Tearing down sheetrock infested with toxic mold is dangerous work. Others toil in the kitchen, helping members of the "Rainbow Tribe" -- a commune -- prepare Brunswick stew, macaroni and cheese, and fried chicken for 150.

No one sees this as a lark. The unpaid staff briefs workers on the hazards they will face, insisting that respirators fit snugly so that no toxins are inhaled. The kitchen crew tests every dish to be sure it has reached a temperature high enough to eliminate any chance of food poisoning. Everyone is deadly serious -- and also clearly moved by the importance of the mission. They are white and black, male and female. They respect the integrity and autonomy of the neighbors they are there to help, committed not to fall into old hierarchies of white and black, male and female.

In the civil rights movement, such people called themselves a "beloved community" -- people transformed by an ethos of love and justice into becoming soldiers for justice. If redemption can follow tragedy in New Orleans, these volunteers -- in partnership with community residents -- will be the ones to make it happen.

But the signs of hope are not just in the courage of people in the Ninth Ward. They are there as well in the celebration of community among those less afflicted by poverty, people who have come back to New Orleans out of love for their city in order to make it the kind of place they want their children to grow up in. They have their own rituals.

On a Sunday, in a small bar, 30 neighborhood residents gather for a weekly get-together. White and black, gay and straight, old and young, they listen to their favorite jazz quartet and vocalist. They hug, laugh, cheer. They welcome strangers in their midst, anxious to talk about what they've been through. A father dances with his young daughter. The cook mingles with those eating from the buffet she's prepared, embracing her friends. In its own way this, too, is a "beloved community" -- people sustained by a history of caring about each other and about something in New Orleans that has made their spirits fresh and engaged.

From one perspective, the future of New Orleans is bleak. Surely no governmental body, least of all FEMA, has given anyone reason for confidence. But this is no ordinary place, and these are no ordinary people. Rooted in their history is a vision -- admittedly utopian -- that affirms the possibilities of living in biracial peace; prizes grace, hospitality and humor; and fights like hell against bureaucrats who refuse to acknowledge the human potential for rising above self-interest and cynicism. Maybe -- just maybe -- there is reason to hope.

WAR NEWS:

Gates Sending Brigade Of 82nd To Kuwait (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, December 27, 2006

Defense Secretary Robert Gates has signed orders that will send the 82nd Airborne Division's 2nd Brigade to Kuwait shortly after the new year, senior defense officials said Tuesday.

The decision to send the unit was first reported earlier this month. The soldiers, who are based at Fort Bragg, N.C., are expected to be deployed into Iraq early next year, and the move could be part of a short-term surge of troops to the battlefront to quell the ongoing violence.

The 82nd Airborne unit — which would include as many as 3,300 soldiers — will replace the 15th Marine Expeditionary Unit, which had served as the reserve force based in Kuwait but has been deployed into Iraq.

Army officials said Tuesday that they were not aware a final decision had been made on sending the unit to Kuwait. But two senior defense officials, who requested anonymity because the announcement had not yet been made public, said Gates had signed the order Tuesday — the first of his week-old tenure as Pentagon chief.

Gates was in Iraq last week meeting with U.S. military commanders and Iraqi officials.

He met with President Bush on Saturday to relay what he saw and learned during his three days in Iraq. He is scheduled to travel to Crawford, Texas, to meet with Bush on Thursday to discuss options for changes in the Iraq strategy. He and other military leaders have said that all options are on the table. Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, will also meet with Bush on Thursday.

Some of the options for a new strategy in Iraq that have been under discussion by U.S. officials include an increase in troops, to help tamp down the violence, particularly in Baghdad, and to beef up the training of Iraq soldiers.

There are 134,000 troops in Iraq. The U.S. military has consistently kept a reserve force in Kuwait that can easily and quickly be deployed into Iraq, or other places in the region, as needed.

Gates took over the top job at the Pentagon last week after the resignation of Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Bush In Texas To Rethink Iraq Course (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, December 27, 2006

President Bush went to his ranch Tuesday to rethink U.S. involvement in Iraq as his spokesman hailed a Baghdad court's decision upholding the death sentence for former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein.

Saddam, who was deposed by the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003, is to be hanged within 30 days.

"Today marks an important milestone in the Iraqi people's efforts to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law," deputy White House press secretary Scott Stanzel told reporters aboard Air Force One to Texas, where Bush was to meet this week with his national security team.

Iraq's highest appeals court on Tuesday upheld the Nov. 5 sentence against Saddam for ordering the killing of 148 Shiites in Dujail in 1982, following an attempt on his life. Chief Judge Aref Shahin said the sentence must be implemented within 30 days, and could be carried out as early as Wednesday.

"Saddam Hussein has received due process and legal rights that he denied the Iraqi people for so long, so this is an important day for the Iraqi people," Stanzel said.

The 82nd Airborne Division's 2nd Brigade, which would include as many as 3,300 soldiers, has been ordered to go to Kuwait shortly after the new year, senior defense officials said Tuesday. Defense Secretary Robert Gates has approved the deployment, which had been reported earlier this month, said officials who requested anonymity because the announcement had not yet been made public

At the Pentagon, officials said Gates isn't likely to offer a single solution but, rather, a broad set of recommendations for changing the course in Iraq. A senior Defense Department official, who spoke only on condition of anonymity because Gates' advice to Bush is secret, said the recommendations "would involve many aspects of how we can do things differently."

Bush, saddled with low approval ratings for his handling of Iraq, will host a National Security Council meeting on Thursday at the ranch, but is not expected to make any final decision on what he says will be a new way forward in Iraq.

Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Defense Secretary Robert Gates and National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley will attend the meeting.

Stanzel said there could be other National Security Council meetings before the president makes up his mind and delivers a speech to announce his decisions. The speech is expected before the State of the Union address on Jan. 23.

Bush is under mounting pressure to change U.S. involvement in Iraq where violence continued to escalate this month.

On Tuesday, the U.S. military reported that seven more American soldiers had died, pushing the U.S. military death toll for the month to 90. With five days remaining in the month, December is already the second deadliest month for the U.S. military this year, behind the 105 soldiers killed in October.

The latest deaths also brought the number of U.S. military members killed since the beginning of the Iraq war in March 2003 to at least 2,978 — five more than the number killed in the Sept. 11 attacks in New York, Washington and Pennsylvania.

Stanzel said Bush continues to question advisers and think through the consequences of various U.S. actions. "Our forces, coalition forces in Iraq are continuing to take the fight to the enemy, and the president will announce a new way forward when he's comfortable" with his decision, he said.

When the president arrived in Texas, about 50 well-wishers, squinting in the sunshine, welcomed him as he walked down the steps of the plane with Mrs. Bush and her mother, Jenna Welch. The president spent the Christmas holiday with his family at the Camp David presidential retreat in Maryland.

Mrs. Bush gave the president a new blue suit, biking shoes and country singer Sam Moore's CD titled "Overnight Sensational." He gave her amber-colored citrine earrings to match the triple-strand citrine necklace he gave her for her birthday.

Bush's Iraq Plan Gets Big Build-up (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, December 27, 2006

Determined not to be rushed, President Bush has spent weeks figuring out a new war plan in Iraq. All the while, the American public's expectations have been headed in one direction — up.

Anticipation is high not just because people are weary of war, but also because of the way Bush has gone about deciding his next move.

Saddled with a reputation for stubbornness, Bush has gone the other direction. He has made a visible effort to seek advice — from the military, diplomats, academics, retired generals, a special study commission, Iraqi officials, Republican leaders, even Democrats he once ridiculed.

By the time he announces his Iraq plan in January, roughly two months will have passed since a humbling election for Republicans brought a promise of a "new way forward."

There might as well be a drum roll.

"He has built up expectations," said David Gergen, a former White House adviser in the administrations of presidents Nixon, Ford, Reagan and Clinton. "People are saying, 'OK, if you've spent all this time and effort on it, you better have a pretty darn good plan.'"

The ostensible goal of that plan will be to get Iraq on a path to govern itself and help the United States fight terrorism. Bush is also out to win back some of the American people, who want to know the war has an end in sight.

Recent history shows the trouble with high expectations.

The Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan commission of Washington elders, this month offered Bush a stark, comprehensive plan to change course. It was so highly anticipated that when it was not embraced by the White House in toto, it seemed to fall flat and fade from view.

Bush now faces his own test of great expectations, largely of his own doing. He's promised a new approach, yet even his new defense secretary, Robert Gates, has acknowledged that "there are no new ideas in Iraq."

Indeed, some of the main ideas under consideration — sending in more troops, embedding more U.S. advisers in Iraqi units, engaging in more aggressive diplomacy — aren't novel. And if Bush does come up with a remarkably fresh approach after nearly four years of war, that will raise the question of why he hadn't thought of it before.

Even with that seemingly no-win set of expectations, the president does have room to succeed, said Kathleen Hall Jamieson, director of the Annenberg Public Policy Center at the University of Pennsylvania.

"It doesn't have to be new. It has to be new for him," said Jamieson, who specializes in presidential rhetoric.

Bush and his defense team set the expectations in the first place, assuring that Iraq had stockpiles of weapons of mass destruction, and promising that U.S. troops would be viewed as liberators. Now the president can reset the expectations.

What people want is to hear Bush explain a clear route to an honorable outcome — one in which it is clear that the war left Iraq and the U.S. better off, Jamieson said.

"There are times when a country roots for a leader. I think that's what happening with this," Jamieson said. "A lot of people who voted for Democrats want the president to succeed. I think he has some advantage coming in, because the public so desperately wants success."

Desperate, and skeptical.

Bush's approval for handling the situation in Iraq was at 27 percent in an AP-Ipsos poll this month — his lowest-ever approval level on Iraq in that poll. Only a third of Americans said Iraq would end up as a stable, democratic nation.

"I think the American people understand this war perhaps better than anybody gives them credit for," said Leon Panetta, who was President Clinton's chief of staff and a member of the Iraq Study Group. "If they believe that the president has approached this with what he calls 'fresh eyes' — if he takes a comprehensive approach — then they're going to give him some room."

Bush used a year-end news conference last week to help frame the expectations.

He promised to work with Democrats and be flexible about war tactics. But his only prediction for 2007 in Iraq was sober: "It's going to require difficult choices and additional sacrifices, because the enemy is merciless and violent."

The president also braced America to think long-term. His goals aren't changing. He talks of the war on terror as the calling of a generation, one that "is going to require a sustained commitment from the American people. "

That's a world away for those looking for a firm date when U.S. troops will come home.

Gergen, the former White House adviser, said it's unrealistic to expect Bush to come up with a plan so dazzling it will rally the country. But it may extend the nation's patience.

"That has to be his goal, from a political perspective," Gergen said. "For a president, buying time to try something new is often the most important thing you can do in a crisis."

The White House puts some of the blame on the media for rising expectations. Spokesman Tony Snow, who spends every briefing fending off requests for details about Bush's plan, told reporters this week to "take a deep, cleansing breath."

Even the timing of Bush's Iraq speech has been sucked into the expectations game.

First, word emerged that his Iraq address would occur by Christmas. When the date then was set for sometime after the new year, the White House said it never had locked in the timing, but still had to answer questions about a "delay."

Asked whether the president felt a sense of urgency to announce his strategy sooner, rather than later, given the rising death toll in Iraq, White House deputy press secretary Scott Stanzel told reporters on Tuesday: "He's wanting to make sure that we give all consideration to all the options. ... Coalition forces in Iraq are continuing to take the fight to the enemy, and the president will announce a new way forward when he's comfortable announcing that."

Old Iraq Strategy Lives On In Weekly Progress Reports (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, December 26, 2006

A year ago, President Bush announced a new plan for Iraq, framed around "eight pillars" of U.S. policy for victory. In the past month, the president and his national security team have been busily working on a new recipe for success in Iraq, having declared the previous plan a failure.

But never mind what the politicians are doing. The bureaucracy churns on.

The State Department continues every Wednesday to issue a 30-page public report that details exactly how the U.S. government is meeting the goals set forth in the president's now-abandoned plan. The report frames the data around Bush's storied eight pillars, which include such goals as "Defeat the Terrorists and Neutralize the Insurgents" (Pillar 1) and "Increase International Support for Iraq" (Pillar 7).

In many ways, the report is a microcosm of the administration's lost year in Iraq. The reams of details aimed at touting success belie the fact that few of the goals are being met.

The report is often upbeat as it presents some of the most minuscule factoids of the situation in Iraq. The Dec. 13 report noted that on Dec. 7, 40 sheikhs from across Diyala province met "to discuss ways to maintain peace and stability" and that on Dec. 9, U.S. soldiers discovered a factory for making improvised explosive devices in a house in Baqubah.

But the bottom-line graphs tell a story of failure. Under Pillar 5 ("Help Iraq Strengthen Its Economy") the reports show that week after week, the Iraqis cannot meet their goals for crude oil production. Another chart shows that efforts to build a 15-day supply of all refined products, such as diesel and gasoline, are woefully behind schedule, reaching a peak of a four-day supply.

Under Pillar 7, increasing international support, the trends are on the decline. The first report of the year showed that 28 countries, in addition to the United States, contributed 23,000 troops to coalition forces. By last week's report, the number of countries had fallen to 25 -- and the number of troops was down to 16,860, a decrease of more than 25 percent. Italy recently dropped off the list when the last of its troops departed.

One figure has not really budged: the $20 billion apportioned for rebuilding Iraq (under Pillar 4, "Help Iraq Build Government Capacity and Provide Essential Services"). That is because the administration ran out of money for rebuilding Iraq, in part because about 25 percent was diverted to security. The latest report says that all but $4 billion has been disbursed.

A State Department official, speaking on the condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to talk to reporters about the report, said it still plays an important role because it provides the administration with a single set of numbers about the situation in Iraq. Previously, State and Defense department officials might have arrived at meetings armed with different data, but "now everyone is talking off the same sheet on music," he said.

There is also a classified version of the report, which includes details on counterterrorism operations, given to top policymakers on Fridays.

The report is prepared not by State Department officials but by a team of about 10 people hired by a management consulting firm. The firm, BearingPoint, has a $2 million contract to produce the report and to manage the process of running Iraq policy in the administration, the State Department official said.

Below the level of the top policymakers, working groups from across the government implement Iraq policy day by day. The BearingPoint employees, who work out of offices in the State Department, arrange the meetings, set the agendas, take notes and provide summaries of the discussions, the official said. They also maintain the Web site of the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad.

The twists and turns of American policy are imperfectly reflected in the report. "Operation Together Forward," the effort this summer to bolster security in Baghdad, which was later deemed a disappointment, was the subject of several upbeat reports but then seemed to fade in importance. During the spike in violence in October, the report noted that the Iraqi Ministry of Interior had recalled a police brigade for more training after "possible complicity with sectarian violence," though it brightly added that the training "will improve the professionalism and confidence within the national police."

The report seemed uncertain how to treat the release of a report by the Iraq Study Group, the independent bipartisan panel that criticized the administration's policy and spurred the White House to come up with a new plan. The earliest mention of the study group's report, in the Dec. 13 edition, came under Pillar 3, "Help Iraqis to Forge a National Compact for Democratic Government."

The headline said it all: "Iraqi Leaders Blast Iraq Study Group's Report." The State Department, perhaps in an effort to demonstrate the unity of Iraqi leaders, then devoted a whole page to negative quotes about the panel's recommendations.

The Dec. 20 report featured one curious item. Under the rubric of increasing international support, the report highlighted a visit to Damascus, Syria, by Sens. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) and Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.). The senators "arrived in Syria December 19 to discuss how Damascus could help bring stability and security in Iraq," the report said, noting that another senator, Bill Nelson (D-Fla.), met with Syrian President Bashar al-Assad in early December.

The State Department had strongly discouraged the trips, saying Syria is a key source of problems in Iraq.

Democrats Prepare For A Battle On The War (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, December 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — After years of playing a marginal role in the Iraq war, congressional Democrats plan to move quickly in January to assert more control and undercut any White House effort to increase troop levels.

As President Bush prepares to outline his own plan for Iraq in a major speech in the next few weeks, Democratic leaders will counter with weeks of oversight hearings, summoning military officers, administration officials and foreign policy experts to Capitol Hill.

The Democratic plans put Congress on a collision course with Bush over the direction of the nearly 4-year-old war. And they signal a new phase in a war that has been directed almost exclusively by the White House with little dissent from the Republican-controlled Capitol.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden, D-Del., the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said Tuesday that he intends to call key administration officials, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, to testify at a series of hearings.

At the same time, the chairmen of both armed services committees and the House International Relations Committee also plan to hold hearings.

"I hope the president and his people will listen," Biden said.

Biden, who was elected to the Senate during the Vietnam War and who is planning a 2008 presidential run, has been among the most outspoken critics of Bush's Iraq policies and Tuesday called any increase in troops "the absolute wrong strategy."

His plan for hearings as well as those of the other committee chairmen highlight just how much the political landscape in Washington has changed as a more critical and assertive Democratic Congress moves to directly challenge the president's management of the unpopular war.

Democrats took control of Congress after an election that turned on the electorate's unhappiness with the war. But Democrats have struggled for years to articulate an alternative to the Bush administration's policies.

As recently as last year, when Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., called for the withdrawal of American troops from Iraq, many in the party agonized over whether that position would permanently tar Democrats as weak. But as discontent with the war has grown, sapping Bush's popularity, Democratic lawmakers have become increasingly outspoken in their criticisms.

Senior party leaders now appear to be uniting behind the call for a phased withdrawal of U.S. forces, a position that was bolstered by the release in November of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group's report.

The report did not set a specific timetable for withdrawing troops, but did suggest numerous changes in the administration's policies, including more diplomatic engagement with Iraq's neighbors, another prescription being embraced by congressional Democrats.

"Democrats and the bipartisan Iraq Study Group have both laid down a road map for the president to begin the withdrawal of American troops from the civil war in Iraq," incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said last week. "It is now up to the president to follow that course."

Until now, Democratic lawmakers had few forums for their complaints and suggestions beside the Sunday-morning political talk shows. With control of both chambers of Congress, the party now has the power to schedule hearings, subpoena documents and even put conditions on how the administration spends money on the war in Iraq.

On Tuesday, a Bush spokesman would only say that the president recognized the "oversight role" of Congress.

"We hope they will use this oversight role in an appropriate fashion," deputy press secretary Scott Stanzel said from Crawford, Texas, where the president is spending the Christmas holiday. "That's what the American people expect -- for both sides to work together for the common good."

Bush has met with the new Democratic leaders, but has shown little inclination to accept their counsel on the war. Rather than talk of reducing the number of U.S. soldiers in Iraq, the White House has focused in the weeks since the release of the Iraq Study Group report on a temporary increase in troops that proponents say will help control the growing sectarian violence.

Senior congressional Democrats, including Biden, have fiercely attacked that plan, arguing that the best way to force Iraqis to take responsibility for halting the violence between Sunnis and Shiites is to begin a phased withdrawal.

A number of GOP senators -- including Susan Collins of Maine and Norm Coleman of Minnesota, who are up for re-election in 2008 -- have already expressed skepticism about the surge in troop strength. Other Republicans, including Arizona Sen. John McCain, a presidential hopeful, were early backers of sending more troops to Iraq.

Only 12 percent of Americans support a troop increase, compared to 52 percent who prefer a timetable for withdrawal, a recent Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg poll found.

The flood of congressional hearings in January promises to shed unfavorable light on the way the Bush administration has prosecuted the war in Iraq. But even Biden acknowledged that, short of cutting off funding, Congress has limited ability to compel the White House to dramatically change course.

Though Congress has in the past used its power over the budget to challenge the foreign policies of presidents -- including cutting funding to the government of South Vietnam in the mid-1970s -- no leading Democrat thus far has called for withholding money for military operations in Iraq.

"We should not exaggerate the ability of the United States Foreign Relations Committee or the Congress to get a president to act in a manner in which the Congress thinks is more rational or more appropriate," Biden said Tuesday. "There's nothing the United States Congress can do by a piece of legislation to alter the conduct of a war that a president decides to pursue."

"This is President Bush's war," he said.

Biden To Fight Troop Buildup In Iraq (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said yesterday that he would oppose any plan by President Bush to increase the number of U.S. troops in Iraq.

"I totally oppose the surging of additional troops into Baghdad, and I think it is contrary to the overwhelming body of informed opinion, both people inside the administration and outside the administration," Biden told reporters yesterday. He said he plans to hold hearings for his panel next month in a bid to influence the president's decision.

Bush is said to be studying a plan to send as many as 30,000 additional troops to Iraq, possibly to help stabilize Baghdad, as part of a new strategy to improve security and stem the escalating sectarian violence. Biden contended that such a move "will not have any positive effect, except extremely temporarily."

The remarks from Biden, who said yesterday that he will announce next month his candidacy for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008, came as Bush headed to his Crawford, Tex., ranch for a review of the U.S. strategy in Iraq. The president is scheduled to host a meeting of the National Security Council at the ranch tomorrow, to be attended by Vice President Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley. But he is not expected to immediately release a final decision on a new strategy.

Biden said that one problem with the present discussion of a buildup of U.S. troops in Iraq is that no one can specify exactly what the president may be studying. He and others have asked for specifics on the troops' mission, the number involved and how long they would be in Iraq.

Bush said at a Dec. 20 news conference that "there's got to be a specific mission that can be accomplished with the addition of more troops before, you know, I agree on that strategy."

Some key Republicans, including Sens. John McCain (Ariz.) and Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.), have come out in favor of increasing troop levels. McCain said earlier this month, during a trip to Iraq, that he believes "there is still a compelling reason to have an increase in troops here in Baghdad and in Anbar province in order to bring the sectarian violence under control" and to "allow the political process to proceed."

On Sunday, Graham, who had just returned from Iraq, said security in Baghdad has deteriorated to the point that a troop increase is necessary, though it should be "co-joined with political reform." During an appearance on ABC News's "This Week with George Stephanopoulos," Graham said that "more troops in Anbar would help stop the insurgency flow from Syria into Baghdad" and that "more troops in Baghdad would give the politicians some breathing room."

Incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) said recently that if U.S. military commanders support a buildup, "just for a short period of time, we'll go along with that." But a period of 18 months to 24 months would be too long, he said.

Biden noted yesterday that retired Gen. Jack Keane, a former Army vice chief of staff, helped produce an American Enterprise Institute study that called for 20,000 additional U.S. troops in Baghdad to clear and hold neighborhoods for about 18 months.

Biden said he does not think that even that would work. He stressed that "if the president does make this surge, I hope he levels with the American people and makes it clear the minimum that they're going to be there for 18 months."

Biden said that his committee will begin hearings on Iraq on Jan. 9 and that if Bush has not released his plan by then, he might start with experts and "those proposing alternatives" to what the president may do. He is planning three days of hearings each week for three weeks and will include past and present administration officials.

Rice has agreed to appear, but not until after Bush has presented his new strategy to the nation. Gates will be asked to appear. Biden said he does not plan to call former defense secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, but he added: "That's not something that's totally off the table."

Biden said that he hopes to generate "some bipartisan consensus in the Senate" but that he does not expect to do more than try to influence Republican senators who could then affect Bush's decisions. He said that, at his last meeting with Bush, after the November elections, he told the president, "all we can do is try to . . . cooperate with you, and when we disagree with you, try to influence your decision by making the case to the public at large that we should change course."

Biden Previews Democrats' Tack Against Troop Plan (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, December 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The incoming Democratic chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee said no new U.S. troops should be sent to Iraq, setting up a potential political battle over President Bush's tentative plan to deploy tens of thousands of additional forces to try to stabilize the country.

Delaware Sen. Joseph Biden also said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice would testify before his panel early next year. The hearing would give the new Democratic majority in Congress its first opportunity to question senior Bush administration officials about their handling of Iraq. The remarks were the clearest indication to date that Democrats are planning a full-blown push to prevent the administration from sending more troops to Iraq and to ensure that the White House pays a political price if it were to do so.

Mr. Biden, who announced yesterday he will seek his party's 2008 presidential nomination, made the comments as hopes for a bipartisan solution to the Iraq crisis fade. Lawmakers from both parties had hoped the Iraq Study Group headed by former Secretary of State James Baker III, a Republican, and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton might offer a blueprint for a way forward in Iraq that members of both parties could embrace.

But the two sides remain far apart. The White House has rejected the commission's calls to withdraw most U.S. troops within 18 months and to hold direct negotiations with Syria and Iran, while Democrats have lined up behind a proposal to begin pulling U.S. forces out of Iraq early next year.

The tensions between the two parties over the war seem certain to escalate if the Bush administration goes through with its tentative plan to send as many as 20,000 new U.S. forces to Iraq.

White House officials say such a troop "surge" almost certainly will be the centerpiece of Mr. Bush's planned speech to the country early next year to lay out a new strategy for fighting the war. Mr. Bush is set to meet with Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Defense Secretary Robert Gates and National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley in Crawford, Texas, tomorrow to discuss the speech, though a Bush aide said he doesn't expect the president to reach any final conclusions at the session.

Administration officials, meanwhile, hailed an Iraqi appellate court's decision yesterday to uphold the death sentence against ousted leader Saddam Hussein, who is set to be hanged within 30 days. Deputy White House press secretary Scott Stanzel said the ruling is an "important milestone in the Iraqi people's efforts to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law."

Mr. Biden yesterday used a conference call with reporters to make clear that he would work hard to prevent the White House from ordering more troops to Iraq. He said such a move would strain the already overstretched U.S. military to the breaking point, while doing little to resolve the underlying political disputes fueling Iraq's civil war.

"I totally oppose the surging of additional American troops," he said. "I think it is the absolute wrong strategy."

Mr. Biden is the latest high-profile Democrat to come out against increasing U.S. troop levels. The incoming House speaker, Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California, opposes the idea, as does the incoming Senate Majority Leader, Harry Reid of Nevada. Other prominent Democratic opponents include Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, a likely presidential candidate; Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts, the party's 2004 nominee for the White House; and Michigan Sen. Carl Levin, the incoming chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

The strongest supporters of the "surge" idea, outside the White House, are Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain and Connecticut Sen. Joseph Lieberman, an independent.

Most Senate Democrats have for now coalesced around a proposal by Mr. Levin to begin withdrawing most American forces next April. Mr. Biden is closely associated with a second plan that calls for dividing Iraq into three quasi-independent sectarian regions, an idea rejected by the Iraq Study Group and the White House.

During yesterday's call, Mr. Biden said he would hold three weeks of hearings beginning Jan. 9 to examine the various proposals on Iraq, including the partition plan. He said Ms. Rice has agreed to testify after Mr. Bush gives his national address on Iraq, and that Mr. Gates might also testify.

Mr. Biden acknowledged Democrats could do little to force the administration's hand on the matter, since the final decision rests with Mr. Bush. "This is President Bush's war," he said.

Biden Opposes A Troop Increase In Iraq, Foreshadowing A Fight With The Bush Administration (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 26 — Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, on Tuesday rejected a troop increase for Iraq, foreshadowing what could be a contentious fight between the Bush administration and Congress.

Mr. Biden, a Democrat, announced that he would begin hearings on Iraq on Jan. 9 and expected high-ranking officials, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, to appear.

As President Bush flew to his Texas ranch on Tuesday, a spokesman for the National Security Council urged the senator to wait for Mr. Bush to present his new Iraq policy next month before passing judgment.

“President Bush will talk soon to our troops, the American people and Iraqis about a new way forward for Iraq that will lead to a democratic, unified country that can govern, defend and sustain itself,” said Gordon Johndroe, the council spokesman.

The date has not been scheduled, but administration officials said it would be before the State of the Union address on Jan. 23. Mr. Bush, who intends to write the speech this week, is to hold a National Security Council meeting on Thursday at his ranch to discuss Iraq policy. Vice President Dick Cheney, Ms. Rice, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, are expected to attend.

One plan under consideration is to send an additional 30,000 troops to Iraq in a bid to restore order. “I totally oppose this surging of additional American troops into Baghdad,” Mr. Biden said. “It’s contrary to the overwhelming body of informed opinion, both inside and outside the administration.”

Mr. Biden, who said he planned to run for president in 2008, made his critique during a teleconference call with reporters. He continued to press his proposal for a partitioning of Iraq into three autonomous states — controlled by Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds — to be sustained with what he called an equitable distribution of the country’s oil wealth.

He did not say what he would do if the administration went ahead with a temporary increase in American combat forces, and it is unclear whether the Democrats have the power to stop such a move.

While Congress could hold up funding for the war in Iraq, the administration retains the upper hand in determining the American course there, especially since it is unlikely that a Congress that is so evenly split between Republicans and Democrats will speak with a unified voice.

One thing remains certain, though: President Bush will remain under pressure to talk to Iran and Syria about the deteriorating situation in Iraq in particular and the Middle East in general, as is called for by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, led by James A. Baker III, the former Republican secretary of state, and Lee H. Hamilton, the former Democratic congressman.

While the Bush administration has indicated that American officials will not heed the suggestion that they enlist help from Iran and Syria, there continues to be a drumbeat of calls for the United States to talk to those countries.

Earlier this month, three Democratic senators — Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut, Bill Nelson of Florida and John Kerry of Massachusetts — ignored protests from the Bush administration and flew to Damascus to meet with the Syrian president, Bashar al-Assad. On Tuesday, Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania became the first Republican to follow suit.

Mr. Specter said before leaving the United States that other Republican lawmakers might follow him to Damascus. He said there was growing concern that the administration's policies in the Middle East were not working.

Although the United States still has an embassy in Damascus, it has been represented there by a chargé d'affaires since Mr. Bush recalled the ambassador, Margaret Scobey, after the assassination of Rafik Hariri, the former Lebanese prime minister, in February 2005.

Since then contact between the two governments have been kept to low-level officials, and last week Ms. Rice reiterated that the United States planned to keep its associations with Damascus in the deep freeze.

Biden To Fight Troop Surge (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, December 27, 2006

The incoming Democratic chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee yesterday said he will try to block President Bush from sending an additional 30,000 troops to Iraq, calling it "the absolute wrong strategy."

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware plans three straight weeks of congressional hearings on Iraq policy next month in hopes of persuading the president to abandon a plan he is thought to be seriously considering.

"We've already broken Iraq. We're about to break the United States military" by sending more troops, said Mr. Biden, who is seeking the 2008 presidential nomination.

Mr. Bush early next month will announce a new strategy for the war, and is thought to favor a temporary increase in troop levels in what has been dubbed a "surge."

Mr. Biden said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has agreed to testify before his panel after the president announces his plans. Other likely panel witnesses are Iraq Study Group leaders James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton, and new Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates.

The committee also will hear from a variety of academics, former and current administration officials, military leaders and Peter W. Galbraith, a former U.S. ambassador to Croatia, who has called for formally partitioning Iraq into three sovereign nations.

The idea is to hear from all those who "have rational although different views as to how to proceed in Iraq," in an attempt to build consensus, Mr. Biden said.

"Hopefully there is still some opportunity to influence President Bush's decision," he said.

Voters dealt Mr. Bush a blow last month in midterm elections that propelled Democrats to House and Senate majorities. Soon after the elections, the Iraq Study Group recommended the U.S. begin a withdrawal of combat troops.

Incoming Democratic leaders promise a change of course on the war, which yesterday reached a death toll surpassing that of the September 11 terrorist attacks.

Many Democrats oppose increasing the number of troops in Iraq, where nearly 150,000 are already stationed.

Republicans so far seem divided on a surge, with Sen. John McCain of Arizona pushing the idea and Foreign Relations Committee member Sen. Norm Coleman of Minnesota saying he can't support sending more troops.

Mr. Biden favors beginning to withdraw U.S. troops, and thinks one way to get to that point is to divide Iraq into three mostly autonomous regions with a weak central government in Baghdad. He notes the Iraqi constitution calls for such a federal system, and says it should be partnered with a plan for sharing in oil revenues.

Mr. Biden worked with Leslie H. Gelb, president emeritus of the Council on Foreign Relations, in proposing the plan in May. He said yesterday he will call Mr. Gelb as a witness.

The three weeks of hearings will begin Jan. 9, will run three to four days per week, and will include discussion of the need to bring Iraq's neighbors to the negotiating table, Mr. Biden said.

He said Republicans should realize the Iraq situation holds huge political implications for their party in 2008 -- both in congressional elections and in the race for the White House.

DOJ_NMG_0109276

"The last thing that John McCain or any other Republican ... running for president wants to inherit is a war in Iraq that is even further deteriorating than it is now," Mr. Biden said.

He said Democrats cannot remain silent on war policy, but noted he thinks it is the Republicans on the panel who can help pressure Mr. Bush into changing his mind.

"There is nothing the United States Congress can do by a piece of legislation to alter the course of a war the president decides," he said.

Mr. Biden recently told Mr. Bush as much during a visit to the White House, saying: "Mr. President, this is your war."

Balancing the personalities -- and competing potential presidential contenders from both parties who sit on his committee -- might be easier said than done. Among the possible hopefuls on the panel are Democratic Sens. Barack Obama of Illinois, John Kerry of Massachusetts and Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut, and Republican Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska.

When asked how having so many possible 2008 candidates at the dais would affect these hearings, Mr. Biden laughed.

"I hope it's not going to have a lot of impact, although I am sure there are going to be folks who will prepare more thoroughly," he said.

Also expected to be an outspoken voice on the panel is Sen.-elect James H. Webb Jr., an anti-war Virginia Democrat who unseated Republican George Allen last month.

Mr. Bush announced this month he would seek an expanded armed forces, adding thousands of troops to the size of the Army and Marine Corps.

The Washington Times reported last week that senior military officials and the Joint Chiefs of Staff are pressuring Mr. Bush to seek a larger military and that the Joint Chiefs are "cool at best" to the Iraq Study Group proposal.

Biden To Run For White House In 2008 (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopuloin Washington

Financial Times, December 27, 2006

The field of Democratic presidential hopefuls grew yesterday after Joseph Biden, the Delaware senator, announced his intention to run for the White House in 2008.

Mr Biden, one of the leading Democratic critics of US policy in Iraq, joins Tom Vilsack, governor of Iowa, and Dennis Kucinich, the Ohio congressman who ran unsuccessfully in 2004, as the party's only declared candidates for the 2008 race.

"It is my intention to seek the [Democratic] nomination, and it's my intention sometime in the month of January to set up the appropriate mechanism to be able to raise money for that purpose," Mr Biden said at the end of a conference call about Iraq policy.

While Mr Biden is considered a presidential long shot, his voter name recognition will rise in the coming weeks as he holds a series of high-profile congressional hearings on Iraq. Yesterday he repeated his opposition to increasing US troop numbers in Iraq amid speculation that President George W. Bush will next month announce a US military surge in Iraq to help curb the violence.

"We've already broken Iraq, we're about to break the United States' military," Mr Biden said, announcing his candidacy as the US military death toll in Iraq reached 2,977, overtaking the number of people killed in the 2001 al-Qaeda attacks on the US.

One of the few Republican voices calling for more troops in Iraq is John McCain, the Arizona senator, who is considered one of the frontrunners for his party's presidential nomination. But in recent weeks Rudy Giuliani, the former New York mayor, has edged ahead of Mr McCain in polls of Republican voters.

As a six-term senator who next week becomes chairman of the Senate foreign relations committee, Mr Biden is a respected congressional voice on foreign policy. But opinion polls place him far behind senators Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama, both of whom are contemplating presidential bids.

A recent NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll found that only 4 per cent of respondents who said they would vote in the Democratic primaries expressed a preference for Mr Biden. Some 37 per cent favoured Ms Clinton and 18 per cent preferred Mr Obama.

The roster of Democrats hoping to move to the White House in 2008 is expected to expand in the coming weeks. John Edwards, the former South Carolina senator who became John Kerry's running mate in 2004, is expected to announce soon whether he will seek the presidency again.

But some potential candidates have decided not to pursue the presidency. Evan Bayh, the Indiana senator, and Mark Warner, the former popular Democratic governor of Virginia, both recently announced they would not seek the party's nomination.

Biden Vows To Fight Any Iraq Troop Boost (AP)

AP, December 27, 2006

Incoming Senate Foreign Relations Chairman Joseph Biden, a potential Democratic presidential candidate, said Tuesday he would oppose any effort by President Bush to increase U.S troops in Iraq as part of a new war strategy.

Biden also announced he has summoned Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to testify before his committee next month to discuss the administration's new plan for Iraq as soon as it is made public.

The Delaware Democrat took advantage of a quiet holiday week to draw attention to his own proposal for Iraq, which includes beginning a drawdown of U.S. forces and finding a political settlement among the various ethnic factions there.

Biden has spoken candidly of his desire to run for president and has made repeated visits in the past year to early voting states like Iowa and New Hampshire. But he is trying to find room on a crowded stage of Democratic contenders that includes Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois.

Biden warned that congressional Republicans — not Democrats — would suffer in the 2008 elections if they do not join him in speaking out against Bush and opposing troop increases in Iraq.

"Absent some profound political announcement . . . I can't imagine there being an overwhelming, even significant support for the president's position," he told reporters during a telephone conference call Tuesday.

If the violence continues two years from now, "every one of those Republican senators — and there's 21 of them up for re-election — knows that that is likely to spell his or her doom," Biden said.

Bush has not announced whether he plans to increase the number of troops in Iraq, but administration officials say that option is among several being considered. Also, Bush last week said he wants to expand the size of the Army and Marine Corps to lessen the strain on ground forces.

The move was seen by many military experts as laying the groundwork to announce early next month a planned surge in forces in Iraq.

Military experts and some ground commanders are skeptical that a surge in ground forces could work to settle the violence in Iraq. Those concerns were expressed in a new bipartisan report on Iraq.

"Sustained increases in U.S. troop levels would not solve the fundamental cause of violence in Iraq, which is the absence of national reconciliation," the Iraq Study Group concluded.

But others, including Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., — another possible presidential contender — and experts at the conservative American Enterprise Institute, say a surge in forces could hold off the insurgency long enough to build up the Iraqi security forces and form a political settlement.

Biden, who will head the Foreign Relations Committee when Democrats take control of Congress next month, said he wants to hear from Rice on Jan. 9. The senator said she has agreed to testify, but only after Bush announces his plan on Iraq.

The president is expected to deliver a speech on Iraq sometime before his State of the Union address on Jan. 23.

Biden said he hopes the hearings will generate bipartisan consensus in Congress that will pressure the president to abandon talk of increasing troop levels in Iraq. There are currently an estimated 140,000 troops in the country.

"Even with the surge of troops, in a city of 6 million people you're talking about a ratio that would still be roughly above one to 100," Biden said of Baghdad. "It's bound to draw down support that we need in other parts of Iraq, including Anbar province."

Biden also said he believes Democrats' political vulnerability on Iraq is limited.

"I think we'll only have to accept responsibility for the war if we remain silent," he said.

Biden said he delivered this message in a recent meeting at the White House, where he told Bush: "Mr. President, this is your war."

The Right Type Of 'Surge' (WP)

By Jack Keane And Frederick W. Kagan
The Washington Post, December 26, 2006

Reports on the Bush administration's efforts to craft a new strategy in Iraq often use the term "surge" but rarely define it. Estimates of the number of troops to be added in Baghdad range from fewer than 10,000 to more than 30,000. Some "surges" would last a few months, others a few years.

We need to cut through the confusion. Bringing security to Baghdad -- the essential precondition for political compromise, national reconciliation and economic development -- is possible only with a surge of at least 30,000 combat troops lasting 18 months or so. Any other option is likely to fail.

The key to the success is to change the military mission -- instead of preparing for transition to Iraqi control, that mission should be to bring security to the Iraqi population. Surges aimed at accelerating the training of Iraqi forces will fail, because rising sectarian violence will destroy Iraq before the new forces can bring it under control.

Any military strategy must of course be accompanied by a range of diplomatic, political, economic and reconciliation initiatives, but those alone will not contain the violence either. Success in Iraq today requires a well-thought-out military operation aimed at bringing security to the people of Baghdad as quickly as possible -- a traditional counterinsurgency mission.

Of all the "surge" options out there, short ones are the most dangerous. Increasing troop levels in Baghdad for three or six months would virtually ensure defeat. It takes that long for newly arrived soldiers to begin to understand the areas where they operate. Short surges would redeploy them just as they began to be effective.

In addition, a short surge would play into the enemy's hands. Both Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias expect the U.S. presence to fade away over the course of 2007, and they expect any surge to be brief. They will naturally go to ground in the face of a short surge and wait until we have left. They will then attack the civilian population and whatever Iraqi security forces remain, knowing them to be easier targets than U.S. soldiers and Marines. They will work hard to raise the level of sectarian violence in order to prove that our efforts have failed.

We have seen this pattern so many times before that we can be virtually certain the enemy will follow it in the face of a short surge. The only cure is to maintain our presence long enough either to root out the hiding enemy or to defeat him when he becomes impatient. A surge that lasted at least 18 months would achieve that aim. It would also provide time to bring Iraqi forces up to the level needed to fight whatever enemy remains.

The size of the surge matters as much as the length. Baghdad is a large city. Any sound military plan will break the problem of bringing security to the Iraqi capital into manageable parts. But there remains a minimum level of force necessary to make adequate progress in a reasonable time.

U.S. forces working with Iraqi troops can clear neighborhoods fairly quickly. Unfortunately, past endeavors such as Operation Together Forward relied too much on that ability. We sent forces into the city that were large enough to clear a few neighborhoods at a time but not large enough to maintain the security they had established. Any plan for bringing security to Baghdad must include forces for the "hold" phase as well as the "clear" phase.

Clearing and holding the Sunni and mixed Sunni-Shiite neighborhoods in the center of Baghdad, which are the keys to getting the overall levels of violence down, will require around nine American combat brigades (27 battalions, in partnership with Iraqi forces, divided among some 23 districts). Since there are about five brigades in Baghdad now, achieving this level would require a surge of at least four additional combat brigades -- some 20,000 combat troops. Moreover, it would be foolhardy to send precisely as many troops as we think we need. Sound planning requires a reserve of at least one brigade (5,000 soldiers) to respond to unexpected developments. The insurgents have bases beyond Baghdad, especially in Anbar province. Securing Baghdad requires addressing these bases -- a task that would necessitate at least two more Marine regiments (around 7,000 Marines). It is difficult to imagine a responsible plan for getting the violence in and around Baghdad under control that could succeed with fewer than 30,000 combat troops beyond the forces already in Iraq.

It is tempting to imagine that greater use of Iraqi forces could reduce the number of U.S. troops needed for this operation. The temptation must be resisted. We should of course work with the Iraqi government to get as many trained and reliable Iraqi troops as possible into Baghdad, and we should pair our soldiers and Marines with Iraqis as much as we can. But reducing the violence in the Sunni and mixed neighborhoods in Baghdad is the most critical military task the U.S. armed forces face anywhere in the world. We cannot allow that mission to fail simply because some Iraqi units don't show up, aren't at full strength or are less reliable than we had hoped.

The United States faces a dire situation in Iraq because of a history of half-measures. We have always sent "just enough" force to succeed if everything went according to plan. So far nothing has, and there's no reason to believe that it will. Sound military planning doesn't work this way. The only "surge" option that makes sense is both long and large.

Bush's New Look On Iraq: Weary (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, December 26, 2006

Watching President Bush in recent weeks has become a grim kind of reality TV show. In almost every news conference, speech and photo opportunity, the topic is the same: what to do about the grinding war in Iraq. Bush has let the facade crack open -- admitting that his strategy for victory isn't working -- but then he struggles to rebuild it with new words of confidence.

The stress of the job -- so well hidden for much of the past six years -- has begun to show on Bush's face. He often looks burdened, distracted, haunted by a question that has no good answer. When a photographer captures him at ease, as in a sweet Texas-romance picture of Bush and his wife, Laura, that appeared in People magazine last week, it's as if he has escaped the Iraq sweatbox.

I grew up in a Washington that was struggling with the nightmare of a failing war in Vietnam. The government officials of that time were people who behaved as if they'd never known failure in their lives. They had the rosy confidence of the chosen -- "the best and the brightest," as David Halberstam put it. But then the war began to grind them down. I see that same meat grinder at work now. Bush and his officials are strong characters; they work hard not to let you see them sweat. But the anguish and exhaustion are there.

Bush is not a man for introspection. That's part of his flinty personality -- the tight, clipped answers and the forced jocularity of the nicknames he gives to reporters and White House aides. That's why this version of reality TV is so poignant: This very private man has begun to talk out loud about the emotional turmoil inside. He is letting it bleed.

Bush opened the emotional curtain at a news conference last week. A reporter noted that Lyndon Johnson hadn't been able to sleep well during the Vietnam War and asked Bush if this was a "painful time" for him. He gave an unexpectedly personal answer: "Most painful aspect of my presidency has been knowing that good men and women have died in combat. I read about it every night. And my heart breaks for a mother or father or husband or wife or son and daughter. It just does. And so when you ask about pain, that's pain."

Bush's "state of denial," as Bob Woodward rightly called it, has officially ended. He actually spoke the words "We're not winning" last week in an interview with The Post, coupling it with the reverse: "We're not losing." But in truth, he cannot abide the possibility that Iraq will not end in victory. So a day after his "not winning" comment, he half took it back, saying: "I believe that we're going to win," and then adding oddly, as if to reassure himself: "I believe that -- and by the way, if I didn't think that, I wouldn't have our troops there. That's what you've got to know. We're going to succeed."

Policy debates in this White House are often described as battles between competing advisers -- Dick Cheney wants this; the Joint Chiefs favor that; Condi Rice favors a third outcome. This kind of analysis implies that Bush isn't really master of his own house, but I think it's a big mistake. The truth is that with this president, the only opinion that finally matters is his own. And he's a stubborn man. Military leaders can tell him it's a mistake to surge troops into Baghdad, but that doesn't mean he will listen.

Bush says he doesn't care what happens now to his poll numbers, and I believe him. He broke through the political barriers a while ago. I sense that, as he anguishes about Iraq, he has in mind the judgment of future historians. He said it plainly in an interview in October with conservative talk show host Bill O'Reilly: "Look, history is interesting. I read three books on George Washington last year. And my opinion is that if they're still analyzing the first president, the 43rd president ought to be doing what he thinks is right. And eventually, historians will come and realize whether . . . the decisions I made made sense."

What makes reality TV gripping is that it's all happening live -- the contestants make their choices under pressure, win or lose. So too with Bush. He is making a vast wager -- of American lives, treasure and the nation's security -- that his judgments about Iraq were right. The Baker-Hamilton report gave him a chance to take some chips off the table, but Bush doesn't seem interested. He is still playing to win. The audience is shouting out advice, but the man under the spotlight knows he will have to make this decision alone.

Iraq Court Upholds Saddam Death Sentence (AP)

By Christopher Torchia

AP, December 27, 2006

Iraq's highest court rejected Saddam Hussein's appeal Tuesday and said the former dictator must be hanged within 30 days for ordering the killing of scores of Shiite Muslims in 1982.

The sentence has already stoked Iraq's sectarian rage, with the Shiite majority demanding Saddam's death and his fellow Sunni Arabs calling the trial tainted.

"From tomorrow, any day could be the day" Saddam is sent to the gallows, the chief judge said. Saddam was condemned to death for his role in the execution of 148 Shiite Muslims from the small northern town of Dujail, after a 1982 assassination attempt.

The decision came on a particularly bloody day in Baghdad, where at least 54 Iraqis died in bombings and police discovered 49 apparent victims of sectarian reprisal killings. Separately, the U.S. military announced the deaths of seven American soldiers.

In upholding the sentence, imposed Nov. 5, the Supreme Court of Appeals also affirmed death sentences for two of his co-defendants, including his half brother. And it said life imprisonment for a third was too lenient and demanded he be given the death penalty, too.

Saddam's hanging "must be implemented within 30 days," said Aref Shahin, chief judge of the appeals court. "From tomorrow, any day could be the day of implementation."

The White House called the ruling a milestone in Iraq's efforts "to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law."

"Saddam Hussein has received due process and legal rights that he denied the Iraqi people for so long. So this is an important day for the Iraqi people," said deputy White House press secretary Scott Stanzel, who was aboard Air Force One flying from Washington to Waco, Texas.

Some international legal observers, however, called Saddam's trial unfair because of alleged interference by the Shiite-dominated government.

The ruling raised doubts about whether other victims of Saddam's ruthless regime — including families of Kurds gassed in the late 1980s — will ever testify in court about their suffering.

But the announcement delighted Shiites, who endured persecution under Saddam and are eager to remove a symbol of the old regime.

Some Shiites are concerned that insurgents, many of them Sunni Arabs, will try to disrupt or prevent the execution.

"We were looking forward to this day so as to achieve justice, though it comes late," said Ali al-Adeeb, a Shiite lawmaker. "The government should speed up implementing the verdict in order not to give any chance to the terrorists."

Under Iraqi law, the appeals court decision must be ratified by President Jalal Talabani and Iraq's two vice presidents. One of the two deputies is, like Saddam, a Sunni Arab.

Talabani, a Kurd, has said he is opposed to the death penalty. But he previously deputized Vice President Adil Abdul-Mahdi, a Shiite Muslim, to sign execution orders on his behalf.

Abdul-Mahdi has said he would sign a death warrant for Saddam.

The Sunni vice president, Tariq Al-Hashimi, has also pledged to support Saddam's execution as part of a deal that gave him the job last April 22, witnesses at the meeting told The Associated Press in October.

Raed Juhi, a spokesman for the High Tribunal court that convicted Saddam, said the judicial system would ensure Saddam is executed even if the presidency does not ratify the decision.

"We'll implement the verdict by the power of the law," Juhi said.

He did not elaborate on the statement, which implied that Saddam's case might divide the government.

Saddam is being held at Camp Cropper, an American military prison close to Baghdad's airport. The U.S. military has had Saddam Hussein in its custody, on behalf of the Iraqis, since his capture. Military officials, however, were not able to say Tuesday whether the former dictator is being turned over to the Iraqis now, in anticipation of his execution.

It's not clear where the hanging will take place. It might occur at Camp Cropper or, perhaps, at a Baghdad prison where the new Iraqi government has carried out other executions. It's also uncertain if the public or press will be allowed to witness the hanging, or if the execution will be announced only afterward.

Human Rights Watch, an international rights group, said figures in the U.S.-backed Iraqi government had undermined the credibility of Saddam's trial. Those officials publicly criticized a judge early in the case, leading to his resignation.

The rights group also cited other "political interference."

"Imposing the death penalty, which is indefensible in any case, is especially wrong after the unfair proceedings of the Dujail trial," said Richard Dicker, director of the group's International Justice Program.

As an example of Iraqi government interference, Dicker noted Mouwafak al-Rubaie, Iraq's national security adviser, announced the decision of the appeals court before the court itself did.

Al-Rubaie told AP of the decision about an hour before the chief judge announced it.

Shiite residents of Baghdad had no doubts about the fairness of the verdict. "We are very happy," said Riyah Abdul Sattar in Sadr City, a neighborhood where Shiite militias are strong. "We will get rid of him for sure."

There was disappointment, though, in Tikrit, a mostly Sunni Arab city north of Baghdad that lies near Saddam's hometown of Ouja.

"It is a political verdict that has no relation to law or justice," said Saad Ibrahim Khelil. "I do believe it's a kind of pressure against the (Sunni-led) resistance."

The appeals court also upheld death sentences for Barzan Ibrahim, Saddam's half brother and intelligence chief during the Dujail killings, and Awad Hamed al-Bandar, head of Iraq's Revolutionary Court, which issued the death sentences against the Dujail residents.

The court concluded that the life sentence given former vice president Taha Yassin Ramadan was too lenient, and returned his case to the High Tribunal for reconsideration. Ramadan was convicted of premeditated murder.

"We demand that he be sentenced to death," said Shahin, the chief appeals judge.

At his trial, Saddam argued that the Dujail residents who were killed had been convicted in a legitimate Iraqi court for trying to assassinate him.

DOJ_NMG_0109281

Saddam's televised trial was watched throughout Iraq and the Middle East as much for theater as for substance. The fallen dictator was ejected from the courtroom repeatedly for political harangues, and his half brother once showed up in long underwear and sat with his back to the judges.

Three defense lawyers and a witness were murdered during the course of its 39 sessions.

Saddam is currently in the midst of another trial, charged with genocide and other crimes during a 1987-88 military crackdown on Kurds in northern Iraq.

An estimated 180,000 Kurds died during the operation. That trial was adjourned until Jan. 8.

Saddam was captured while hiding in a hole in the ground near his home village north of Baghdad in December 2003, eight months after he fled the capital ahead of advancing American troops. He had a pistol in the hole, but never fired.

Iraqi Court Says Hussein Must Die Within 30 Days (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 26 — An Iraqi appeals court on Tuesday upheld the death sentence against Saddam Hussein and ruled that the man whose brutal reign began in 1979 and ended with the American-led invasion in 2003 must go to the gallows within 30 days.

It was the court of last resort for Mr. Hussein, who received his death sentence on Nov. 5 from the Iraqi High Tribunal, a court set up specifically to pass judgment on his years in power. No further appeals are possible, and his final legal recourse appears to be a clause in the Iraqi Constitution stating that the Iraqi president must approve all death sentences.

That clause offers Mr. Hussein only the slenderest of hopes. Jalal Talabani, the Iraqi president, has said that he is formally against the death penalty, but he has permitted the hangings of many Iraqis convicted of capital crimes. And the Constitution may be trumped by an article in the charter of the tribunal stating that its sentences may be commuted by no one, not even the president.

The appeals verdict, covering one case involving the execution of 148 men and boys in the northern town of Dujail in 1982, came even as Mr. Hussein was facing trial on charges that he ordered the killing of tens of thousands of Kurds, whose bodies have in some instances been exhumed from grisly mass graves and minutely described in the courtroom.

The decision of the nine-judge appeals court was announced on short notice by the chief judge, Aref Shahen, after another day of the numbing violence that has gradually engulfed this country after the bursts of optimism that followed Mr. Hussein's fall from power in March 2003 and his capture by American forces in December of that year.

Judge Shahen delivered the verdict to a few reporters assembled at the Council of Ministers building within the heavily guarded Green Zone as the rest of the country settled into its nighttime curfew. There were none of the theatrical outbursts contrived by Mr. Hussein to disrupt the trial and the appeal, because he was not present to hear the verdict.

The judge said simply that the appeals court had approved the verdict against Mr. Hussein, who was formally charged with crimes against humanity, and two co-defendants, who had also received death sentences in the Dujail killings, and that they now faced "execution by hanging until death" within 30 days.

The court also approved lesser sentences against three other defendants and the tribunal's acquittal of a fourth, Judge Shahen said. In addition, the court sent the case of one man, Taha Yassin Ramadan, back to the tribunal, saying his life sentence was too lenient "compared to the crimes that were committed."

The entire session, which was televised, took no more than 15 minutes, and after taking a few questions Judge Shahen abruptly rose from his seat and left the room.

Before leaving, the judge left no doubt about where he stood on the issue of constitutional approval of the court's decision. "Nobody is entitled, including the president, to exempt or commute the verdict issued by this court," he said.

"The punishment is mandatory and should be executed within 30 days from the date it was issued," he said.

Hiwa Osman, a media adviser for Mr. Talabani, said shortly after the verdict that the president's office was still studying the decision and had not yet come to a conclusion on whether approval was needed.

"It's a bit too early for us to judge because we are digesting all this new information," Mr. Osman said. "We will wait for the case to come to us through the proper channels as decided by the court."

The decision capped a day of searing violence in Iraq. The police found 41 bodies dumped around Baghdad, apparently the victims of death squad killings, and at least 45 people died in bombings, including a triple car-bombing in the Baghdad neighborhood of Baya.

The American military announced that five more American service members had died as a result of roadside bombs. A single bomb near a patrol northwest of Baghdad killed three soldiers on Tuesday, the military said, and another bomb killed two soldiers southwest of the capital the day before, on Christmas.

After the Baya bombings, a bus driver, Husam Abdul Wahid, 18, was shivering in a blanket at Yarmouk Hospital after receiving wounds to his abdomen, foot and hand. He said he had been waiting to pick up passengers when he heard a blast to one side of an intersection and rushed, unhurt, with others into nearby shops.

"After a while we came out to see what happened," Mr. Wahid said.

"Another car detonated about 30 meters away," plunging shrapnel into his body, he said.

Reaction to the appeals court verdict appeared to be muted in neighborhoods across Iraq that were occupied with far more immediate concerns. In Kirkuk, where Kurdish and Shiite neighborhoods celebrated the Nov. 5 verdict against Mr. Hussein while Sunni areas protested, the streets were quiet, residents said.

In the heavily Shiite southern city of Basra, the police fanned out across city streets but largely withdrew when little reaction materialized.

And the scene was tense but quiet in Sadr City, the Shiite slum in northwestern Baghdad, as American military vehicles patrolled the outskirts and local militiamen moved along the streets.

Dr. Salem Najim, an ophthalmologist in Basra, noted that Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki had made it clear recently that he believed that Mr. Hussein should be executed at the earliest possible date — a pronouncement that many pointed to as evidence of political interference in the trial.

Considering that kind of interference, the result came as little surprise, Mr. Najim said, comparing it to a flavorless meal. "It is like frozen food," he said.

The verdict was criticized by some groups, including Human Rights Watch, which said that it "was imposed after a deeply flawed trial" and recommended that the decision to execute Mr. Hussein be reversed.

A similar view was expressed by Miranda Sissons, leader of the Iraq program at the International Center for Transitional Justice in New York, who said the haste of the appeals court's decision indicated that it could not have been thoroughly considered.

"This judgment is not surprising, but the speed is very troubling," Ms. Sissons said. The verdict in the Dujail case "deserved a careful review process, but the signs today are that that hasn't happened," she said.

Ms. Sissons said it was also unfortunate that a death sentence meant that trials on other suspected crimes would never go forward, denying justice to other victims of Mr. Hussein's brutality.

But at the American Embassy in Baghdad, a spokeswoman, Ginger Cruz, praised the "courageous effort" of the Iraqi judges and others at the tribunal, which she said ensured "that justice prevails for the atrocities Saddam Hussein and his regime committed against the Iraqi people."

Some Iraqis said they feared that when Wednesday dawned and the overnight curfew lifted, the sealing of Mr. Saddam's fate would spark violence. But there was little evidence to support those worries late Tuesday, even in places most prone to those problems.

In Adhamiya, a mostly Sunni neighborhood that might have been expected to protest the decision, the streets were quiet after a particularly horrific afternoon in which a family of five was trapped in a burning car after a bomb exploded.

The father, screaming for help, escaped the car as residents tried to extinguish the flames with blankets and water. But two young children and an infant died with their mother in the fire.

As night fell and the court's verdict was read, there appeared to be little energy left on the streets for much reaction to a legal decision.

Iraqi Court Upholds Hussein's Sentence (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan And Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 26 -- Iraq's highest court upheld Saddam Hussein's death sentence Tuesday, opening the way for the former Iraqi president to be hanged within 30 days, Iraqi judicial officials said.

Officials in the Iraqi government have already begun to address the logistics and security measures for the execution, possibly a closed and secret one, according to sources familiar with the preparations.

Under Iraq's constitution, the execution can proceed only if ratified by President Jalal Talabani and the country's two vice presidents. There was no immediate comment from the three Tuesday.

If they uphold the decision, as many Iraqis expect, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki would have 30 days to order Hussein's execution. People close to him said Tuesday he would do so quickly.

Capping a trial that was controversial from the start, the decision split the Iraqi public along the fault lines of sect and history. Shiite Muslims and Kurds, whose groups suffered most under Hussein's rule, generally celebrated. Many of Hussein's fellow Sunni Arabs, however, warned that hanging the former president would intensify the current insurgency and sectarian killings.

It remains unclear whether a hanging would be carried out at a pre-announced time, with public observers present. Among several proposals before Maliki is one that calls for Hussein to be executed in secret as early as next week.

His body would then be formally identified by independent observers and the death revealed to the Iraqi public and the rest of the world, according to an official familiar with the proposal. The goal of such an approach would be to reduce retaliatory attacks by Sunnis and other loyalists.

On Tuesday, Iraqi politicians, including some Sunnis, issued calls for a speedy execution, expressing concern that a delay could cause more sectarian bloodshed and division.

"The people who wanted Saddam to be hanged and the people who were defending Saddam both were expecting this verdict," said Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish lawmaker widely seen as neutral by Sunnis and Shiites. Many people would like the execution to happen quickly, Othman said, "because they're afraid that he might escape from prison. The more it's delayed, the more people will talk about it. It will be a divisive thing in society."

Tuesday's decision came 51 days after Hussein was sentenced to death for crimes against humanity for the killings of 148 Shiite men and boys from the town of Dujail after an assassination attempt there in 1982.

The U.S-backed trial was marred by allegations of bias and by courtroom speeches and outbursts from the defendants. Intended to deliver justice to Iraqis oppressed under Hussein, the proceedings unfolded against a backdrop of escalating sectarian strife that took thousands of lives and widened the gap between Sunnis and Shiites.

Talabani, a Kurd, is firmly against the death penalty. But in past cases he has deputized one of the vice presidents -- Adel Abdel-Mehdi, a Shiite, and Tariq al-Hashemi, a Sunni -- to sign execution orders on his behalf. All three signatures are required for an execution order to be valid.

Some analysts in Baghdad questioned whether Hashemi would endorse the execution. But they also noted that he had recently called on President Bush at the White House.

If the government does not send Hussein to the gallows, the Iraqi High Tribunal's code would ensure his execution by other means, legal experts said.

Several officials close to Maliki, a Shiite, said Tuesday that he plans to proceed with the execution as soon as legally possible. "Definitely," said Sadiq Rikabi, a political adviser to the president. "This is in order to open a new page in the history of the Iraqi people."

The nine-judge appeals court also upheld execution sentences for Barzan Ibrahim, Hussein's half brother, and former judge Awad Haman Bander for their roles in the Dujail killings. The judges also changed the sentence of former vice president Taha Yassin Ramadan from life to death.

"In the name of the good Sunnis, the liberal Sunnis, the patriotic Sunnis, we are happy to hear this decision," said Mithal al-Alousi, an influential Sunni politician. "The people are asking us to make political pressure to execute Saddam immediately. We need to close this file. There's no other way for Iraq to move forward."

Saleh al-Armouti, one of Hussein's lawyers, warned against a hanging. "The region now will be more in flames, and the resistance will increase across the Arab world," he said, speaking by telephone from neighboring Jordan. "His absence will lead to more strife and civil war inside Iraq."

Armouti said that Hussein, who is being held at Camp Cropper, a U.S. military prison near Baghdad airport, had expected the appeals court's decision. "His morale is very high," Armouti said. "He doesn't fear death. His will and his faith are very strong."

International human rights groups criticized the Dujail trial as unfair and improperly run, describing it as a victor's court. Human rights activists said they had hoped the appeals court would carry out a careful and comprehensive legal review and correct what they viewed as major flaws in the conduct of the trial.

"We think, given the unfairness in the proceedings, it would be indefensible to execute Saddam Hussein regardless of the crimes alleged in Dujail in 1982," said Richard Dicker, director of the International Justice Program of New York-based Human Rights Watch.

Dicker criticized the appeals court for reaching a decision so soon after Hussein's attorneys filed an appeal, which they did Dec. 3. He said the former president's defense team did not even receive the written judgment from the trial until weeks after the verdict was pronounced, which delayed their preparation for the appeal. "The whole manner in which this has unfolded suggests a highly politicized, nonjudicial approach to what is such an important case," Dicker said.

Bassam Ridha, who serves as a government liaison to the Iraqi High Tribunal, disputed charges that the government had interfered in the judicial process. "It was a very fair process," Ridha said, adding that the trial met international legal standards. "What we are doing is not a human rights violation. Where were these activists when my people were slaughtered?"

In Dujail, residents described the decision as bringing them a step nearer the closure they have awaited for nearly 25 years. "Now I feel that there is actually a God up there in Heaven," said Haiyder Hamed, 43, a farmer.

Other residents wondered what the future would bring in a world without Hussein. "Executing Saddam is achieving justice on earth and in heaven," said Hussein Mahmoud, 28, a police officer. "But will executing him bring Iraq as it used to be or will it make Iraq a burnt land?"

In Mosul, college student Sardar Mohamad Hassan, 25, said Hussein should not be executed because he still faces charges of crimes against humanity in at least a dozen other cases.

In the current phase of the trial, Hussein and six co-defendants are accused of orchestrating the killing or wounding of hundreds of thousands of Kurds with poison gas and other weapons during the so-called Anfal campaign of the late 1980s. Hussein is scheduled to return to court on Jan. 8.

Ridha said the Anfal trial would continue even if Hussein is executed and that Kurdish victims would get the justice they seek. "If Saddam Hussein is gone, it doesn't mean all these guys go free," he said.

In the northern city of Tikrit, Hussein's home town, residents reacted angrily to the decision. "We should not pour oil on the fire," said Khairallah Muhammad 45, a merchant. "This verdict is going to be the end to America, and it will be another Vietnam."

At Hannah restaurant in Baghdad's Karrada neighborhood, employees and regular customers crowded around the butcher's table to talk about the possible execution. Each said he had a relative or friend who had been imprisoned or killed by Hussein's government.

Sadiq Esa, 31, said he wants more than to see him executed. "I swear to God, I will kill him with my own hands," he said, sipping a cup of sweet tea at a table covered with raw meat and blood.

Jafar Hani, the 22-year-old butcher, called Hussein a "monster." As he diced and skewered pieces of meat, he said, "The whole world wants him to be put in the center of Baghdad so everyone can see him hang."

Special correspondents Saad al-Izzi, Naseer Nouri, Waleed Saffar, Muhanned Saif Aldin and other Washington Post staff in Iraq contributed to this report.

Saddam To Hang Within 30 Days (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, December 27, 2006

BAGHDAD — Iraq's highest court said Tuesday that Saddam Hussein must be hanged within 30 days. The decision generated uncertainty about the timing of an execution and concern over whether his death could spark more violence.

INTERACTIVE GRAPHIC: Saddam's rise and fall

The court rejected an appeal by the former Iraqi dictator, who was convicted and sentenced to death Nov. 5 for ordering the killings of 148 Shiite Muslims in the town of Dujail in 1982.

"From tomorrow, any day could be the day" for the execution, said Aref al-Shahin, the court's chief judge.

The Iraqi government has not announced any details of plans to send Saddam to the gallows. There were no announcements Tuesday of plans for curfews in Baghdad. Curfews would probably be imposed for an event as politically sensitive as Saddam's execution.

The White House called the decision a milestone in Iraq's efforts "to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law."

"Saddam Hussein has received due process and legal rights that he denied the Iraqi people for so long. So this is an important day for the Iraqi people," said deputy White House press secretary Scott Stanzel.

Some, however, such as Human Rights Watch, condemned the sentence as unfair because of alleged interference by the Shiite-dominated government in Saddam's trial.

Under Iraqi law, any death sentence must be certified by the council made up of Iraq's president and two vice presidents. Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, has opposed the death penalty in the past but has also said he would deputize a vice president to sign an execution order on his behalf. Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi, a Sunni like Saddam, might also be reluctant to certify the execution. The other vice president, Adil Abdul-Mahdi, is a Shiite.

Basam Ridha, an adviser to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, said the presidency council cannot delay or alter Saddam's sentence under Iraqi law.

Ridha said Iraqi officials will meet in the next few days to discuss when to send Saddam to hang. "We're anxious to do it as soon as we can," he said. "We want to put an end to it."

A prompt execution would short-circuit an ongoing trial in which Saddam and former top aides are accused of killing tens of thousands in a genocidal campaign against the Kurds in the late 1980s. That trial is in recess until Jan. 8.

Some Iraqi politicians said Saddam's execution would aggravate efforts at a political reconciliation between Iraq's Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish factions - and could intensify the Sunni-led insurgency.

"Saddam has done so many bad things in this country. There are tens of thousands of victims who would like this man to be killed," said Mahmoud Othman, a leading Kurdish lawmaker. "But at the same time, it may create more rifts for the people." Many Shiite residents of Baghdad were delighted. "We are very happy," said Riyah Abdul Sattar in Sadr City. "We will get rid of him for sure."

But Ala'a al-Sayid, 28, a Shiite government worker, said hanging Saddam "will offer the people nothing. The armed groups in Iraq will use this event for their personal purposes. They will call Saddam a martyr, not because they love him, but for their own gain."

Although Sunnis were the main backers of Saddam's rule, loyalty to Saddam is no longer a main motivation of Sunni insurgents, said Anthony Cordesman, a scholar at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. Ordinary Iraqis, he said, "are far more concerned about the future, about ethnic and sectarian divisions, about their personal security."

Saddam's Death Sentence Is Upheld (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis And Molly Hennessy-fiske

The Los Angeles Times, December 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Saddam Hussein's date with the executioner could come any day, after an appeals court upheld the deposed Iraqi leader's death sentence Tuesday, saying he must hang for ordering mass slayings in a Shiite Muslim town in 1982.

The decision, announced at a hastily convened news conference in Baghdad's fortified Green Zone, could fan surging bloodshed between Iraq's ascendant Shiite Muslim majority and a disaffected Sunni Arab minority that had long been favored under Saddam. Government and security officials said they were bracing for more violence when the sentence is carried out but insisted that any surge would be short-lived.

Aref Shahin, chief judge of the appeals panel, said there was no further legal recourse for Saddam, and the Iraqi executive is free to send him to the gallows "any day ... starting from tomorrow." The execution must be carried out within 30 days.

President Jalal Talabani and his two deputies have to sign off on the execution order before it is implemented. Talabani, a Kurd, opposes the death penalty but has in previous cases deputized a vice president to sign on his behalf.

The Iraqi High Tribunal had handed down death sentences against Saddam and two co-defendants Nov. 5 for orchestrating an attack on the Shiite town of Dujail in the wake of a failed assassination plot against him. Hundreds were detained, tortured and forced out of there homes, and more than 100 men and boys were executed after a summary trial.

Under Iraqi law, the verdicts and sentences automatically went for review before a nine-judge appeals chamber.

The White House called the appeals court ruling a milestone in efforts to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law. "Saddam Hussein has received due process and legal rights that he denied the Iraqi people for so long," White House spokesman Scott Stanzel said.

But legal experts said the verdict came too soon, just three weeks after defense attorneys filed lengthy appeals on Saddam's behalf, reinforcing claims the trial was politically tainted.

Some Kurds had also hoped for a delay so Saddam can finish standing trial for a separate 1980s military campaign against the ethnic minority that prosecutors have described as genocide.

"It is not acceptable to finish everything with the Dujail case and leave 180,000 victims with no trial," complained Vian Dizayee, a member of the Kurdish parliament in the northern city of Irbil. Baghdad lawyer Hibba Mansouri predicted government leaders would not postpone Saddam's execution for the sake of the Kurdish trial.

Four other defendants received prison terms ranging from 15 years to life, and one was acquitted at the prosecution's request.

Tribunal spokesman Raed Juhi said the panel deliberated for three days before deciding to uphold the death sentences against Saddam, his half-brother Barzan Ibrahim and intelligence chief, Awad Hamed Bandar.

The judges also concluded that the life sentence against former Vice President Taha Yassin Ramadan was too lenient and referred his case back to the tribunal for the death penalty. They did not alter the lesser sentences.

When the decision was announced on national television, victims' families in Dujail burst into tears and ululations, saying justice would finally be served and calling for a swift execution.

But residents in Saddam's hometown of Tikrit seethed, dismissing the trial as political theater staged by the United States and its Shiite allies in government.

"Implementing the verdict is like driving ... Iraq into hell," said Ismail Mohammed, a 48-year-old teacher. "It is an American verdict and has nothing to do with the will of the Iraqis."

The announcement, which came as dusk fell, did not provoke any immediate outbursts, but tension was high in some predominantly Sunni areas.

"A lot of blood will follow as consequence of this political verdict," warned Osama Mohammed, a 19-year-old college student in Ramadi, a center of the Sunni-driven insurgency west of Baghdad.

Saleh Mutlaq, leader of the second-largest Sunni political party, said more Iraqis were dying now than under Saddam.

"I feel the government is not qualified to push (a death sentence) under this situation," he said. "I think this verdict is gong to increase the violence and decrease the chance of reconciling."

But the decision delighted Shiites, who were brutally repressed under Saddam.

"We wish to see Saddam hanged on our TV screens," said Sattar Jabar, a 32-year-old contract worker in the southern city of Basra.

Ali Haidari, a 38-year-old journalist who was the first witness at Hussein's trial, watched the announcement on television in the living room where pictures of his seven brothers slain in Saddam's reprisals are lined up on a wall.

Haidari said his 67-year-old mother burst into "happy tears" and started ululating. His 5-year-old daughter, who refers to Saddam as "the dog" when she sees him on television, was jumping on the sofa and singing.

"This was the wish of all the martyrs, the prisoners who suffered during Saddam's regime," he said by telephone.

International reaction was mixed Tuesday. British Prime Minister Tony Blair, a strong ally of the U.S. effort in Iraq, reiterated his opposition to the death penalty, but he said the Iraqi decision "does give us a very clear reminder of the total and barbaric brutality of that regime."

Human rights groups urged the Iraqi government not to implement the sentence after a trial they said was deeply flawed.

The New York-based Human Rights Watch said there were regular failures to disclose key evidence, violations of defendants' rights to confront witnesses and "lapses of judicial demeanor."

Three defense lawyers and a witness were killed during the nine-month trial, which also featured angry showdowns between the judges and Saddam. The former dictator rejected the legitimacy of the court and said he had the right to act against the Dujail victims.

Times staff writers Raheem Salman, Salar Jaff, Mohammed Rasheed and Saif Hameed in Baghdad and Kim Murphy in London and special correspondents in Baghdad, Basra and Tikrit contributed to this report.

Saddam Heads To The Gallows (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 27, 2006

The decision by Iraq's Court of Appeals to uphold Saddam Hussein's death sentence means that the former Iraqi dictator must, by law, hang within 30 days. If that seems rushed, consider that the victims of the Dujail massacre for which Saddam was convicted have waited nearly a quarter of a century for justice to be done.

The Dujail massacre ranks among the lesser of Saddam's atrocities in the magnitude of death: About 150 Shiites were summarily executed (some of them apparently in human meat grinders) in retaliation for an attempt on Saddam's life. By contrast, the "Anfal" campaign of the late 1980s took the lives of as many as 180,000 Iraqi Kurds. Still, it seems appropriate that the Iraqi government chose to try him first for Dujail, for the sake of example as well as expediency. The very specificity of his crime, and its political motivations so reminiscent of Hitler's revenge against the Czech town of Lidice in World War II, are somehow easier to comprehend than his larger mass murders.

Critics of Saddam's sentence have argued that it is the result of a politicized judicial process, marred by procedural flaws and a conclusion that was foregone. But if anyone is to blame for making a mockery of the proceedings it was Saddam himself, whose repeated outbursts before the court could not disguise that Iraq's new government had given the country something it had never known before: a real trial, methodical and almost fully transparent.

A case can be made that the cause of justice would be most fully served if Saddam were spared the punishment he meted so promiscuously to others. But that determination belongs to the Iraqi people and their elected leaders, so many of whom participated in the trial as victims or the kin of victims. The day Saddam dies will be their judgment day.

Military Deaths In Iraq Exceed 9/11 Toll (AP)

By Larry Mcshane

AP, December 27, 2006

In a span of a few hours, 2,973 people were killed in the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. In a span of 45 months, the number of American troops killed in Iraq exceeded that grim toll as the war continues.

The milestone in Iraq came on Christmas, nearly four years after the war began, according to a count by The Associated Press.

The U.S. military on Tuesday announced the deaths of six more American soldiers, pushing the U.S. military death toll since the beginning of the Iraq war in March 2003 to at least 2,977 — four more than the number killed in the Sept. 11 attacks in New York, Washington and Pennsylvania.

President Bush has said that the Iraq war is part of the United States' post-Sept. 11 approach to threats abroad, and that going on the offense against enemies before they could harm Americans meant removing the Taliban from power in Afghanistan, pursuing members of al-Qaida and seeking regime change in Iraq.

Democratic leaders point out that there has not been any credible evidence linking Iraq to the Sept. 11 attacks and have said the war in Iraq detracted from efforts against al-Qaida and other terrorist groups.

"The president believes that every life is precious and he grieves for each one that is lost," deputy White House press secretary Scott Stanzel said Tuesday. "The hardest decision the president has ever made has been to send our young men and women in uniform into harm's way.

"The president will ensure that their sacrifice was not made in vain."

The 9/11 death toll includes the 2,749 killed at the World Trade Center, 184 at the Pentagon and 40 passengers aboard United Flight 93.

Those killed in Iraq came from across the United States, including more than 50 residents of Alabama, more than 30 from Nebraska and more than 40 from Kentucky.

A number of them enlisted to fight in Iraq, feeling it was a way to battle international terrorism in the wake of the 9/11 attacks.

Jonathan Lootens, from upstate New York, joined the Army, telling family members: "This is something I have to do."

"It did impact him and make him feel like he should serve," his father, Robert Lootens, said Tuesday. "He felt that this was his time."

The 25-year-old sergeant was killed during his second tour of duty when a roadside bomb went off near his vehicle in the city of Kirkuk. His father says more than enough Americans have died in the conflict.

"I want the boys to come home, you know," he said. "Personally, I can't see where we're really accomplishing anything over there anymore."

Marine Lance Cpl. John Edward Hale was only 15 and living in Louisiana when the planes hit the World Trade Center. He joined the Marines last year after high school, and had been in Iraq only three months when he was killed by a roadside bomb.

Michael Glover joined the Marines after his boyhood neighborhood — the Belle Harbor section of Queens — lost several residents in the Sept. 11 attacks. One of his best friends, an equities trader at Cantor Fitzgerald LP, was among those who died at the trade center.

Glover was killed by a sniper while on patrol in Fallujah.

The rising death toll was an emotional reminder of loss for family members of Sept. 11 victims, some who said the war had gone on long enough. Sally Regenhard's son Christian, a firefighter and a Marine, was killed at the trade center on Sept. 11.

"I just would like this war to stop in whatever way we need to," Regenhard said. "I can hardly tolerate it when I see these beautiful people. It reminds me of my son. ... These people are being massacred."

7 U.S. Troops Added To Rising Toll In Iraq (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 26 -- Seven more American service members have been killed in Iraq, the U.S. military reported Tuesday. It is the second deadliest month of the year for troops.

With five days left in December, 87 service members have died, according to figures provided by the military and news releases of combat deaths. The deadliest month this year was October, when attacks in Baghdad and the western Iraqi province of Anbar killed 105 U.S. troops.

The total number of U.S. military deaths in the Iraq war announced by the Pentagon is 2,961.

Military officials and analysts have attributed the rise in U.S. casualties in recent months to the larger number and greater visibility of American troops in Baghdad, plus the intensity of the Sunni insurgency in Anbar.

"We are continuing to conduct operations. We're doing that aggressively," said Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a U.S. military spokesman. "We are fighting a tough war against a tough enemy, and unfortunately we take casualties."

As 2006 began, there was talk on Capitol Hill of withdrawing some U.S. troops by the end of the year. But rising sectarian violence in Baghdad forced President Bush to instead shift troops from other parts of Iraq to the capital, preventing a withdrawal. With no end to the violence, Bush ends the year with more than 140,000 U.S. troops on the ground in Iraq and faced with the decision of whether to send even more.

Although much of the focus of the war has shifted to Baghdad, analysts say the battle in Anbar remains just as intense.

"You have had to limit the number of troops deployed in Anbar and deploy more to Baghdad. This makes U.S. forces more vulnerable in Anbar because you're thinner on the ground," Anthony H. Cordesman, an analyst for the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said by phone in Washington. Insurgents have increased the number of attacks "faster than we've been able to make countermeasures effective."

Iraqi civilians have suffered the most casualties in the war. In the latest count available, the U.N. Assistance Mission for Iraq found that the number of civilians killed in Iraq reached a record monthly high of 3,709 in October.

On Tuesday, at least 54 civilians died in car bombings and mortar attacks in the capital and elsewhere, hospital officials told the Associated Press.

Three car bombs exploded simultaneously in Baghdad's mostly Shiite neighborhood of Bayaa, killing 10 people and wounding about 40, the U.S. military said. Abdul Kareem al-Kinani, a spokesman for the Iraqi Interior Ministry, said there were 14 fatalities and 69 injuries.

A car bomb in the mostly Shiite neighborhood of New Baghdad killed six civilians and wounded nine others, according to an Interior Ministry official who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to talk to the media.

Sunnis were also targeted. In the Sunni enclave of Adhamiyah, a car bomb exploded near the Abu Hanifa mosque, killing at least 15 people and wounding 37, according to Iraqi TV reports. The bomb tore through markets and kebab stands during the late afternoon rush, according to Iraqi TV.

In the mixed southern Baghdad neighborhood of Dora, national policemen fought armed groups Tuesday evening, Kinani said. Several mortar rounds also fell on the outskirts of the neighborhood, he said.

Most of the U.S. casualties were also the result of bombs. On Monday, one soldier was killed and two wounded when a roadside bomb exploded near their patrol southwest of Baghdad, the U.S. military said. A roadside bomb killed two soldiers and wounded one southwest of Baghdad while they were conducting operations aimed at preventing insurgents from planting such explosives, the military said.

On Tuesday, a roadside bomb detonated near a patrol as it was clearing a route, killing three soldiers northwest of the capital. Another soldier was injured.

Also on Tuesday, a soldier was killed and two were injured when their vehicle rolled over along a dirt canal trail during a combat reconnaissance mission south of Baghdad.

U.S. Soldiers' Death Toll Climbs In Iraq (AP)

By Lauren Frayer

AP, December 27, 2006

A string of car bombs and other blasts killed at least 54 Iraqis on Tuesday, including 17 outside Baghdad's most venerated Sunni mosque, while U.S. troops battled Shiite militiamen in Baghdad.

Seven more American soldiers died, the U.S. military said, pushing the December death toll to 90 in one of the bloodiest months for the American troops in Iraq this year. Some 105 troops were killed in October.

President Bush is weighing whether to send thousands more troops to Iraq, but a senior Democratic senator, Joseph Biden, said Tuesday he would fight such a move.

In the most lethal incident Tuesday, three parked cars exploded one after another in western Baghdad, police and Iraqi media reported. The blasts killed 25 people and wounded 55, one physician said by telephone, as he watched the victims being carried into Yarmouk hospital.

The doctor, who has provided information in the past, spoke on condition of anonymity because of security concerns.

Perhaps the most politically significant attack came in Azamiyah, a Sunni enclave of Iraq's capital, where a car bomb exploded near the Abu Hanifa mosque, according to Iraqi media.

That blast killed 17 and wounded 35, said a physician at the nearby Nuaman Hospital, who has provided information to the Associated Press in the past. He also asked to remain anonymous out of concern for his safety.

The explosion tore through a busy square at the start of the evening rush hour, when merchants were selling clothing and kebabs. The mosque itself was not damaged, witnesses said.

The mosque is Sunni Islam's holiest shrine in Baghdad, and a regular target of Shiite mortar teams. One person was killed in shelling there last month.

Abu Hanifa, who lived in the 8th century, was one of Islam's most important scholars and founded the Hanafi school of Islamic law, embraced by many Muslim cultures.

DOJ_NMG_0109289

The mosque has long been associated with Sunni activism. U.S. Marines fought a fierce battle there on April 10, 2003, the day after the iconic Saddam Hussein statue fell in central Baghdad. Saddam and one of his sons were believed to be hiding nearby.

U.S. troops, meanwhile, exchanged fire with Shiite militiamen in east Baghdad, near Sadr City, the stronghold of anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

An AP reporter embedded with the soldiers watched the Americans set up roadblocks, occupy homes and engage in gun battles with militia fighters across the border of Sadr City.

U.S. troops crouched on rooftops, hiding behind laundry hanging on a clothesline. Bursts of gunfire ricocheted off rudimentary cement houses.

The gunbattles waned as darkness fell. At least six mortars fell on a U.S. military base nearby, but caused no injuries.

Sadr City is believed to be the chief base of operations for al-Sadr's militia, the Mahdi Army.

Pressured by Iraqi politicians in late October, American soldiers dismantled barbed-wire barricades that controlled traffic in and out of the area. Since then they have rarely ventured into the district.

The latest U.S. deaths brought the number of members of the U.S. military killed since the start of the Iraq war in March 2003 to at least 2,978 — five more than the number killed in the Sept. 11 attacks in New York, Washington and Pennsylvania.

Bush has said the Iraq war is part of the United States' post-Sept. 11 approach to threats abroad. Going on the offense against enemies before they could harm Americans meant removing the Taliban from power in Afghanistan, pursuing members of al-Qaida and seeking Saddam's ouster in Iraq, Bush has said.

There has been no direct evidence of links between Saddam's regime and the Sept. 11 attacks. Democratic leaders have said the Bush administration has gotten the U.S. bogged down in Iraq, detracting from efforts against al-Qaida and other terrorist groups.

The AP count of members of the U.S. military killed in Iraq includes at least seven military civilians. Prior to the deaths announced Tuesday, the AP count was 15 higher than the Defense Department's tally, last updated Friday.

At least 2,377 died as a result of hostile action, according to the military's numbers.

Stanzel, the White House spokesman, said Bush grieves for each member of the armed forces who has died. "We will be fighting violent jihadists for the peace and security of the civilized world for many years to come," he said.

While officials say Bush is considering all options in his hunt for a new strategy, the U.S. president is thought to favor a surge of up to 30,000 more American troops .

Biden, the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, on Tuesday called that option "the absolute wrong strategy," especially when it came to stabilizing Baghdad.

"Even with the surge of troops, in a city of 6 million people you're talking about a ratio that would still be roughly above one to 100," Biden said.

In another Baghdad attack Tuesday, a bomb hidden in a CD player exploded in a busy market district after a man dropped it off at an electronics repair shop. The bomb killed five people and wounded 14 others, police said.

In Kirkuk, 180 miles north of the Iraqi capital, a roadside bomb killed three civilians — including an 8-year-old girl — and wounded six others, police said.

Police found 49 bodies bearing signs of torture dumped across the country, mostly in Baghdad.

Elsewhere, Jordanian Prime Minister Marouf al-Bakhit said Tuesday that a former Iraqi Cabinet minister who escaped from a Baghdad prison this month had arrived in Jordan on a U.S. plane.

Ayham al-Samaraie, a former minister of electricity with dual U.S. and Iraqi citizenship, was serving time for corruption when he escaped in mid-December.

Lou Fintor, spokesman for the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad, said the U.S. government was not involved in al-Samaraie's escape "in any way."

Car Bombs Strike Iraq's Shopping District (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis

The Los Angeles Times, December 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Three car bombs exploded within minutes at a west Baghdad intersection jammed with holiday shoppers, one of a series of attacks reported Tuesday that killed at least 97 Iraqis and injured scores.

Three U.S. soldiers also died when a roadside bomb exploded as they were removing explosive devices from a route northwest of the capital, the command said. At least 2,979 U.S. service personnel have been killed since the start of the Iraq war in 2003, according to the Web site icasualties.org.

Tuesday's bombings took place in a commercial district full of shops and car mechanics, overturning fruit stalls, torching cars and sending thick black smoke into the morning sky. At least 26 people were killed and 54 injured, police said.

Witnesses said the area was full of shoppers preparing for the Eid Athar holiday, which takes place over the New Year's period.

Aqeel Abdul Hadi, a 45-year-old real estate broker, had just stepped out of his car to view a house for sale when the first car bomb exploded behind him.

"We turned and we saw traffic policemen wounded and running from the explosion scene. I froze on the spot," he said, still shaken. "People rushed to evacuate the wounded ... Minutes later the second car bomb went off at the gathering people, killing, burning and wounding them."

Hadi said he saw one man die in front of him. The man's three children were injured.

"They were carrying shopping bags. They were shopping for the New Year," Hadi said. "When I saw this, I took my car and drove away as the third explosion happened."

The attack happened in a religiously mixed area where Shiite Muslim militiamen have been chasing out Sunni residents, part of an ongoing cycle of sectarian violence. Militiamen from the Mahdi Army, loyal to radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, in the past have set up checkpoints at the intersection, residents said.

The first blast caught Jamal Fawaz, a 62-year-old guidance counselor, on his way to a nearby school.

"I took cover behind my car, and then the second and the third explosions took place," he said. "The pressure and the sound of the third explosion was huge."

Fawaz fell to the ground and broke his glasses before scrambling into his car and driving off.

Retaliation appeared to be quick. In the afternoon, a car bomb exploded in a predominantly Sunni neighborhood in west Baghdad, killing 20 people and injuring 35, police said. The vehicle was parked in a lot behind a row of takeaway food outlets near Abu Hanifa, Baghdad's largest Sunni mosque.

Police on Monday recovered the bullet-riddled bodies of 41 unidentified men, some of whom showed signs of abuse, scattered around Baghdad. Another body was found with a single bullet to the head in Kut, 100 miles southeast of the capital, police said.

Four roadside bombs exploded in another coordinated attack on a police patrol in east Baghdad, killing the officer in charge and injuring nine other people, said the Ministry of Interior, which oversees police.

Another bomb tore through the used clothing section of Baghdad's central Bab Al Sharji market, killing five people and injuring 15. The device was hidden in a pile of garbage, police said.

Police said at least two other people were killed in Baghdad, a senior border security official killed by gunmen on his way to work and a civilian killed in an exchange of fire between U.S. forces and the Mahdi Army militia. There was no immediate comment from the U.S. military on that incident.

Mahdi militiamen have taken to the streets in recent days following a series of U.S. raids in areas bordering their eastern Sadr City stronghold in the capital, residents said.

In Kirkuk, 180 miles north of Baghdad, a child was killed and five other people injured when a bomb exploded near a primary school.

Times staff writers Mohammed Rashied in Baghdad and special correspondents in Baghdad, Kirkuk and Hilla contributed to this report.

Backlash After UK Forces Hit Basra Police Station (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, December 27, 2006

The British military's demolition of a Basra police station that they claim was used as a base for death squads has caused a political backlash, creating possible complications for the British campaign to purge the southern port city's notoriously corrupt police force.

However, in an environment where militias, criminal gangs, political parties and factions within the police force all overlap in a patchwork of often competing alliances, it is difficult to tell exactly how widespread is the opposition to the British move against what they called a rogue police unit.

Several local leaders, including the head of the city council and a Basra police commander, have condemned Monday's raid. Mohammed al-Ibadi, provincial council chairman, said the council had decided to cut off ties with British forces pending an explanation of why they destroyed an "Iraq government building flying the Iraqi flag" and removed detainees he described as suspected terrorists.

But a British military spokesman said it was unaware of any boycott by the full council, and some local officials including the governor offered their support for the operation, which involved Iraqi as well as British forces.

Over 1,000 British troops participated in the raid that culminated in the demolition of the Jamiat police station.

A British spokesman said 127 prisoners were discovered in the basement, some of them with their kneecaps shot off, their hands or feet crushed, or with cigarette or electrical burns.

He said the police station was a base of a criminal gang associated with the local Serious Crimes Unit, which had access to weaponry, vehicles and police intelligence used in death squad activity. He said the gang might have targeted competitors, as well as "anyone they did not like the look of or [who] had crossed them in some way".

British officials also say that the unit was associated with the capture of two British soldiers in September 2005, which precipitated a raid on Jamiat station to free them. It was also said to be involved in the abduction and murder of 17 police employees in October.

Basra citizens frequently complain about their police force, which many say is the product of a local authority that is fractured between several large Shia Islamist factions, including the Fadila party, the radical Sadrist movement, and the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, plus a handful of smaller ones.

In the absence of clear dominance by one faction or the other, each has cultivated its allies within the police force.

Last summer, in response to a surge in violence, Nouri al-Maliki, prime minister, deployed the army on the streets and formed a special security committee to tackle the port city's anarchy – a move opposed by some local politicians.

Some citizens have praised Mr Maliki for taking a firm hand against local corruption. Militias such as the Mahdi Army, however, are believed to have strong roots in the city's extensive slums, where many people reportedly blame the British for the lack of any im- provements in their conditions over the past three years.

At least twice in the past the Basra provincial council has promised to cut off relations with British forces, but such boycotts have been relatively short-lived.

Basra Raid Sends Message (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 27, 2006

IN RAIDING AND DESTROYING an Iraqi police station where crimes were said to be committed, not solved, British forces sent an important message to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki: Torturers and murderers must be rooted out even when they act under color of the law, and even when reining them in offends political sensitivities.

The Christmas Day assault on the so-called Serious Crimes Unit in Basra by more than 1,000 British and Iraqi troops freed 127 prisoners, many of whom showed signs of torture. The headquarters long had been suspected of being infiltrated by death squads linked to tribal rivalries and organized crime. A British officer described the British-led operation as "part of a long-term rehabilitation of the Iraqi police service."

The assault followed a raid earlier this month in Basra during which British and Danish forces detained five tribal leaders with ties to Shiite militias. With Britain expected to reduce its 7,000-member force in Iraq next year, British forces have been trying to weaken rogue forces in Basra, for which they have security responsibilities.

Although Iraqi military officials obviously signed off on the British plan, some local officials complained that they weren't consulted and that the operation amounted to overkill. The complaint is misplaced. If, as the British say, the station was the scene of atrocities and impending executions, the officials themselves were remiss. They can't reasonably complain about a show of force designed to save lives and stop torture.

The question is whether the Iraqi government, which has troubling ties to Shiite militias, will do more than acquiesce in operations such as this. On Oct. 31, the Maliki government ordered the U.S. to remove checkpoints outside Sadr City, the stronghold of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr — checkpoints that were set up to help find a captured U.S. solider. No wonder U.S. national security advisor Stephen J. Hadley, in a now-famous memo, questioned whether Maliki "is both willing and able to rise above the sectarian agendas being promoted by others."

Whether or not President Bush approves a temporary "surge" of U.S. troops to help stabilize Baghdad, the president's benchmark of success — an Iraq that can "govern itself, sustain itself and defend itself" — ultimately will depend on a willingness by Maliki and his successors to establish one rule of law in Iraq. The British and, yes, the Americans, won't be there forever.

Lt. Brian Braithwaite said he truly felt they were making a difference.

Then in early November, Braithwaite's Bradley Fighting Vehicle hit a roadside bomb filled with gasoline, setting his gunner on fire. In the muffled intensity of pulling his friend to safety, Braithwaite said he heard sounds coming from the homes of the people they were trying to help. Laughing. Cheering. Celebrating his friend's near-death.

Braithwaite's unit, the 1st Battalion, 36th Infantry Regiment, has been in the capital of western Iraq's Anbar province since June. Most of the guys here can remember the moment when their frustration killed their empathy. When they no longer felt guilty about knocking down doors. No longer cared to hand out candy.

"Hearts and minds," the soldiers shrug. They joke like this often. The few Iraqis still living in Ramadi have had their homes raided and streets patrolled for three years now. Every time a window is broken, a bedroom is trashed or husbands are questioned, the glares become harsher. Compliance with U.S. troops turns to hatred.

They are only trying to get the people who lay roadside bombs and find the material used to produce them. No other goal is ever mentioned.

Roadside bombs have become too powerful for the troops to feel safe in Bradleys or tanks. Patrols are almost all on foot. This day, they walk through the garbage dump, once a farmer's field. A plank takes them across sewage, and they head toward the first house.

Bracing the weight of their gear, they run with bent knees. They hop the walls that separate the houses to avoid the streets. Roadside bombs -- a soldier lost both legs to one while crossing the intersection here a few days earlier. The ladder they carry is worthless. So they tear many of the walls down. Home to home. It takes time. They are slow.

In their first few months in Iraq, mind-numbing boredom created an itch for action. They went out to dare fire. But now they feel done, as one medic puts it. They heft on full combat gear just to step outside to relieve themselves.

Many seem to have lost their taste for TV. It shows them the news of Iraq -- which is all about the fighting in Baghdad these days. Not much is mentioned of Ramadi.

Iraqi Fugitive With Chicago Connections Surfaces In Jordan (CHIT)

By Aamer Madhani

Chicago Tribune, December 27, 2006

A Chicago-area engineer who has been on the lam since escaping last week from an Iraqi jail where he was being held on corruption charges has surfaced in Jordan.

Speaking to reporters Tuesday in the Jordanian capital, Prime Minister Marouf al-Bakhit said Aiham Alsammarae "arrived in Amman as an American and on an American plane," according to The Associated Press. Al-Bakhit did not say exactly when the Oak Brook engineer arrived in Jordan or elaborate on the escape. It also was unclear whether the plane the prime minister spoke of belonged to the U.S. military or was a private aircraft.

Lou Fintor, a spokesman for the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad, vigorously denied any U.S. government involvement in transporting the former Iraqi electricity minister out of Iraq. Alsammarae escaped Dec. 17 from the Baghdad jail inside the sprawling compound that houses the U.S. Embassy and the Iraqi government. Alsammarae said he fled with the help of a "multinational" group.

"We unequivocally deny the U.S. government assisted in any transportation of Mr. Alsammarae out of Iraq," Fintor said in a telephone interview from Baghdad.

Al-Bakhit added that the Iraqi government had not requested the extradition of Alsammarae, who said in a telephone interview with the Tribune last week that he planned to return to Chicago after the new year. Alsammarae, 55, a secular Sunni, also maintained his innocence and said he fled because he feared he would be killed if he remained in the custody of the Shiite-dominated Interior Ministry forces.

In the interview with the Tribune, he would not reveal where he was other than to say that he was in "a very safe place."

U.S. officials in Baghdad and Washington, who could face the difficulty of balancing respect for Iraq's judicial system and sovereignty against concerns over a U.S. citizen's safety, have declined to say how they would respond if Alsammarae were to turn up in the United States.

But on Tuesday, a State Department spokeswoman went as far as to say that the U.S. government "supports the Iraqi government's effort to resolve the matter." She did not go into details about whether the U.S. would cooperate if Iraq calls for Alsammarae's extradition.

Dania Alsammarae, the daughter of the former electricity minister, said she has spoken with her father daily since his escape but he never has told her or other family members where he is or what he has been doing since fleeing Iraq.

"My dad wouldn't tell us any details but has been calling regularly to let us know that he continues to be safe," said the daughter, who lives in Dublin. "If the prime minister of Jordan is saying he is there, then I believe it to be true."

Alsammarae, who served as the electricity minister under the first Iraqi government following the fall of Saddam Hussein's regime, was found guilty in October on one count of corruption, but that charge was overturned earlier this month. He still faced at least five more corruption-related charges at the time of his escape, according to Iraqi authorities.

Alsammarae and his wife, Amira, moved to Chicago in 1976 to study for advanced degrees at the Illinois Institute of Technology. They had planned to return to Iraq but ended up staying permanently after Hussein consolidated power over the Iraqi government in 1979.

Alsammarae, who holds dual U.S.-Iraqi citizenship, opened an engineering firm in west suburban Downers Grove. He returned to Iraq after the fall of Hussein's regime and was selected by the top U.S. occupation administrator, Paul Bremer, to serve as the country's electricity minister.

US Says Captured Iranians Can Be Linked To Attacks (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 26 — The American military said Tuesday that it had credible evidence linking Iranians and their Iraqi associates, detained here in raids last week, to criminal activities, including attacks against American forces. Evidence also emerged that some of the detainees were involved in shipments of weapons to illegal armed groups in Iraq.

In its first official confirmation of last week's raids, the military said it had confiscated maps, videos, photographs and documents in one of the raids on a site in Baghdad. The military confirmed the arrests of five Iranians, and said that three of them had since been released.

The Bush administration has described the two Iranians still being held late Tuesday night as senior military officials. Maj. Gen. William Caldwell IV, the chief spokesman for the American command, said that the military, in the raid, had "gathered specific intelligence from highly credible sources that linked individuals and locations with criminal activities against Iraqi civilians, security forces and coalition force personnel."

General Caldwell made his remarks by e-mail in response to a query about the raids, first reported Monday in The New York Times. "Some of that specific intelligence," he said via e-mail, "dealt explicitly with force-protection issues, including attacks on MNF-I forces."

MNF-I stands for Multinational Force-Iraq, the official name of the American-led foreign forces there.

American officials have long said that the Iranian government interferes in Iraq, but the arrests, in the compound of one of Iraq's most powerful Shiite political leaders, were the first since the American invasion in which officials were offering evidence of the link.

The raids threaten to upset the delicate balance of the three-way relationship between the United States, Iran and Iraq. The Iraqi government has made extensive efforts to engage Iran in security matters in recent months, and the arrests of the Iranians could scuttle those efforts.

Some Iraqis questioned the timing of the arrests, suggesting that the Bush administration had political motives. The arrests came just days before the United Nations Security Council passed a resolution imposing sanctions against Iran for its refusal to suspend uranium enrichment.

The Bush administration has rejected pressure to open talks with Iran on Iraq.

The Iraqi government has kept silent on the arrests, but Tuesday night officials spoke of intense behind-the-scenes negotiations by Iraq's government and its fractured political elite over how to handle the situation.

Iraq's president, Jalal Talabani, had invited the two Iranians during his visit to Tehran, his spokesman said on Sunday, but by Tuesday, some Iraqi officials began to question if Mr. Talabani had in fact made the invitation. His office was unavailable for comment Tuesday night.

"We know when they caught them they were doing something," said one Iraqi official, who added that the Iranians did not appear to have formally registered with the government.

Some political leaders speculated that the arrests were intended to derail efforts by Iraqis to deal with Iran on their own by making Iraqis look weak.

But the military seemed sure of what and whom it had found.

At about 7 p.m. on Wednesday, the military stopped a car in Baghdad and detained four people — three Iranians and an Iraqi. The military released two of them on Friday and the other two on Sunday night, General Caldwell said. The Iranian Embassy confirmed the releases.

But the more significant raid came in predawn hours of the next morning, when American forces raided a second location, the general said. The military described it as "a site in Baghdad," but declined to release further details about the location.

Iraqi leaders said last week that the site was the compound of Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, one of Iraq's most powerful Shiite political leaders, who met with President Bush in Washington three weeks ago. A spokesman for Mr. Hakim said he had not heard of a raid on the compound.

A careful reading of General Caldwell's statement makes it clear, however, that the location itself was of central importance. The military gathered "specific intelligence from highly credible sources that linked individuals and locations with criminal activities," it said. The crimes were against Iraqi civilians, security forces and Americans.

In that raid, American forces detained 10 men, 2 of them Iranians. They seized documents, maps, photographs and videos, at the location, the military said. The military declined to say precisely what the items showed, nor did it specify if the Iranians themselves were suspected of attacking Americans, or if the Iraqis arrested with them were suspected, or both.

Some Iraqis questioned the American motives, saying that the operation seemed aimed at embarrassing Mr. Hakim, the driving force behind a new political grouping backed by the United States to distance militants from the political process.

One Iraqi politician suggested that the tip for the raid had come from a source within Mr. Hakim's own party, known by the acronym Sciri, in an effort to weaken or unseat him.

However it was led there, the military said it had found evidence of wrongdoing. By questioning the detainees and investigating the materials, the military found evidence that connected some of those detained "to weapons shipments to armed groups in Iraq," General Caldwell said.

The military did not specify the types of weapons.

The allegation, if true, would mark the first time since the American invasion that Iranian military officials were discovered in the act of planning military action inside Iraq. American officials have long accused them of supplying arms and money from Iran, but never of traveling to Iraq and actively taking part in plotting violent acts here.

American officials accused Iran of designing and shipping new powerful, armor-piercing bombs to Iraq as early as summer 2005.

American officials have on occasion offered evidence of Iranian involvement: A weapons shipment bearing serial numbers believed to belong to an official Iranian manufacturer was intercepted last year. The most recent allegations, if true, would appear to draw a line back to Tehran more directly than ever.

General Caldwell said that the detainees were still in American custody and that the military was "engaged in ongoing discussions with the government," about their status. An official in the Iranian embassy in Baghdad said its diplomats had tried to see the detainees but were not allowed to, a refusal that violated international rules, the official said.

Iran Is Seeking More Influence In Afghanistan (NYT)

By David Rohde

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

ISLAM QALA, Afghanistan — Two years ago, foreign engineers built a new highway through the desert of western Afghanistan, past this ancient trading post and on to the outside world. Nearby, they strung a high-voltage power line and laid a fiber-optic cable, marked with red posts, that provides telephone and Internet access to the region.

The modernization comes with a message. Every 5 to 10 miles, road signs offer quotations from the Koran. "Forgive us, God," declares one. "God is clear to everyone," says another. A graceful mosque rises roadside, with a green glass dome and Koranic inscriptions in blue tile. The style is unmistakably Iranian.

All of this is fruit of Iran's drive to become a bigger player in Afghanistan, as it exploits new opportunities to spread its influence and ideas farther across the Middle East.

The rise of Hezbollah, with Iran's support, has demonstrated the extent of Tehran's sway in Lebanon, and the American toppling of Saddam Hussein has allowed it to expand its influence in Iraq. Iran has been making inroads into Afghanistan, as well. During the tumultuous 1980s and '90s, Iran shipped money and arms to groups fighting first the Soviet occupation and later the Taliban government. But since the United States and its allies ousted the Taliban in 2001, Iran has taken advantage of the central government's weakness to pursue a more nuanced strategy: part reconstruction, part education and part propaganda.

Iran has distributed its largess, more than $200 million in all, mostly here in the west but also in the capital, Kabul. It has set up border posts against the heroin trade, and next year will begin work on new road and construction projects and a rail line linking the countries. In Kabul, its projects include a new medical center and a water testing laboratory.

Iran's ambassador, Muhammad Reza Bahrami, portrayed his government's activities as neighborly good works, with a certain self-interest. Iran, he said, is eager to avoid repeating the calamities of the last 20 years, when two million Afghan refugees streamed over the border.

"Our strategy in Afghanistan is based on security, stability and developing a strong central government," he said. "It not only benefits the Afghan people, it's in our national interest."

Still, there are indications of other motives. Iranian radio stations are broadcasting anti-American propaganda into Afghanistan. Moderate Shiite leaders in Afghanistan say Tehran is funneling money to conservative Shiite religious schools and former warlords with longstanding ties to Iranian intelligence agencies.

And as the dispute over Iran's nuclear program has escalated [leading the United Nations Security Council to impose sanctions on Iran on Dec. 23], Iranian intelligence activity has increased across Afghanistan, American and Afghan officials say. This has included not just surveillance and information collection but the recruitment of a network of pro-Iranian operatives who could attack American targets in Afghanistan. [On Dec. 20 in London, British officials charged the interpreter for NATO's commanding general in Afghanistan with passing secrets to Iran.]

Discerning Iranian motives is notoriously difficult. Government factions often have competing agendas. Even so, the question of Iran's intentions in Afghanistan has come under a microscope in recent weeks amid debate in Washington over whether the United States should begin dealing with Tehran as part of a possible solution in Iraq. Some American officials have suggested that Iran's seeming cooperation in Afghanistan may be something of a model for Iraq.

So far, even as it declines to talk with the Iranians about Iraq, the Bush administration has adopted a posture of uneasy detente over Afghanistan. American officials say that they are watching closely, and no evidence has emerged of recent arms shipments to Iranian proxies, as there have been in Iraq, or of other efforts to destabilize the country. Iran's Shiite leaders appear to be maintaining their historic opposition to the Sunni Taliban, who consider Shiites heretics. Iran, they also say, is failing to gain popular support among Afghans, 80 percent of whom are Sunni Muslims.

Of far greater concern, according to American, European and Afghan officials, is Pakistan, America's ostensible ally against terrorism. They say the Pakistanis have allowed the Taliban to create a virtual ministate and staging base for suicide attacks just across Afghanistan's eastern border. Suicide attacks have quintupled, from 23 in 2005 to 115 this year, killing more than 200 Afghan civilians.

[It is too early to know if the Bush administration's position will be at all affected by the latest source of tension between Washington and Tehran — the American arrests of several Iranians in Baghdad on Dec. 20 and 21 on suspicion of conducting attacks on Iraqi security forces.]

Western diplomats say that Iran's goals in Afghanistan are to hasten the withdrawal of American troops, prevent the Taliban from regaining power and keep the Afghan west firmly under Tehran's sway.

"Keep this area stable, but make it friendly for them," said a senior European diplomat in western Afghanistan. "Make it difficult for outsiders to operate here."

Afghanistan, analysts say, is one example of the way Iran is increasingly spending its oil money in a variety of countries to realize its self-image as an ascendant regional power. One Western official said that by focusing on high-profile construction projects, diplomacy and public relations, Iran was, in effect, employing American cold-war tactics to increase its soft power in the region.

In Iraq, that means not just financing an array of Shiite political parties and militias; the Iranian ambassador in Baghdad, Hassan Kazemi-Qomi, said Tehran was already providing power and planned to build three hospitals and set up a $1 billion loan fund for Iraqi businesses. Similarly, Iran gave Hezbollah not just weapons and training but also the money for roads, schools and social services that made it the de facto government in southern Lebanon. Iran has a strong and growing presence in Syria, too.

Iranian officials cast themselves as a counterweight to the United States, which they say has mishandled opportunities to stabilize both Afghanistan and Iraq.

"U.S. policies, particularly under the current administration, have created a huge amount of resentment around the world," said a senior Iranian official, who requested anonymity because he was not authorized to comment publicly. "I'm not saying Iran is gaining power all over the world. I'm saying the U.S. is losing it fast."

A History of Intervention

Afghanistan, a fragile mosaic of ethnic and religious groups, has long been susceptible to intervention from more powerful neighbors. As the world's largest predominantly Shiite country, Iran is the traditional foreign backer of Afghanistan's Shiites, roughly 20 percent of the country's population.

During the anti-Soviet jihad of the 1980s, Iranian Revolutionary Guards financed and trained fundamentalist Shiite militias, as well as Sunni fighters. In the civil war after the Russian withdrawal in 1989, Iran became a patron of the Northern Alliance, while Pakistan supported the ultimately victorious Taliban.

When the Taliban were ousted in 2001, Iran promised to help stabilize Afghanistan. In Germany that December, it was Iranian diplomats who stepped in to save foundering talks to form a new Afghan government, persuading the Northern Alliance to accept the agreement. Soon after, Iran pledged $560 million in aid and loans to Afghanistan over five years, a "startling" amount for a nonindustrialized nation, according to James Dobbins, the senior American envoy to Afghanistan at the time.

A week later, President Bush situated Iran on the "axis of evil." But even as they assailed that characterization, Mr. Dobbins said, Iranian officials privately offered to train Afghan soldiers. The Bush administration rejected the offer.

Today, the American reconstruction effort dwarfs Iran's. The United States has spent a total of $4.5 billion since 2001, according to Afghan officials. But while the United States has built more than 1,000 schools, government buildings and clinics, and paved more than 730 miles of roads, a 2005 government audit found that reconstruction had been slowed by inconsistent financing, staff shortages and poor oversight. Amid rising Taliban attacks and public perception of corruption in the government of President Hamid Karzai, recent polls show optimism declining across the country.

Iranian officials said they had focused on roads and power as a quick way to strengthen Afghanistan's economy. A major project has involved upgrading roads linking Afghanistan with the Iranian port of Chabahar, on the Gulf of Oman.

In many ways, Muhammad Reza Dabbaghi embodies Iran's new approach in Afghanistan. Mr. Dabbaghi, a 46-year-old engineer, is the top executive here for the Iranian company that built the new 70-mile highway linking western Afghanistan to Iran two years ago, is paving much of the northwestern city of Herat and hopes to build the new railway, all with Iranian government financing.

As his staff served sweet cookies from southeastern Iran, he handed over a glossy color brochure and CD-ROM touting his company's work. Mr. Dabbaghi, a fastidious man in a stylish blazer and slacks, said his company was trying to work in neighboring countries, but he complained that the United States was spreading "mass propaganda," lobbying governments not to hire Iranian companies, especially in Afghanistan.

In Kabul, American contractors, advisers and aid projects clearly dominate the city, but Iran is there, too. In addition to a handful of Iranian advisers at government ministries, Iranian experts have trained more than 1,200 Afghan teachers, librarians and diplomats.

Last year, the Iranian Embassy opened the Iranian Corner, a room in Kabul University's main library filled with computers, books and magazines promoting Iran's ancient culture and modern achievements. Librarians say it is more popular than the adjoining American Corner, sponsored by the United States Embassy, primarily because it has a better Internet connection. Unlike in Iran, where the government blocks thousands of Web sites, the Iranian Corner offers open Internet access.

Afghanistan's economic reliance on Iran has increased in another way, as Taliban attacks have slowed the economy. Each morning, hundreds of Afghan men line up outside the Iranian missions in Herat and Kabul for visas to work in Iran. Iranian officials said they expected to issue up to 450,000 visas to Afghans this year, nearly twice the 250,000 issued in 2005.

Signs of Influence

In the murky world of western Afghanistan, centuries of Iranian influence have left many local people with a perception of Iran as all-powerful nemesis. Many said their lives would be in danger if they publicly criticized Iran or its Afghan proxies. Behind every suspicious event in the Afghan west, they contend, lies an Iranian hand.

Such accounts are clearly exaggerated. Still, Western and Afghan officials say that, beyond its much-trumpeted reconstruction program, Iran is also engaging in a range of activities it is less eager to publicize.

Qari Ahmad Ali, a Shiite commander once backed by Iran, said that since 2001, his former patrons had funneled millions of dollars to Shiite religious schools and charities in western Afghanistan. He said the Sadaqia Madrasa, one of the largest Shiite religious schools in Herat, was at the center of an effort to spread Shiite fundamentalism.

"Iran does not have military activities," Mr. Ali said. "They have political and social activities."

Muhammad Siddique Tawakulay, the Sadaqia school's cultural director, said it received no assistance from Iran. "We are saying the truth and the facts," he said, before giving a tour of the school. But a second, unsupervised tour produced evidence of Iranian influence.

In a small ground-floor room, photos of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, the leader of the Iranian revolution, were for sale. The main library had two dozen books published in Iran that criticized Israel and the United States. One, "Dark Star," had a photo of a Hasidic Jew with a star of David burning ominously on its cover. A religious magazine printed in Iran assailed the United States for supporting Israel's attacks on Lebanon last summer.

Shopkeepers said that during the Lebanon fighting, madrasa officials distributed posters praising Hezbollah. One of them, still hanging in a local shop, featured photographs of dead Lebanese children and a heroic image of the Hezbollah leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah.

A senior Afghan intelligence official said that Radio Mashhad, a state-run station in northeastern Iran's largest city, broadcast anti-American messages over the border.

"Iran is providing a lot of assistance for religious and cultural activities in Afghanistan," said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the secret nature of his work. "That is the easy way to build influence."

Moderate Shiites agreed. "We worry about the situation," said Abbas Noyan, a Shiite member of Parliament. "Right now, the Iranians have a strong hand."

DOJ_NMG_0109297

In interviews, three Shiite officials said new religious schools were being built with Iranian money. They also said that more Afghans were celebrating formerly obscure Shiite religious holidays.

Iran's influence appeared to wane two years ago, after the United States doubled aid to Afghanistan and removed Ismail Khan, the governor of Herat and a powerful Iranian-backed warlord who dominated the west.

Since then, though, American troops have turned responsibility for Herat over to the Italians, and this year, the United States cut aid to Afghanistan by 30 percent. Iran, meanwhile, has kept its aid money flowing steadily and continued to back its proxies in the region, according to a Western diplomat.

The last known example of Iranian weapons shipments came in late 2004, when Tehran provided weapons and training to a junior commander loyal to Mr. Khan. Since then, the commander is suspected of having orchestrated a bombing and other incidents to pressure the Afghan government into reinstating Mr. Khan.

In February, Herat experienced its first religious violence in decades. Six people were killed as Sunnis and Shiites staged gun battles on city streets, according to religious leaders. Some local officials blamed Mr. Khan's protégé for fomenting the violence. Others attributed it to rising grass-roots Sunni-Shiite tensions.

As in Iraq, the American-backed effort to build a democracy has fostered a Shiite revival here. Shiites now serve as governors in 4 of 34 provinces, including Herat. Hard-line Sunnis in Herat said they chafed at being ruled by Shiites, blamed Iran for the Shiite rise and expected more violence.

In Kabul, though, Afghan government officials, desperate for aid, say they have decided to trust Iran's intentions.

"History may prove that overly optimistic," said Jawed Ludin, President Karzai's chief of staff. "But it is in our interests today to trust our Iranian neighbors and expect the same in return."

Afghan Heroin Supply Surges In U.S. (CHIT)

By Garrett Therolf

Chicago Tribune, December 26, 2006

LOS ANGELES -- The amount of high-quality heroin in America is surging because of an increasing supply from Afghanistan, and with it the fear that record-breaking poppy harvests after the U.S. invasion are fueling more addictions and overdose deaths back home.

According to a Drug Enforcement Administration report obtained by the Los Angeles Times, Afghanistan's poppy fields have become the fastest-growing source of heroin in the United States. Its share of the U.S. market doubled from 7 percent in 2001, the year U.S. forces overthrew the Taliban, to 14 percent in 2004, the latest year studied.

Another DEA report, released in October, said the 14 percent actually could be significantly higher.

Not only is more heroin being produced from Afghan poppies coming into the United States, it is also the purest in the world, according to the DEA's National Drug Intelligence Center.

Despite the agency's own reports, a DEA spokesman denied that increased quantities of heroin were reaching the United States from Afghanistan.

"We are not seeing a nationwide spike in Afghanistan-based heroin," Garrison Courtney wrote in an e-mail to the Times.

He said in an interview that the report that showed the growth of Afghanistan's U.S. market share was one of many sources the agency used to evaluate drug trends. He refused to provide a copy of DEA reports that could provide an explanation.

The agency declined to give the Times the report on the doubling of Afghan heroin into the U.S. A copy was provided by the office of Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), a member of the Senate Caucus on International Narcotics Control.

The impact is being felt in Feinstein's home state. Heroin-related deaths in Los Angeles County soared from 137 in 2002 to 282 in 2004 before dropping to 239 in 2005, still a jump of nearly 75 percent in three years, a period when other factors contributing to overdose deaths remained unchanged, experts said.

The jump in deaths was especially prevalent among users older than 40, who lack the resilience to recover from an overdose of unexpectedly strong heroin, according to a study by the county's Office of Health Assessment and Epidemiology.

"The rise of heroin from Afghanistan is our biggest rising threat in the fight against narcotics," said Orange County sheriff's spokesman Jim Amormino. "We are seeing more seizures and more overdoses."

While Afghan heroin is having an increasing impact in the United States, police say they have seen almost none of it sold in Chicago.

Most of the heroin in Chicago comes in a light brown powder form produced in Colombia and Mexico and trafficked to Chicago from Mexico cartels, especially through the state of Durango.

Although most Afghan heroin in the U.S. is moved through Mexican channels as well, it is dealt mostly west of the Mississippi River, said a member of the Chicago Police Department's heroin task force, who asked not to be identified.

The potent Afghan heroin, which the DEA says sells for about $90 a gram in southern California, has prompted warnings from some officials who deal with addicts that they reduce the amount of the drug they use. Many addicts seeking the most euphoric high employ a dangerous calculation to gauge how much of the drug they can consume without overdosing. An unexpectedly powerful bundle of heroin, therefore, can be deadly.

"I tell people, 'If you're using it, only use half or three-quarters of what you used to,' because of the higher potency," said Orlando Ward, director of public affairs at the Midnight Mission on Los Angeles' Skid Row.

Health workers in boutique rehab centers and health clinics for the homeless say increasing numbers of clients are addicted to more powerful heroin.

"My patients say it's more available and cheaper," said Michael Lowenstein, a doctor at the Waismann Method detoxification center in Beverly Hills.

Antonio Maria Costa, executive director of the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime warned world health authorities in October of the increase in Afghan heroin.

From 1980 through 1985, Afghan heroin dominated the U.S. market, with a 47 percent to 54 percent share, according to the DEA.

Afghanistan's share dwindled to 6 percent for much of the 1990s, as competition from Southeast Asia and Colombia grew. Meanwhile, the Taliban was cracking down as it gained territory, virtually eliminating poppy production after taking over the country.

Once the fundamentalist Islamic government was overthrown in 2001 with the help of U.S. forces, Afghans turned again to the poppy trade to survive in one of the poorest countries in the world.

A report released Nov. 28 by the World Bank said U.S. and European efforts to end Afghanistan's $2.3 billion opium business were failing.

The production of opium used to produce heroin reached its highest level ever in Afghanistan this year. It accounted for more than one-third of Afghanistan's gross domestic product and 90 percent of the world's supply of illicit opium, mainly supplying Asia and Europe, according to the report.

NATO Must Follow U.S. Lead In Helping Afghan Civilians (USAT)

By Sarah Holewinski

USA Today, December 27, 2006

In Kabul a few weeks ago, I met Sahib Dad, an Afghan father. During the 2001 U.S. invasion, two of his girls were killed when a U.S. bomb missed its target and exploded in their playground. He says he never saw an American face, never received an apology. At the time, the United States had no program in place to provide compensation for his loss or aid for his family. Meanwhile, the Taliban brought cotton to wrap the dead and food, money and medical care for his wife's severe head injury. That's straight out of the insurgency playbook. And it's one reason the insurgents are winning small battles everyday.

There is still time to avoid defeat (or a bloody debacle) in Afghanistan. But NATO forces, which in October took command of military operations there from the United States, must recognize what America has learned the hard way in Iraq: You can't win the war if you don't win the people.

Because of its experiences in Iraq and Afghanistan, the United States is gradually, and belatedly, accepting what is still a radical principle in modern warfare — that militaries have a responsibility to compensate and comfort the civilians they harm, even if the harm is accidental. The U.S. military now hands out condolence payments for loss of life, injury and property. The payments are characterized in the military lawyer's handbook as a "symbolic gesture" only, but it's a gesture that is so important. The payments — usually a few thousand dollars — don't assign blame. They show compassion for families struggling with loss.

The rationale of helping those we harm is expressed in the new U.S. Army Field Manual on Counterinsurgency — the definitive guide for boots on the ground. The manual states that in modern guerrilla warfare, a clear offense is winning the "hearts and minds" of the populace. Troops are told that any actions that undermine the trust of the population — "even those that provide a short-term military advantage" — help the enemy. But the new NATO force in Afghanistan, its troops drawn largely from European countries, has no policy and dedicates no common funds to help Afghan civilians harmed by its operations. Alliance officials should publicly correct that oversight and do so quickly.

Bolstering U.S. programs in place to help war victims is easy with an influx of cash from NATO countries, and nobody — least of all Afghan widows, orphans, the injured — has time to wait for a reinvented wheel.

Every civilian death gives the insurgency ammunition to claim that NATO forces are the enemy of the Afghan people — particularly if nothing is done to rectify the harm.

NATO officials have blamed much of their collateral damage on the Taliban, pointing out that civilians are being used as human shields. Despite the difficulties that troops face in distinguishing friend from foe, when bombs from the air kill non-combatants, Afghans naturally blame those who dropped the bombs.

During a televised speech two weeks ago, Afghan President Hamid Karzai wept at the loss of innocent Afghan lives in the midst of coalition bombing of terrorist strongholds. He has strongly urged foreign troops to exercise more caution. NATO officials can and should respond with a pledge of more than words.

The point is not to put a dollar value on human lives, but to offer a gesture of respect reflecting a sense of common humanity — and to recognize the simple truth that Afghanistan will be won one civilian at a time.

Uncle Sam Wants US Muslims To Serve (CSM)

By Richard Whittle

The Christian Science Monitor, December 27, 2006

As US troops battle Islamic extremists abroad, the Pentagon and the armed forces are reaching out to Muslims at home.

An underlying goal is to interest more Muslims in the military, which needs officers and troops who can speak Arabic and other relevant languages and understand the culture of places like Iraq and Afghanistan. The effort is also part of a larger outreach. Pentagon officials say they are striving for mutual understanding with Muslims at home and abroad and to win their support for US war aims. Among the efforts to attract and retain Muslim cadets:

· West Point and the other service academies have opened Muslim prayer rooms, as have military installations.

· Imams serve full- and part-time as chaplains at the academies and some bases.

· Top non-Muslim officers and Pentagon officials have taken to celebrating religious events with Muslims overseas and here in the US.

"There is a message here, and that is that Muslims and the Islamic religion are totally compatible with Western values," says Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England in an interview.

For the past two years, Mr. England has hosted an iftar, the feast that ends the daytime fast during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, at the Army Navy Country Club in Arlington, Va. His guests have included ambassadors, leaders of the Muslim-American community, and Muslims who serve in the US armed forces.

President Bush also hosted an iftar at the White House in October, as he has done for several years. Gen. Robert Magnus, the assistant commandant of the Marine Corps, held one the same month at the Marine Corps Barracks in Washington for defense attachés from predominantly Muslim nations.

The US armed services don't recruit by religion, but the Pentagon estimates at least 3,386 Muslims were serving in the US military as of September. No precise figures are available because, while US service members are surveyed on their religion, they aren't required to disclose it. Advocacy groups put the number at 15,000, saying many are reluctant to reveal their religion. African-Americans represent the largest share of Muslims in uniform, they add.

However uncertain the progress, the military is intensifying its outreach.

On June 6 - the anniversary of D-Day, he notes - Mr. England helped dedicate a new Islamic prayer center at the Quantico Marine Corps Base near Washington, whose 6,100 marines include about 24 Muslims, according to Lt. Cmdr. Abuhena Saifulislam, a Navy chaplain who serves as their imam.

The Marines also have allowed Muslims in their ranks at Quantico some dispensations to make it easier to practice their religion, says Lieutenant Commander Saifulislam, a US citizen born and raised in Bangladesh. During Ramadan, "they're allowed to have some time off to prepare for their fasting break and not to go to physical training" while fasting, he says.

Muslim troops say misunderstandings and friction with non-Muslims in uniform arise sometimes, but practicing Islam in a military at war with extremists who profess the same faith isn't a burden, they add.

Petty Officer Third Class Nicholas Burgos, a Sunni Muslim training to be a Navy SEAL, or commando, says instructors sometimes goad him by calling him "Osama bin Burgos" or asking if he's training to help the Taliban. But "it's all in good fun," he insists.

"It's all about how much mental stress you can deal with while you're in training," Petty Officer Burgos says. "I just laugh or have a smirk on my face."

His father, Asadullah Burgos, is the part-time imam at the US Military Academy at West Point, N.Y., whose roughly 4,000 cadets include 32 Muslims, 12 of whom are foreign students.

"There's been some insults and some taunting, but it's been handled at the cadet level," Imam Burgos says. "Usually that's due to ignorance."

DOJ_NMG_0109300

Col. John Cook, the senior chaplain at West Point, says that after media reports about the academy's new Muslim prayer room, he got a call from a self-described "concerned citizen" who fretted that "the Muslims are taking over the world."

"I told him, 'I'm a Christian chaplain, but I have the responsibility to provide for other faith groups,' " Colonel Cook says. Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish cadets all have their own chapels at West Point, he notes.

Marine Sgt. Jamil Alkattan, a Sunni Muslim of Syrian heritage from South Bend, Ind., says his religion, his knowledge of Arabic, and his familiarity with Arab culture were major assets during two tours in Iraq.

Not only was he able to teach fellow marines key Arabic phrases and explain that all Muslims aren't extremists, he says, but he also was able to befriend locals, who brought him vital intelligence. "They would come to me and say, 'I know where bombs are,' and this and that," Sergeant Alkattan says. "I never got to sleep. They would come at night time and tell me, 'Hey, I think these guys [insurgents] are trying to set you guys up,' or, 'I've seen these guys with an IED [improvised bomb].' I think it stopped a lot of things that could have happened."

Under a new Middle East Cultural Outreach Program created by the Marine Corps, Sergeant Alkattan is one of six Arab-American marines selected to be stationed in major American cities as liaisons to the Arab-American community and advisers to recruiters.

The program was conceived by Gunnery Sgt. Jamal Baadani, a Muslim born in Cairo who emigrated to Michigan when he was 10.

"It is not a direct recruiting program," says Sergeant Baadani, but its goal is to educate recruiters to avoid cultural no-nos and foster good relations with Arab-American communities. The "overall objective ... is to develop solid relationships with the Arab and Muslim communities for the 21st and 22nd centuries. This isn't something that's just a Band-Aid treatment."

Justice Attorneys Win Comp Time (FEDTIMES)

By Daniel Friedman

Federal Times, December 27, 2006

More than 9,000 Justice Department attorneys can now receive comp time for after-hours business travel, two years after most federal employees won that right.

On Dec. 20, the president signed HR 4057, which allows the department's lawyers to claim compensation time when their work requires travel during irregular hours, such as evening or weekend flights to attend morning meetings. The House passed the bill in March. The Senate followed on Dec. 6.

Federal workers have been able to claim comp time for official travel since Congress passed the 2004 Workforce Flexibility Act. But the Justice Department had excluded its lawyers, citing a 1999 law that limits their overtime pay. That left about 4,000 department attorneys and 5,400 assistant United States attorneys ineligible for comp time. The new bill, sponsored by Rep. Jon Porter, R-Nev., makes all of the lawyers eligible regardless of the 1999 rule.

The National Association of Assistant United States Attorneys, which represents 5,400 assistant U.S. attorneys, hailed the bill-signing as an "important legislative victory."

"This legislation . . . will provide DOJ attorneys with the benefits Congress intended to confer in 2004 and the same benefits as are provided to attorneys employed in other agencies," the group said in a statement.

Executive Director Dennis Boyd said the association has lobbied for the bill for almost two years in the face of unrelated political delays.

"It's hard for me to believe how much time and effort it took to get a two-sentence bill passed," Boyd said.

Justice had no immediate comment.

New U.S. Attorney Says Job Matters, Not How He Got It (ARKDG)

By Linda Satter

Arkansas Democrat-Gazette, December 27, 2006

Newly appointed as interim U. S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas through a maneuver that has drawn criticism from the state's two reigning Democrats, Tim Griffin says he hopes to turn the spotlight off the way he got the job and onto his plan to aggressively fight crime through cooperative efforts.

"I am honored by the attorney general's decision to name me U. S. attorney," Griffin said Wednesday, his first day on the job. "I look forward to working with Sen. [Mark] Pryor and Sen. [Blanche] Lincoln to make Arkansas safer," he said after a long day that began with being sworn in by Chief U. S. District Judge Leon Holmes and ended with many of his books and papers yet to be moved into a corner office from a smaller space down the hall that he has occupied since September.

Just five days earlier, the U. S. Department of Justice announced that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales planned to appoint the 38-year-old lawyer from Magnolia to the post that Bud Cummins earlier announced he was vacating after five years.

Sens. Pryor and Lincoln immediately expressed dismay that the interim appointment came during a congressional recess, under a provision of the Patriot Act that allows the fill- ing of a vacancy without going through the usual process of being nominated by the White House, screened by the Senate Judiciary Committee and voted on by the Senate.

The surprise announcement "denied the Senate the opportunity to carefully consider and evaluate Mr. Griffin's qualifications and denied the American people the transparency the standard nomination process provides," Lincoln said through a spokesman.

Pryor's press secretary, Michael Teague, complained that unless the appointment is followed up by a formal nomination, it could end up being a sneaky way for the Bush administration to reward an insider with a plum job without having to prove his qualifications and ability to be nonpartisan. Teague cited Griffin's strong ties to the Republican Party and his reputation as an aggressive former GOP campaign researcher, at one point under Karl Rove, Bush's main political adviser and deputy chief of staff.

"We hope we're wrong that they're trying to circumvent the process by never nominating him," Teague reiterated on Friday, but he added that the administration might think that Griffin will "just evolve into the U. S. attorney" from the interim post he now holds. Later Friday, Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse addressed those concerns directly, indicating that Griffin's appointment is indeed meant to be temporary, at least until it can go through the formal nomination process. "We have asked that Sen. Pryor meet with the acting U. S. attorney," Roehrkasse said. "We are hopeful that by working with the two U. S. senators from Arkansas, we will make a nomination that the senators support and the Congress approves."

Roehrkasse explained, "When a U. S. attorney resigns, there is a need for someone to fill that position." He noted that often, the first assistant U. S. attorney in the affected district will serve as the acting U. S. attorney until the formal nomination process begins for a replacement. But in this case, "the first assistant is on maternity leave," he said, referring to Jane Duke, who gave birth to twins earlier than expected the same week of the announcement. "Tim was chosen because of his significant experience working as a federal prosecutor in both Arkansas and in the Justice Department in Washington, D. C.," Roehrkasse said.

Asked how soon the formal nomination process might begin, he said, "We've put the meeting request out there. That's what we're working on right now." Under the Patriot Act, the intent of appointments by the attorney general is to aid national security by ensuring that key law enforcement posts aren't left unoccupied. Ryan James, spokesman for Arkansas' only Republican U. S. congressman, John Boozman, also defended Griffin's appointment on Friday, noting that it is not the same as a "true recess appointment," in which the president nominates someone to the position, often for the duration of the current Congress. "It's not unprecedented to make acting appointments, for whatever reason," James said, noting that President Clinton did the same thing.

He said Boozman believes that a full Senate confirmation process could be unfair to Griffin because of the combination of a new Democratic-majority Congress being seated in January and Griffin's prior association with Rove, a Republican stalwart.

The process could quickly become very political, and, "He may not get a fair shake as far as his qualifications," James said of Griffin. James added that Boozman believes that Griffin is qualified.

Griffin acknowledged Wednesday, after being sworn in as the district's 43 rd chief federal prosecutor, "The way one is appointed to be U. S. attorney is a political process. It is a political appointment. But the moment you become U. S. attorney, politics stop.... There is no room for politics in the U. S. attorney's office. Politics stop at the door."

He added, "My job is to make sure all Arkansans are treated equally under the law."

Indeed, U. S. attorneys across the country are generally of the same political party as the president who nominates them. While they are required to be lawyers, many have little actual courtroom experience and heavily rely on the "career" prosecutors in the office to handle the day-today legal machinations.

Many also have used the office as a steppingstone to an elected office. Griffin declined to discuss his future beyond his new job.

Griffin's legal experience includes 10 years as a JAG (Judge Advocate General) officer in the U. S. Army Reserve, and the prosecution of 40 criminal cases as an Army prosecutor at Fort Campbell, Ky., including a case in which a solider pleaded guilty to the attempted murder of his platoon sergeant. Griffin also served as senior counsel to the House Government Reform Committee and was an associate with a New Orleans law firm.

He graduated with honors, both from Hendrix College in Conway and Tulane Law School in New Orleans.

Cummins, a Bush appointee who said he is leaving to pursue other interests, said he told the Justice Department more than a year ago that he would be leaving, to give the department time to find a replacement.

He also defended Griffin on Friday, calling him a friend who is “very competent” and “very capable.”

“I’m not being critical of Sen. Pryor,” Cummins said Friday. “I can certainly understand their position. But I think it will eventually all work out.”

He explained, “It would not surprise me at all if they ultimately put Tim through the normal nomination process.”

Cummins, whom Pryor press secretary Teague praised as “a fantastic U. S. attorney” who “is respected on both sides of the aisle,” said he is “100 percent confident that Tim understands that we don’t do politics at the U. S. attorney’s office.” He said the department makes that clear to its incoming prosecutors. Griffin, who now supervises about 25 attorneys and 35 support staff members, has worked as an assistant under Cummins since September, and also worked in the Arkansas office in 2001 and 2002 as a special assistant, to gain experience.

During that time, he organized and coordinated the department’s Project Safe Neighborhoods initiative, a Bush administration effort to reduce firearm-related violence through close cooperation between state and federal law officers that he says is still a pet project of his.

Griffin said that since 2001, the office has seen a 390 percent increase in the number of firearm-related cases it has taken on — often taking over local cases, with local prosecutors’ consent, to ensure that violators face the stricter penalties available in federal court. That includes an absence of parole. Griffin noted that he has talked with his counterpart in the state’s Western District, U. S. Attorney Bob Balfe, about “working as closely as possible, forging a seamless relationship, particularly where our districts meet, so we can be aggressive in fighting crime in the Eastern District, the Western District or both.” He said he also plans to work closely with U. S. attorneys in neighboring states “because criminals aren’t concerned with artificial borders.” He recently completed a year of active duty in the U. S. Army, including a stint in Iraq. He and his wife of two years, Elizabeth, have no children.

“I’ve had a lot of jobs in my life, and what I’ve tried to do in each and every one of them is perform with excellence,” Griffin said. “Bud has set a great example as U. S. attorney. He set the standard, and I am going to work hard to meet that standard to the best of my ability.”

To those who doubt him, he said, “I am going to ask them to judge me on my performance.”

New United States Attorney Wants Focus Away From Appointment Process (AP)

AP, December 27, 2006

LITTLE ROCK (AP) - Efforts to fight crime, and not how he was put into his job, should be the public's focus in looking at the U.S. attorney's office, the new occupant of that post said after he was sworn in last week.

Tim Griffin was named interim U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas by the White House after Congress adjourned for the year, in what is called a "recess" appointment. At the time his selection was announced, Sen. Mark Pryor, D-Ark., said he was concerned that the appointment circumvented the usual approval process, which includes confirmation by the U.S. Senate.

Griffin, 38, a former assistant to President Bush adviser Karl Rove, was sworn in Wednesday as the interim U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas. He replaced Bud Cummins, who held the position for five years.

Both Pryor and U.S. Sen. Blanche Lincoln, also D-Ark., expressed dismay that the appointment came without going through the usual process of being nominated by the White House, screened by the Senate Judiciary Committee and voted on by the Senate.

"We hope we're wrong that they're trying to circumvent the process by never nominating him," Pryor spokesman Michael Teague said.

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said Griffin's appointment is meant to be temporary, at least until it can go through the formal nomination process. Roehrkasse said they have asked the Arkansas senators to meet with Griffin so that they may help support a Congressional nomination in the future.

Roehrkasse sad Griffin was chosen because of his experience working as a federal prosecutor in Arkansas and in the Justice Department.

However, Ryan James, spokesman for Arkansas only Republican U.S. congressman John Boozman, said a full Senate confirmation process could be unfair to Griffin because of the newly-elected Democratic-majority Congress being and Griffin's prior association with Rove.

The process could quickly become very political, James said.

"He may not get a fair shake as far as his qualifications," James said.

But Griffin said there is no room for politics in the U.S. attorney's office.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Faked Documents May Be At Core Of Apple Case (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, December 27, 2006

It must be some consolation for Apple Computer that the company's annual report is going to be published during the slowest news week of the year.

Given the uncomfortable admissions about its past stock options practices -- and the cost to the company -- that Apple will have to make in the delayed SEC filing due by Friday, less public attention is probably a good thing.

But the lull is unlikely to last long. According to people with knowledge of Apple's situation, federal prosecutors are looking closely at stock option administration documents that were apparently falsified by company officials to maximize the profitability of option grants to executives.

The faked documents were revealed in a three-month internal probe -- conducted by Quinn Emanuel Urquhart Oliver & Hedges -- that concluded in October, said individuals familiar with the case who requested anonymity because it remains the subject of criminal and civil government investigations.

The falsification of documents is perhaps the key issue for government officials trying to determine which of their 100-plus backdating investigations will be pursued as criminal matters and which will be limited to civil SEC inquiries.

"When there are falsified documents, the government views them as an intent to defraud, because people generally don't falsify documents unless they're trying to make things different from reality," said Keith Krakaur, a partner at Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom in New York working on backdating cases.

Krakaur was speaking generally and not about Apple, with which he's not involved. But he has been in the middle of one of the most contentious options cases yet: He represented Kobi Alexander, the former CEO of Comverse Technology who was indicted by Brooklyn federal prosecutors on charges of backdating option grants. Krakaur is no longer working on that case, and Alexander has been living as a fugitive in Namibia for the past several months.

Krakaur and other defense lawyers -- including several in San Francisco who asked to remain anonymous for fear of affecting local probes -- said government lawyers are focusing on falsified records as a means of proving that executives knew their actions were wrong.

"They view that as intent," he said.

Since the fruits of Apple's internal investigation were disclosed to San Francisco federal prosecutors in October, the U.S. Attorney's Office has shown great interest in the case, said individuals with knowledge of the probe.

And while it's not yet clear who the prosecutors' focus is, Apple released a statement in October that "the investigation raised serious concerns regarding the actions of two former officers in connection with the accounting, recording and reporting of stock option grants."

Apple spokesman Steve Dowling wouldn't comment beyond what is in the public filings. But individuals with knowledge of the case said those ex-officers are Nancy Heinen and Fred Anderson, the company's former general counsel and chief financial officer, respectively.

Heinen departed the company last spring -- before the options scandal blew up -- and sources familiar with her situation said the departure was the result of a tiff with CEO Steve Jobs unrelated to options. Reached last week, Heinen lawyers Cristina Arguedas and Miles Ehrlich wouldn't discuss their client.

Anderson, who retired as CFO in 2004, was an Apple board member until he resigned in October. His lawyer, Jerome Roth of Munger, Tolles & Olson, declined to comment on his client's situation.

One outstanding question with possibly huge implications for the company is what kind of liability Jobs -- the superstar CEO credited with much of Apple's success -- will face.

In its October SEC filing, Apple said that, "in a few instances," Jobs "was aware that favorable grant dates had been selected, but he did not receive or otherwise benefit from these grants and was unaware of the accounting implications." The statement said no current Apple executive was suspected of wrongdoing.

But in recent weeks, Jobs has apparently decided that he needs his own legal representation, separate from Apple's lawyers at O'Melveny & Myers, and has hired his own attorney to deal with the SEC and Justice Department.

While it will likely take some time -- perhaps a matter of months -- for the government to decide whether to file criminal charges against Jobs, the 10(k) filing on Friday should provide plaintiffs lawyers with some ammunition for their suits against the company.

"We anticipate it's going to be a very substantial restatement, based on the option grants on record," said Mark Molumphy, a partner at Cotchett, Pitre, Simon & McCarthy representing shareholders in a securities class action against Apple.

In its October SEC filing, Apple said "stock option grants made on 15 dates between 1997 and 2002 appear to have grant dates that precede the approval of those grants."

Dowling, the Apple spokesman, said the company is going to adhere to its plan to file the 10(k) by Friday, a date reached in an accord with NASDAQ after Apple announced the options issues would prevent them from filing by the normal Dec. 15 deadline.

But even if Apple misses the filing date, the company may get a reprieve from the normal sanction of delisting, if only because the exchange would be hesitant to prevent normal trading of a company of such great significance to investors.

"Who's served by the delisting of Apple?" asked Jahan Raissi, a partner at Shartsis Friese who represents companies in SEC matters. "If it was Joe's Shlock and Poultry Farm, then sure, get them out of there. But not Apple."

Cnet Will Pay Former Operations Chief Briggs $750,000 (Update5) (BLOOM)

By Ville Heiskanen

Bloomberg, December 27, 2006

Dec. 26 (Bloomberg) -- Cnet Networks Inc., a provider of online news and information, will pay $750,000 to Barry Briggs, who resigned as president and chief operating officer, and reprice stock options held by nine individuals including Briggs.

Briggs will receive the payment when he leaves the company Jan. 12, San Francisco-based Cnet said today in a regulatory filing. Cnet said Briggs, who resigned on Dec. 11, also remains eligible to receive a bonus for 2006.

Briggs, two other executives and five independent directors agreed to reprice some stock options they hold, Cnet said in the filing. The options were vested by 2005 and had exercise prices set below fair market value on the day they were granted. The directors also agreed to repay any after-tax gains from exercised options that vested with discounted prices.

``The idea is to cancel all the gains from backdating," said Charles Elson, director of the Weinberg Center for Corporate Governance at the University of Delaware. ``It's also important to ensure this doesn't happen again. It needs to be a dual approach."

Cnet's co-founder and former chief executive officer, Shelby Bonnie, stepped down in October after the company found that some stock options had been backdated. Neil Ashe, the company's head of strategy, was named to replace Bonnie. Briggs's resignation left Ashe to sort out the company's finances, deal with federal options probes and fend off encroaching competition from companies including Yahoo! Inc.

CEO Compensation Set

Ashe's base salary was set at $500,000 and he may get a bonus of as much as $400,000 a year, Cnet said in the filing today. He also received options for 1.5 million Cnet shares that vest in installments beginning in October 2007.

Bonnie also agreed to have his options repriced, Cnet said today. The company said he didn't exercise any options, so there was no need for repayment.

Cnet identified the directors involved as John ``Bud" Colligan, Peter Currie, Jarl Mohn, Elizabeth Betsey Nelson and Eric Robison. It said the other executives in the repricing agreements were Ashe and Joe Gillespie, chief marketing officer.

Shares of Cnet rose 17 cents, or 1.9 percent, to $9.35 at 4 p.m. in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. They have declined 36 percent this year.

When Briggs resigned, Cnet spokeswoman Martha Papalia said it was unrelated to the options probes. Cnet said in June that the U.S. Justice Department and Securities and Exchange Commission were investigating grants made by the company.

Cnet found some instances of backdating when it examined option grants from 1996 through 2003. The company plans to restate some results to correct accounting for options and hasn't detailed the expected changes.

By backdating options, companies retroactively set grant dates to days when their shares traded at a relatively low price. The practice can increase the value of the grants to executives and other recipients if the underlying shares rise.

Backdating also lets the issuer record a lower, albeit erroneous, cost for the options, which can inflate earnings.

Toll Of The Stock Options Scandal Heavy In 2006 (AP)

By Marcy Gordon, THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, December 27, 2006

More prosecutions are expected to be brought next year

WASHINGTON -- Eighteen chief executives swept out. More than 100 public companies under federal investigation and more than $5 billion in profits erased by restatements. Indictments so far: five former top executives at two companies, Brocade Communications Systems Inc. and Comverse Technology Inc.

The toll of the stock options timing affair -- corporate America's scandal of the year -- has been heavy. Federal officials say more prosecutions will be brought in 2007 over manipulation of the timing of stock option grants to enrich top company executives.

Nearly every business day, more companies report federal or internal investigations. New lawsuits by shareholders are filed. More businesses disclose that because past option grants may have distorted their financial results, they may have to restate earnings.

Next year could well bring more restatements, and companies' stock could be stripped from public trading because reviews of options grants made them late in filing their quarterly financial reports.

The Justice Department will "continue to be engaged for perhaps years to come, as we work these cases out," U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan, who heads a task force in Northern California pursuing options timing cases, said recently at a gathering of attorneys. "The final chapter hasn't been written yet."

Many of the companies ensnared in the scandal are in Silicon Valley's high-tech industry, where stock options for employees created legions of millionaires in the dot-com era.

The prized perks allow executives and employees to buy shares of their company's stock in the future at a set price. If the stock rises before the options are exercised, the employee can buy the stock at the predetermined, lower price, then sell it at the higher, current price -- and pocket the difference.

Among the wide swath of companies caught up in internal or government investigations: Apple Computer Inc., Barnes & Noble Inc., Caremark Rx Inc., Issaquah-based Costco Wholesale Corp., Seattle-based F5 Networks, Gap Inc., The Home Depot Inc., McAfee Inc., Monster Worldwide Inc., Restoration Hardware Inc., Staples Inc. and UnitedHealth Group Inc.

Some prominent executives at blue-chip companies have lost their jobs in the affair, including former UnitedHealth CEO William McGuire, who engineered the company's ascent from a regional health insurer into the nation's second-largest.

A sort of guillotine for corporate executives has been set out in the public square, with the scandal claiming at least 59 senior executives or board directors at 32 companies as of mid-December.

Will there be more? Slightly more than 2,000 public companies, or 29 percent of those in the United States that give stock options to executives, have timing issues, said Erik Lie, an associate professor of finance at the University of Iowa, and Randall Heron, an Indiana University associate finance professor. Their research last year helped focus attention on a widespread pattern of conduct.

"I suspect the number of companies will continue to grow, but I don't expect at the end of the day we're going to see that many enforcement actions" by federal authorities, said Lynn Turner, a former chief accountant of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

"You just can't do something this big with the same amount of resources."

SEC Chairman Christopher Cox has pledged vigorous pursuit of cases and said recently that new charges will be brought in the near future. The agency is focusing on cases of serious fraud, with elements such as deliberately lying or forging documents.

At the same time, officials at the Justice Department are discussing whether to ease some of its harsher guidelines for prosecuting companies, crafted in the aftermath of corporate scandals that included Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc.

Some officials believe that the guidelines may have led prosecutors to overreach when targeting some companies and pressuring them to cooperate in investigations of wrongdoing by executives.

The Internal Revenue Service is conducting its own investigation of companies for possible tax-law violations.

Open Spigot Bosses' Pay: How Stock Options Became Part Of The Problem (WSJ)

By Mark Maremont And Charles Forelle

The Wall Street Journal, December 27, 2006

Eugene Isenberg is the little-known chief executive of a modest-sized oil-services company in Houston. But he stands out in one way: He is among the highest-paid corporate executives in history. In the past 19 years, he has pocketed more than $450 million.

The key to this wealth: stock options, in abundance. His employer, Nabors Industries Ltd., has lavished more than 25 million options on him over the years.

They became lucrative partly because of Nabors's generally rising stock price, but also because of some controversial moves that gave the options more punch. When Nabors's stock fell below the price at which the options could be exercised, temporarily making them worthless, Nabors let him trade in some of his options for new ones with lower exercise prices. And when Mr. Isenberg cashed some options in, Nabors "reloaded" him, replacing those he'd exercised with the same number of new ones.

Stock options were hailed two decades ago as a remedy for runaway executive pay. Academics, politicians and investors, tired of seeing CEOs pocket big money for a so-so job, pushed to have stock options become a primary method of compensating executives. Options -- granting the right to buy stock tomorrow at today's price -- would pay off only if the company's stock went up. To advocates they were the ideal carrot, an incentive for good work that aligned executives' interests with those of shareholders.

That happened -- sometimes. But at many companies, options morphed into the biggest executive bonanza yet, pouring out cash like a stuck ATM, and sorely disappointing those who thought options would moderate executive pay.

Instead of replacing big bonuses, options became an additional form of pay slathered on top of already-generous packages. Employers doled out options in ever-growing numbers, in part because, until recently, accounting rules meant companies didn't have to treat this largess to executives as an expense. And like Nabors, some used repricing, reloading and other tactics that made it even easier for executives to score huge hauls.

WSJ's Mark Maremont, Charles Forelle and James Bandler discuss2 their yearlong investigation of stock-options abuses such as backdating, including what has happened since the first article appeared in March.

· The Biggest Paydays: See a chart of executives who have profited most from stock options, from 1992 to 2005.

· Plus, complete coverage3

This year, options practices exploded in one of the biggest corporate-fraud scandals in decades. Some companies and executives stole from shareholders, by pretending that options had been issued earlier than they really were, at more favorable prices. At least 130 U.S. corporations are under investigation for possible backdating of option grants. Some have admitted to it. More than 60 executives and directors of public companies have lost their jobs so far, 17 of them chief executive officers. After probable backdating was exposed at giant insurer UnitedHealth Group Inc., the CEO had to resign and give up about $200 million of stock-options value. The company said it will have to restate past earnings by as much as $1.7 billion.

Nabors's Mr. Isenberg offers an example of the huge wealth CEOs have gained through stock options. Now, some of his option grants appear to raise questions about how they were dated. A number came on days when the stock hit its lowest close for the month or the quarter. At other companies, a series of low-price grants has been a pattern that has suggested possible dating problems. At the least, the favorable grant dates added to Mr. Isenberg's mammoth options gains.

A spokesman for Nabors said its legal department did an internal review and found "no irregularities in its grant practices." Nabors showed internal documents to The Wall Street Journal that the company said provide evidence the grants were properly dated. Some of the documents bolster that assertion. The spokesman, citing Mr. Isenberg's record in lifting Nabors from a company in bankruptcy court to one with a market value of more than $9 billion today, also said that "Nabors strongly believes that Mr. Isenberg is appropriately compensated."

The backdating scandal at scores of companies shows one way stock options, once seen as an executive-pay reform, have often been distorted by corporate officials and their consultants. Nell Minow, a longtime corporate-governance advocate, calls backdating "just another in an endless and unstoppable series of mechanisms to subvert the purpose of stock options." A vocal proponent of options in the early 1990s, Ms. Minow now regrets that stance. "Options became completely disconnected from shareholder interests," she says. "I grossly underestimated the capacity of corporate boards and corporate managers to circumvent the principles we established."

From 1992 to 2001, the average value of option grants to CEOs of S&P 500 companies soared nearly tenfold, according to data compiled by Kevin J. Murphy of the University of Southern California. The result was that options, which in 1992 made up less than a quarter of the average CEO's pay, by 2001 provided more than half of pay packages -- packages that were much larger. Companies have started doling out fewer options in the past few years, but grants remain far more generous than a decade ago.

In 1985, Miami financier Victor Posner pulled down $12.7 million, putting him atop lists of best-paid CEOs that year. Last year, 393 executives earned more than that, thanks largely to gains from exercising options, according to Standard & Poor's ExecuComp, which tracks executive pay at about 1,800 public companies. The top 2005 earner was Barry Diller of IAC/InterActiveCorp., with $295 million, nearly all from options.

Defenders of options, who remain numerous, say options shouldn't be judged by a few giant packages. Many companies have given out options judiciously, say defenders, some of whom attribute rising executive pay to tight competition for top managers. Others say stock options have helped to foster innovation, by giving young but cash-poor companies a currency with which to attract talent.

Some supporters of options even give them partial credit for the long bull market that began in 1982, figuring that options help focus top executives on the key issue for shareholders: the stock price. Frederic W. Cook, a New York compensation consultant, calls the stock option "the most perfect equity derivative that's ever been invented: It's simple, elegant, easily understood, and it gives you a little piece of the action."

Popular Demand

Stock options usually give recipients a 10-year window to buy the company's stock at the price when the options are granted. If someone gets options when the stock trades at $50 and it goes to $75, the holder can cash out at the $50 "exercise price" -- also called a "strike price" -- and nail a $25 profit on each option. Options usually don't "vest," or become exercisable, for at least a year after they're granted.

Stock options appeared at least as early as the 1920s, says Carola Frydman, an assistant professor of finance at Massachusetts Institute of Technology who has studied the history of executive pay. The modern era began in 1950, when Congress, reversing a court ruling, gave options substantial tax advantages over ordinary income. By the middle of that decade, they accounted for nearly a third of CEO compensation at large industrial companies.

"In the 1950s, they called it the period of stock-option opulence," says Ms. Frydman. "They didn't know what was coming."

After losing popularity during the weak stock market of the 1970s, options surged back into favor in the late 1980s. One reason was public fury over mammoth executive paydays for bosses with just average performance. In an influential 1990 Harvard Business Review article, Mr. Murphy and Michael C. Jensen said the problem was executives were paid like "bureaucrats" instead of entrepreneurs. They called for giving "big rewards for superior performance and big penalties for poor performance."

"We were suggesting people shift from salaries to stock options to put more pay at risk," Mr. Murphy says today. But "that's not what companies ended up doing. They layered on massive amounts of options on top of the rest."

The bandwagon got two big boosts from an unlikely source: Congress.

First, it passed a law, pushed by President Clinton, seeking to rein in executive pay by limiting the tax break for it. The 1993 law said companies couldn't deduct yearly compensation of more than $1 million for any one of their top five officers.

But it exempted certain kinds of pay linked to performance, which included stock options. Companies rushed to restructure pay plans to grant more options. In 1994, the first year the law was in effect, the value of option grants to CEOs at S&P 500 firms leapt by 45% on average, according to Mr. Murphy, and nearly doubled again over the next two years.

The 1993 law "deserves pride of place in the Museum of Unintended Consequences," said Christopher Cox, chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, this fall.

Then in 1994, Congress helped beat back a proposed rule requiring companies to treat a stock-option grant as an expense and deduct it from profits. The plan, backed by the SEC and accounting rule makers, sparked intense corporate opposition. Congress stepped in to fight it, and after a long battle, the accounting rule makers caved. They issued a watered-down rule saying all that companies had to do was disclose in a footnote what options would have done to their profits, had the proposal passed.

Meanwhile, Congress left alone an older law that gave companies a tax deduction whenever stock options were exercised. Under that rule, which applied to the most common type of option given to executives, the employer can deduct a dollar from its income for tax purposes for every dollar of option gains pocketed by employees.

With rules like these, "what wasn't there to like about a stock option?" says Paula Todd, a compensation expert at consulting firm Towers Perrin. "You could grant them in unlimited amounts, with no expense, and claim a tax deduction. [Companies] would pay their dry cleaners if they could with stock options."

Better Than Average

Soon, other forces spurred companies to give executives ever more stock options. One was the "Lake Wobegon effect," named for the mythical Minnesota town in radio host Garrison Keillor's world where all the children are above average. Many boards believed their chiefs should be paid at least as much as the average in their industry, and often more. That attitude had the effect of pushing this average up, year after year.

Another force largely escaped notice because it seemed benign. This was a tendency by companies to grant top executives the same number of options each year, or more, even if the stock price had risen. During a bull market, doing so kept raising the value of pay packages.

Consider an executive who is granted a million options when the stock is at $20. If it's 50% higher a year later, the executive can reap a $10 profit per option, or $10 million.

But now the stock is at $30. If the executive again gets a million options, and the stock again rises 50%, the executive's profit is $15 million, not $10 million. In order to give this executive an option grant of merely the same value in year two as in year one, the year-two grant would have to contain far fewer options.

Directors had a hard time telling a CEO they were cutting the number of options because the stock had risen. Ms. Todd says the CEO's reaction would be, "I worked to get the stock price up, and my next grant is smaller and has a higher strike price?'"

Exxon awarded CEO Lee Raymond a similar number of options yearly from 1993 through 1999 -- 800,000 to 900,000, adjusted for later stock splits. Over that period, the stock rose sharply. The rise meant the value of the 1999 grant was $8.5 million, or six times that of the 1993 grant, by ExecuComp's tally. The calculation used a standard formula for valuing options known as "Black-Scholes," which sets a value for a grant at the time it's given by estimating how much gain it will someday bring the recipient.

An Exxon Mobil Corp. spokesman said the grants were made by a panel of outside directors and based partly on the size of grants to top executives elsewhere. After 2001, Exxon replaced options grants with restricted stock, a different form of compensation that the board said was "more effective in aligning executives' interests with those of shareholders." Mr. Raymond retired a year ago.

At times, the value of options companies doled out has been equal to a large share of their profits. Retailer Abercrombie & Fitch Co. gave CEO Michael Jeffries 4.66 million options in 1999, a grant ExecuComp valued at $120 million. The firm's 1999 net income was $150 million.

Abercrombie didn't actually have to shell out $120 million when it gave the options to Mr. Jeffries, of course. But it incurred an obligation to issue 4.66 million shares someday at the 1999 price. And this obligation didn't have to be reflected as an expense on the company's income statement.

A spokesman for Abercrombie said the grant had a "delayed vesting" feature "intended to incentivize Mike Jeffries to remain with the company...and to continue to generate exceptional financial results." Under him, the stock has risen more than 750% since it began trading in 1996. Mr. Jeffries is eligible to exercise the big 1999 grant now, and if he did so would reap about a $120 million profit.

The options-issuing frenzy reached a peak in 1999 and 2000. Dot-com companies, some with little other way to pay employees, handed out options like confetti. Thousands of people made fortunes on stratospheric rises in the stocks of tech firms, some of which didn't exist a couple of years later. Meanwhile, some "old economy" companies, trying not to lose top people to Silicon Valley, cranked up their own options generators.

In mid-2002, Alan Greenspan testified to Congress about what was then a tech and telecom bust, and about a wave of corporate scandals at firms like Enron, WorldCom and Tyco International. The Federal Reserve's then-chairman spoke of an "infectious greed" that seemed to grip some in business, for which he partly blamed "poorly structured" stock options. Giant grants "perversely created incentives to artificially inflate reported earnings in order to keep stock prices high and rising," he said. "The incentives they created overcame the good judgment of too many corporate managers."

Moving the Goal Post

When stock prices failed to rise, some companies changed the rules. If the share price fell well below stock options' exercise price, they simply lowered that price. Companies defended the move by saying options far "under water" or "out of the money" no longer served as incentives to executives to perform well.

Critics of repricing say it subverts the fundamental options purpose of aligning managers' and shareholders' interests. Since shareholders can't get a refund on a stock they bought that has fallen, the critics say, why should executives be able to do something similar?

Repricings "basically ensure that the manager gets paid no matter what. It takes a lot of risk out of the whole thing," says David Yermack, a New York University professor who studies executive pay.

About 11% of companies repriced options at least once between 1992 and 1997, according to research by Chandra Subramaniam, an associate professor of accounting at the University of Texas at Arlington. Borland Software Corp. did it eight times in the decade ended in 1998. System Software Associates Inc. repriced the same options five times in 1996 and 1997 as its stock kept plunging, Mr. Subramaniam says. In a paper published in 2004, he and his co-authors calculated that repricings padded executives' pay by an average of nearly $500,000 each.

In 1998, a change in accounting rules crimped repricing somewhat. Companies now had to take a hefty charge against earnings if they put new exercise prices on existing options. But there was a loophole. If they canceled the old options, waited six months and issued new ones at a lower price, there was no penalty.

As tech stocks collapsed in the early 2000s, directors rushed to shore up options stranded out of the money. At computer-chip maker PMC-Sierra Inc., the company stock peaked at $245 a share in March 2000, then plunged below $10. Many shareholders fell hard.

The boss had a softer landing. Between September 2002 and March 2003, the company repriced 1.6 million of CEO Robert Bailey's options, slashing the exercise price on some all the way to $5.95 from $52.375. Mr. Bailey has cashed out about a third of the repriced options, for profits of $4.86 million, more than eight times what he'd have made if they hadn't been repriced. PMC-Sierra confirmed the figures but had no other comment.

Lock and Reload

In the late '80s and early '90s, companies found another way to goose stock-option grants: "Reload" them.

Normally, options disappear when exercised. But with a reload plan, a person who exercises options automatically gets replacements. Typically the replacements number fewer than the options exercised. They carry the same expiration date but a different exercise price -- the current market price.

Reload plans are supposed to encourage executives to hold stock in their company, says Mr. Cook, the pay consultant, who invented them. To get a reload, executives exercising options generally must do so not with cash, but with stock. That is, they must hand in existing shares whose value equals the cost of exercising the options. Since executives can't do that unless they own shares, they have an incentive to be shareholders of the company and to hold onto new shares obtained when they exercise options.

Critics decried reloads as abusive, a kind of option replication machine that enriched top managers -- while diluting other stockholders' ownership as the number of shares outstanding rose.

The first reload plan appeared in the late 1980s. By 1999, according to Mr. Cook's firm, nearly a fifth of large companies were offering them.

The king of reloads was Sanford Weill, who retired in April as chairman of Citigroup Inc. with an options fortune largely based on a single grant reloaded many times. In 1992, shareholders of his company, then called Primerica Corp., were asked to approve a reload plan. Deep into the legalese, on page 17, was a clause that would prove extremely lucrative for Mr. Weill: The reload plan applied to previously issued options, including a giant grant Mr. Weill got in 1986.

The plan initially also had an unusual element. Any options issued as a result of reloads wouldn't expire on the options' old expiration date, but could carry a new 10-year term.

Not long after the plan was adopted, Mr. Weill exercised nearly all of his original 1986 options, for a gain of more than $60 million. He then received replacements for most of them, restarting the clock with 10 more years to run. Year after year Mr. Weill exercised some of the replacements, each time getting more new options -- some of which he then exercised, once again getting more replacement options, and so forth.

From 1992 through the end of last year, Mr. Weill racked up total option profits of $964 million, roughly $870 million of which came from the original 1986 options and their generations of reloaded progeny. Shareholders did extremely well, too. As of yesterday, the stock of Citigroup and its predecessors was more than 30 times the price in the 1986 public offering of Mr. Weill's original company.

A Citigroup spokesman, Michael Hanretta, said Mr. Weill's options were so valuable because the company "created superior shareholder value." Mr. Hanretta also noted that employees couldn't activate the reload feature unless the stock had risen 20% from the time an option was granted, and at various times Mr. Weill was required by company policy to hold onto all or most of his shares.

Reloads have died out in recent years, after new accounting rules made them too costly to issue. A separate 2000 rule also made it financially prohibitive to add a reload feature retroactively -- eight years after Mr. Weill got that benefit.

Other rule changes have also helped slow the options express. Besides a 2002 requirement for prompt disclosure of grants, a new accounting rule means companies must record an expense when they make an options grant, and reduce profits accordingly. Many companies have cut back on options, and some have stopped awarding them at all, often replacing them with grants of shares.

Deep Well

Over the years, few corporate executives have availed themselves more thoroughly of what options have to offer than Nabors's Mr. Isenberg.

Still chief executive at the age of 77, Mr. Isenberg lives in the Breakers resort complex in Palm Beach, Fla., and commutes to Nabors's U.S. headquarters in Houston. A generous donor, he has helped found a school in New York for children with learning disabilities and given millions to the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, which has named its business school after him.

Mr. Isenberg worked at Exxon for 13 years and then headed a small steel company, settling into early retirement after that firm was sold in 1982. He was persuaded to rejoin the business world by his friend Martin Whitman, a prominent New York investor, whose fund had taken control of a troubled oil-services company called Anglo Energy. Mr. Isenberg invested some of his own money and in 1987 took the helm of what was soon renamed Nabors Industries.

Early on, Mr. Isenberg personally lent the company $5 million when it wanted to make an acquisition but lacked funds, Nabors says. It was the first in a series of deals that "made the company," said the Nabors spokesman, Denny Smith.

From a regional player, Nabors grew into one of the world's largest contract oil and gas drillers, with yearly revenue of $3.6 billion. Its stock has risen at a lush 21.7% compound annual rate since early 1987, although it has underperformed the Dow Jones Oil Equipment and Services Index in the past five years.

An employment contract Mr. Isenberg got when Nabors emerged from bankruptcy entitled him to an annual bonus equaling a percentage of the company's cash flow above a threshold. Nearly two decades later, Nabors is long out of bankruptcy but has continued to renew this unusual percentage-of-cash-flow deal, albeit with less-generous formulas.

Rather than accept all his bonuses, Mr. Isenberg in many years declined part of them in favor of stock options. By Nabors's reckoning, his option grants were worth tens of millions of dollars in some years. Mr. Smith, the spokesman, said this acceptance of options instead of cash meant Mr. Isenberg was placing a big chunk of already-earned pay "at risk, in alignment with shareholder interests." Mr. Isenberg still received substantial cash bonuses, of as much as $3 million in a year, and sometimes was given additional options.

For a time, Nabors operated under an options "reload" plan. It was a generous one: Instead of replacing only a portion of options that were exercised, it replaced them one-for-one. Mr. Isenberg could cash in options and take profits yet still have just as many options as before, though with higher exercise prices.

In another atypical feature, the replacement options sometimes had new terms of 10 years, making them even more valuable. Nabors says it stopped reloads before 2000. But in that year it gave Mr. Isenberg a "special award" of 2.4 million options, in lieu of a reload on 4.7 million options that he exercised for a $122 million gain. (Share figures in this article aren't adjusted for a recent two-for-one stock split.)

In 1998, amid an industry slump, Nabors's stock sank sharply. Some of Mr. Isenberg's options were "under water." The board repriced them. In exchange for giving up a fourth of his old options, he got new ones carrying a more favorable exercise price.

"The repricing was designed to restore incentive value to the option packages," said Nabors's Mr. Smith. He said repricing was widely available to employees. As it happened, Mr. Isenberg made less money by accepting the repricing deal and giving up some of his options than if he had held on, Mr. Smith said.

Following a single grant from its genesis shows how the various maneuvers can pile up profit.

Mr. Isenberg received a grant of 1.8 million options dated in Sept. 23, 1991. He exercised them in 1996 and 1997, pocketing about $24 million in profits.

Normally, that would have been the end of these options. But Nabors reloaded Mr. Isenberg, replacing his exercised options with a similar number -- which had 10 more years to run.

Then in 1998, amid the stock downturn, Nabors repriced the reload options.

Mr. Isenberg cashed in most of them in 2000 and gave the rest to a family member in 2002. His total profit from a single grant -- reloaded, extended and repriced: about $54 million, not including the gift.

The CEO's overall stock-option gains, both realized and not yet cashed in, came to $685 million at the end of last year, says S&P ExecuComp -- putting him 8th on its list of big winners from 1992 to 2005.

Mr. Isenberg also has benefited from some good timing of his option grants. The Sept. 23, 1991, award was dated on the day Nabors's stock touched its lowest closing price of that month, $5.

But it isn't clear when the price was actually set. Company documents suggest the grant price may actually have been determined many months earlier, on another day when the stock closed at $5. Moreover, the grant was contingent on a new Isenberg employment contract -- which other documents indicate wasn't signed until well after Sept. 23, when the stock was higher.

For a grant of a million options dated Dec. 4, 1995, another monthly low, Nabors produced no minutes of a compensation-committee meeting. Instead, a memo seven weeks later said there had been a discussion on Dec. 4 of Mr. Isenberg trading in part of his bonus for options. The memo said the idea first would be run by a consultant, suggesting the grant wasn't made final until weeks after the stated Dec. 4 award date.

In all, of 11 new option grants to Mr. Isenberg between 1991 and 2002, two were dated at quarterly lows in the Nabors stock price and five more at monthly lows. The odds against such a fortunate pattern occurring by chance are long.

Nabors's Mr. Smith, in a written reply to questions, rejected any notion that any backdating might have been involved. Nabors let the Journal review dozens of pages of documents at its Houston offices that Nabors says support the conclusion that the low-price grants were actually made on the fortunate dates. For four of the seven grants dated at monthly or quarterly lows, Nabors showed compensation-committee minutes saying that meetings were held on those dates and options granted. For another monthly-low grant, it showed committee minutes saying a meeting was held the day after a grant, with the grant made "effective" the previous day.

In mid-2002, a federal law required executives to report option grants within two days after they're made, instead of having weeks or months to do so, a change that sharply cut the potential for backdating. Since mid-2002, none of Mr. Isenberg's four option grants came at monthly stock lows.

Mr. Smith noted that before June 2002, Nabors was registered in Delaware, and directors could meet on short notice. Nabors then became a Bermuda-registered company. Mr. Smith said that since then it has had most board meetings outside the U.S., with options awarded at meetings "scheduled long in advance."

Mr. Isenberg has received compensation "beyond expectations," Mr. Smith said, because of Nabors's prosperity. The spokesman said Nabors is discussing a restructuring of Mr. Isenberg's future pay arrangement. Meanwhile, he has voluntarily cut the bonus he's entitled to in half.

UnitedHealth Faces Formal Probe (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, December 27, 2006

UnitedHealth Group Inc. said the Securities and Exchange Commission has launched a formal investigation into its stock-options practices.

The Minnetonka, Minn., health insurer had been the subject of an informal SEC inquiry since April.

"The company has cooperated and will continue to cooperate with the SEC," UnitedHealth said in an SEC filing.

The company has delayed financial reports while it reviews its stock-options practices, which have led to an internal probe, a management shake-up and a restatement of financial results. UnitedHealth has said that using current accounting practices, the pretax charges for stock-based compensation expense are likely to range from $400 million to $600 million for the period 1994-2005, as well as from $25 million to $60 million for 2006.

The company has said it has substantially completed its analysis of the adjustments made to its financial statements and has asked for consultation on certain interpretive issues with the SEC's top accounting official. UnitedHealth said it will review these issues with SEC staff before completing its restatement of historical financial statements and filing quarterly reports for the quarters ended June 30 and Sept. 30, 2006.

UnitedHealth is one of the largest companies to be ensnared in the options-backdating scandal, in which companies manipulated the dates that options were awarded to provide additional compensation to executives. More than 130 companies have come under scrutiny by the SEC, and many of those are being investigated by the Justice Department.

Internal probe reveals bribes; ex-FBI chief hired as monitor

WASHINGTON -- DaimlerChrysler AG has hired former FBI director Louis Freeh to serve as an outside monitor as it nears the end of a two-year internal investigation that has uncovered multiple instances of bribery by company employees, according to people familiar with the situation.

The massive internal investigation found employees at the automaker's Mercedes division bribed officials in Asia, Africa and Eastern Europe, the people said.

The bribery allegations, brought to light in 2004 by company whistle-blowers, also are the focus of a civil investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission and a criminal probe by the Justice Department.

Company officials would not comment on the findings of the internal probe.

"The company is very determined to operate our business with the highest ethical standards. We take these matters very seriously," DaimlerChrysler spokesman Han Tjan said. "We're still conducting our investigation."

At its height, the internal investigation led by prominent Washington, D.C., attorney Robert Bennett involved 85 lawyers and nearly as many accountants reviewing millions of documents and conducting hundreds of interviews. The company's legal, accounting and consulting bills connected to the probe have topped tens of millions of dollars, a person familiar with the matter said.

Investigators traveled to 25 countries and interviewed dozens of people, including former DaimlerChrysler Chairman Juergen Schrempp and other executives, the people said. Investigators also uncovered evidence of secret bank accounts.

This fall, DaimlerChrysler hired Freeh as a consultant to monitor the company's compliance with anti-bribery regulations and to review its internal investigation. Freeh's hiring hasn't been announced publicly.

Efforts by The News to reach Freeh, who works as a consultant to companies facing legal issues, were unsuccessful.

DOJ_NMG_0109312

DaimlerChrysler has been regularly debriefing the SEC and Justice Department on the findings of its investigation and has turned over interview summaries and documents.

The bribes were seen by some company officials as an accepted way of doing business in many countries, according to people familiar with the investigation. In some cases, the amount of bribes was based on how many Mercedes vehicles were sold in a given market, the people said. In certain instances, investigators struggled to follow the money trail because intermediaries were used.

While DaimlerChrysler's internal probe is nearing completion, federal officials aren't expected to complete their investigations until 2007. Serious settlement discussions aren't expected until early next year.

Aiming to minimize penalties

DaimlerChrysler is clearly aiming to minimize any fines or sanctions by hiring Freeh as an internal monitor and providing federal investigators with the findings of the exhaustive internal investigation.

DaimlerChrysler, which is based in Stuttgart, Germany, and controls the Auburn Hills-based Chrysler Group, could face charges under the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, a 1977 law designed to prevent U.S. companies from acting unethically abroad, because its stock is listed on the New York Stock Exchange.

German companies could deduct certain types of bribes on their taxes until the late 1990s.

German prosecutors in Stuttgart also are investigating whether the company violated anti-bribery and disclosure laws.

In March, DaimlerChrysler revealed in its annual report that an undisclosed number of executives have been disciplined or fired as a result of the investigation and admitted that "improper payments" were made in Asia, Africa and Eastern Europe.

The company reduced 2005 net income by $84.5 million and 2005 operating profit by $21 million to account for the improper payments. It also faces the prospect of having to pay back taxes. Still unclear is how much senior executives knew of the arrangements.

No U.S.-based employees are believed to be involved.

Whistle-blower cases settled

On Dec. 6, the company settled the last of two 2004 whistle-blower suits filed in U.S. District Court in Detroit that prompted the probe. Christine Holtzmann had alleged the company ignored reports of accounting fraud and mishandled audits. She said she was fired in December 2003 after an 18-year career with the automaker after speaking up about the fraud.

In July 2005, DaimlerChrysler settled a 2004 wrongful-firing suit filed in U.S. District Court in Detroit by former Chrysler accountant David Bazzetta.

Bazzetta claimed he was fired in January 2004 in part because he talked to superiors about as many as 40 secret bank accounts maintained by the Mercedes unit to bribe foreign government officials.

He said in his lawsuit he learned of the bank accounts during a corporate audit committee meeting in July 2001 in Stuttgart. According to court filings, Bazzetta claimed a vice president of corporate audit, Hubertus Buderath, told a group "a common practice of Daimler Benz was the use of secret bank accounts to bribe government officials." Buderath allegedly told then-chairman Schrempp that 40 of those accounts still existed and "were buried deep in (the company's) balance sheet." Schrempp denied knowledge of any accounts.

SEC lawyers interviewed Bazzetta and Holtzmann.

Point man is powerful lawyer

The point man for DaimlerChrysler in the internal investigation is Bennett, a high-powered attorney who has represented Enron and KPMG in corporate scandals. He was President Clinton's personal attorney in the Paula Jones civil case and is a partner in Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom LLP.

Bennett declined to comment.

Skadden partner Colleen Mahoney, a former deputy director of enforcement at the SEC, who is also involved in the DaimlerChrysler internal investigation, could not be reached. Two other Skadden Arps partners, former assistant U.S. attorney Gary DiBianco and Mitchell Ettinger, a former chief prosecutor for the Air Force, also have been involved in the probe.

Mark F. Mendelsohn, deputy chief of the Justice Department's fraud section, and Frederic D. Firestone, an SEC associate director of enforcement, who are overseeing the government's investigations into DaimlerChrysler, also declined to comment.

Numerous German companies have faced bribery investigations -- Volkswagen AG for allegedly bribing union officials and most recently engineering giant Siemens AG for allegedly bribing customers using secret bank accounts.

Experts said the government's focus on DaimlerChrysler may be to send a message to the world's third-largest economy to take bribery more seriously.

"The U.S. government really wants to encourage the Germans to crack down," said Peter Henning, a Wayne State University law professor and former SEC attorney. "It's the principle here. The amounts are usually never that large. It's surprisingly cheap to bribe public officials in the Third World."

The SEC has ramped up enforcement of its anti-bribery laws recently, filing more than 100 cases in 2006.

Ex-FBI Chief Freeh Aids DaimlerChrysler Bribe Probe (AP)

AP, December 27, 2006

AUBURN HILLS, Mich. - Former FBI Director Louis Freeh is aiding DaimlerChrysler AG in its internal investigation of bribery allegations involving company employees, a company spokesman confirmed Tuesday.

DaimlerChrysler spokesman Han Tjan said the German-American automaker has already made an internal announcement that it hired Freeh as an "outside consultant" in the investigation. Freeh's hiring was reported Tuesday by The Detroit News.

Freeh is a member of the Gavel Consulting Group, which consists of former federal judges "who can provide strategic advice to corporations and law firms on anticipated actions in business, litigation and investigations," according to the group's Web site.

A message seeking comment from Freeh was left with the Gavel Consulting Group on Tuesday.

Tjan declined to comment further on either Freeh's role or the company's investigation.

"We stress very much that we take this very seriously and we are determined to operate all our businesses with the highest ethical standards," Tjan said.

In 2004, the Securities and Exchange Commission opened an inquiry after a DaimlerChrysler employee said he was fired for complaining that the company was using secret bank accounts to bribe government officials.

In 2005, DaimlerChrysler acknowledged that the Justice Department was investigating whether the company had paid bribes to foreign officials with the knowledge of its senior executives. The company said it is continuing to cooperate with the investigations.

In March, the automaker said an internal investigation of bribery claims found evidence of "improper payments" in Africa, Asia and Eastern Europe. It said several employees had been dismissed or suspended.

SEC Amends Rules On Disclosing Executive Compensation (LAW)

By Donna Block, The Deal

The Deal, December 27, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission is changing newly adopted rules governing the disclosure of executive and director compensation.

In a statement released Friday, the agency said it is altering the requirements for disclosing the value of stock option awards and giving firms more flexibility in how they report those expenses.

The SEC said the new rules should more closely conform with the reporting of stock option awards under standards in the Financial Accounting Standards Board's rule FAS 123. That rule requires recognition of the costs of stock option awards over the period in which an employee is required to provide service in exchange for the award.

Using this same approach when disclosing executive compensation will give investors a better idea of the compensation earned by an executive or director during a particular reporting period, the SEC explained in its announcement.

The SEC compensation rules were the most extensive overhaul of executive-pay regulations in 14 years. The SEC received more than 20,000 comment letters, a record, before adopting the new rules in July.

Rising compensation has been fueled by the growing use of incentive pay, such as cash bonuses, stock options and other awards. Those incentives have made it hard for investors to get a total pay number on top executives.

Now companies must add a section to the annual proxy statement sent to shareholders that analyzes compensation. In this section, company directors and managers must describe in detail how they determined compensation for the chief executive and other top officials.

SEC Chairman Christopher Cox has said the new requirements will shed new light on the quality of corporate governance and, with the more complete disclosure about payments or benefits to executives, excessive compensation packages may be reined in.

The rule change will be effective once it's published in the Federal Register. The SEC will take public comment for 30 days and make changes to its amended rules if necessary.

S.E.C. Changes Reporting Rule On Bosses' Pay (NYT)

By Floyd Norris

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0109314

The Securities and Exchange Commission, in a move announced late on the last business day before Christmas, reversed a decision it had made in July and adopted a rule that would allow many companies to report significantly lower total compensation for top executives.

The change in the way grants of stock options are to be explained to investors is a victory for corporations that had opposed the rule when it was issued in July, and a defeat for institutional investors that had backed the S.E.C.'s original rule.

"It was a holiday present to corporate America," Ann Yerger, the executive director of the Council of Institutional Investors, said yesterday. "It will certainly make the numbers look smaller in 2007 than they would otherwise have looked."

Christopher Cox, the commission chairman, said yesterday that he viewed the decision as "a relative technicality" that improved the rule. When the rule was adopted in July, Mr. Cox said it was aimed at providing information that would allow shareholders to "make better decisions about the appropriate amount to pay the men and women entrusted with running their companies."

In announcing the new rule on Friday, he said "the new disclosure requirements will be easier for companies to prepare and for investors to understand."

As controversy has grown over rising executive pay, it has been hard to even get agreement on the total value of compensation for top executives. The rules passed last summer required companies to disclose more information and to compile it in a summary compensation table that is expected to become the standard by which corporate pay is compared.

The new rule changes the way grants of stock options will be measured in that summary table.

Under the old rule, if a company awarded an options grant valued at $15 million to an executive this year, the full amount of $15 million would show up in the summary compensation table.

Under the new rule, which takes effect immediately, the amount reflected in the table would be much smaller, with the remaining part of the $15 million included in later years, as the executive qualifies to exercise the options.

Under some circumstances, the options grant might not be reported at all in the first year, even if the executive would otherwise have been the company's highest paid executive had the full value of the option grant been included.

The new rule is intended to make the disclosures identical to the way companies report options expenses in their financial statements, under accounting standard 123R, as approved by the Financial Accounting Standards Board.

In an interview yesterday, Mr. Cox said the change reflected what the commission had intended to do when it adopted the original rule in July. "My understanding all along was that we were going to follow the 123R model," he said. "It came out differently from that when we adopted it."

The fact it came out differently was disclosed by the S.E.C. at the time. The commission pointed out that some companies had wanted to time the disclosures in accordance with the accounting rule, but said the other approach "is more consistent with the purpose of executive compensation disclosure."

But on Friday, the S.E.C. said it now believed that the change would provide "a fuller and more useful picture of executive compensation than our recently adopted rules."

While practices vary, stock options often vest — meaning they may be exercised — over a period of three to five years after they are granted. The options can be canceled if the employee leaves the company before they vest.

For most executives, the accounting rule says the expense should be spread over the period from the grant to full vesting. So if options vest over five years, the expense would be reported over that period.

In the $15 million example, if the options vested over a five-year period, the summary compensation table would reflect a cost of $3 million per year. In the first year, the cost might be lower if the options were issued relatively late in the year, and could be almost nothing if they were issued just before the end of the company's fiscal year.

But the new rule could create confusion because it would treat options issued to some executives — those eligible for retirement — differently.

If an executive were eligible to retire when the option was granted, and could keep the option if he or she did retire, then the entire option grant would be expensed immediately and listed in the summary table in the year it was granted.

But if the executive is not eligible for retirement, then the expense is spread out over the several years it takes for the options to vest.

That makes it possible that two executives with identical pay packages would have very different disclosures, making the one eligible for retirement seem to be much better compensated. "This will muddy the waters," Ms. Yerger said.

Asked about that, Mr. Cox conceded it was an anomaly. But he said there were anomalies under the other rule as well. John White, the director of the commission's division of corporation finance, pointed to the fact that the rule adopted in July could lead to reporting of compensation that would never be received.

"The anomaly that the commission was most concerned with was that if an executive leaves the company before the options vest, the full amount of the option still was reported in compensation disclosure when, in fact, nothing was received," said Mr. White, who became director of the division in March, after the previous rules were proposed but before they were adopted.

He said that some companies issued options that had so-called cliff-vesting, in which all options vested after five years, and were forfeited if the executive left before that time. Under the new rule, expenses would still be reported for the first years, but then a negative amount would be reported in the year the executive left, reversing the earlier reported figures. There was no such reversal in the July rules.

The commission adopted the new rule in an unusual way, making it take effect immediately even though the commission had not announced that it was considering a change and had not sought public comment.

An S.E.C. spokesman pointed to two other rules adopted that way in recent years. Both were intended to comply with new federal laws that were about to take effect.

One, in 2000, stated that e-mail messages from mutual funds could satisfy rules requiring that information be given to customers in writing. The other, in 2001, established rules for complying with the Gramm-Leach-Bliley Act allowing mergers of financial companies.

Mr. Cox said there was no time to seek comment if the change announced Friday was to take effect in time to affect proxies issued in coming months. He said it would be confusing if companies reported one way in 2007 and then changed in 2008.

The rules adopted in July were intended to deal with widespread complaints that it was difficult to discover all elements of pay packages for top executives. Besides providing the summary table, the disclosures will provide new information in a number of areas, including retirement benefits.

The disclosures will be made for a company's chief executive, chief financial officer and the three other highest paid executives, as indicated by the summary table. For those on the list, all option grants will be disclosed, so even if the summary table leaves out much of the value of options granted to a chief executive, investors could see the terms of the grant and consider it in assessing how well the executive was paid.

Under the July rule, a large options grant to an executive could propel him or her onto the disclosure list. But under the rule adopted Friday, such a grant might not put the executive in that group, meaning there would be no disclosure of that executive's pay that year.

Over time, of course, most executives whose pay is being disclosed would have the same total reported under either rule. Under the new rule, options that were granted in prior years, but vested in 2006, will show up in next spring's disclosures.

The reduction in reported pay is likely to be the largest at companies that accelerated the vesting of options in 2005 to avoid reporting them as an expense at all when the new accounting rule went into effect. Executives at those companies will not have as many old options vesting as they normally would have, and thus will be able to report lower pay.

The commission said it would take public comments on the latest change for 30 days, but it added that the new rules were now final.

When the commission considered the issue earlier this year, David C. Chavern, a vice president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, urged it to take the step it rejected in July and adopted on Friday, saying that to do otherwise would overstate compensation, since options would not have been earned when they were reported, and might later be canceled.

Whenever the value of the options shows up in the summary table, the value shown will be the estimated value of the option at the time it was granted. Years later, when the options vest, the stock price could be much higher or lower than it was when the option was issued, making the options much more valuable — or all but worthless — by the time they show up in the summary compensation table at the old value.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Police Chiefs Eye More Federal Aid (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, December 27, 2006

The International Association of the Chiefs of Police is urging Congress to step up its support for law-enforcement agencies after what it calls "years of deep budget cuts and a disturbing rise in crime rates."

"The FBI's crime report ... serves as a stark reminder of what happens when law-enforcement agencies are stretched too thin: crime rates rise," said Joseph Carter, chief of the Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority Transit Police Department and president of the IACP.

"We are hopeful that the 110th Congress will take our suggestions to heart and not only completely fund important programs, but also establish new programs and enhance others that will help state, local and tribal law enforcement keep our homeland and hometowns safe," Chief Carter said.

If law-enforcement authorities are to be successful in their efforts to protect the public from "both crime and the menace of terrorism," he said, they "must receive the tools and resources they need." He said the IACP thinks Congress must:

·Fully fund the Byrne Justice Assistance Grant Program at $1.1 billion, the Community Oriented Policing Service program at $1.05 billion, and the Law Enforcement Terrorism Prevention Program at $500 million.

·Promote information and intelligence-sharing, establish a National Commission on Law Enforcement and the Administration of Justice, and enhance police recruitment and retention.

·Reform the Communications Assistance for Law Enforcement Act, reinstate the assault-weapons ban and establish a certified officers clearinghouse.

"The IACP is hopeful the 110th Congress will help law-enforcement agencies reverse this dangerous trend by implementing these innovative solutions," Chief Carter said.

He said the IACP is "very concerned" that the debate over funding for the various law-enforcement and homeland security assistance programs has become increasingly partisan during the past several years and that the issue is too important "to the safety of our communities and our nation to allow political differences to delay or reduce funding."

On Tuesday, the FBI reported that violent crime nationwide increased by 3.7 percent in the first six months of this year, continuing a trend that began in 2005. Last year, the number of violent crimes increased by 2.5 percent, the largest gain in 15 years, and the Justice Department pledged to find out why the crime numbers were continuing to increase.

The FBI's Preliminary Semiannual Uniform Crime Report, based on statistics submitted by 11,535 law-enforcement agencies nationwide, showed increases in murders (up 1.4 percent), robberies (up 9.7 percent) and aggravated assaults (up 1.2 percent) over the same period in 2005.

According to the FBI report, the largest increases in the reported number of violent crimes, 12.8 percent, occurred in small cities with populations of 10,000 to 24,999, while cities with populations of 500,000 to 999,999 had the most marked increase in reported murder offenses, up 8.4 percent.

Founded in 1893, the IACP is the world's oldest and largest association of law-enforcement executives with more than 20,000 members in nearly 100 countries.

Canadian Gold Medalist Detained On Child Abduction Charge (AP)

By Brian Witte

AP, December 27, 2006

BALTIMORE - A federal judge on Tuesday ordered Canadian Olympic gold-medalist Myriam Bedard to temporarily remain in the custody of U.S. marshals after being charged with violating a child custody order by bringing her 12-year-old daughter to the United States.

U.S. Magistrate Judge James K. Bredar scheduled a hearing for Friday in Baltimore to address whether the U.S. government has the authority to detain the former biathlon champion pending extradition to Canada.

Kevin McCants, an attorney representing Bedard, said he was working on an arrangement that would enable his client to return voluntarily to Quebec on Friday to face the charge. McCants said the holidays have made it difficult to negotiate, but he has been in touch with Canadian prosecutors.

"We're hoping to have a deal in place in the next day or so," McCants said.

Bedard, 37, was arrested Friday night in Maryland after U.S. marshals found her and her 12-year-old daughter, Maude, at a Columbia hotel. Bedard, of Quebec, Canada, has been in the custody of U.S. marshals since the arrest. Her daughter is back in the custody of Bedard's ex-husband, Jean Paquet.

Bedard faces up to 10 years in prison on the child abduction charge, but her attorneys contend she didn't break the law.

"She's confident that when these proceedings are over that ... she will be vindicated. She's done nothing wrong," McCants said.

Bedard appeared at her initial appearance in U.S. District Court in Baltimore wearing an orange jail jumpsuit. McCants said Bedard was disappointed she had to remain in custody, but he said she told him she was OK.

"She was fine with it," McCants said. "I think I was more disappointed than anyone."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Philip Jackson argued that Bedard should be detained because she was a flight risk.

Quebec City police obtained an arrest warrant against Bedard on Dec. 8 after Paquet alleged she had taken their daughter away from Quebec City without his permission in violation of a child custody order.

DOJ_NMG_0109317

An arrest warrant for Bedard was first issued from Quebec City, Canada. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police contacted the U.S. Marshals Service and the Capital Area Regional Fugitive Task Force on Dec. 15 to help find Bedard.

When marshals determined she was in the United States, a provisional arrest warrant was obtained on Wednesday. After she was arrested, Bedard was taken to the Howard County Detention Center in Jessup.

John Pepper Jr., an attorney who also is representing Bedard, said Paquet has been unclear about when he wanted to see his daughter.

"We're still waiting for him to come forth and make us aware of which periods he would like," Pepper said.

He also said Paquet was kept informed of where the girl was and that Bedard "feels absolutely devastated by the fact that Mr. Paquet would act in such a manner."

Bedard won two gold medals in the biathlon competition at the Olympic Games in Lillehammer, Norway in 1994. She won a bronze medal in that same event in the 1992 Winter Olympics in Albertville, France.

Bedard has been traveling in the United States with her current common-law spouse, Nima Mazhari, who was at the courthouse Tuesday.

Mazhari has had his own share of legal problems, being charged in 2005 with theft and possession of about 20 stolen paintings worth $100,000.

ID Thief Forges Leniency Letter (PPG)

By Torsten Ove, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, December 27, 2006

Authorities seek man who broke probation terms

A man whose prosecution three years ago was announced as part of an identity theft crackdown dubbed "Operation Identity Crisis" is in trouble again after trying to fool a notoriously no-nonsense federal judge with a forged letter asking for leniency.

U.S. marshals are looking for James M. Lyle, 22, of the West End, who was released from federal prison in May, after he failed to appear Thursday for a probation violation hearing before Senior U.S. District Judge Alan Bloch.

Mr. Lyle, who had more than 3 million credit card numbers on his computer when Pittsburgh police arrested him in 2003, was arrested again last month on new theft charges stemming from an August online purchase of a laptop computer with a stolen credit card.

That new arrest meant he had violated the terms of his probation from his previous federal case, according to a filing by the U.S. Probation Office.

At a hearing before Judge Bloch on Dec. 13, Mr. Lyle admitted the new offense and the judge placed him on home detention until a space opens up for a six-month term at a Downtown halfway house.

At that hearing, Mr. Lyle also presented the judge with a letter purportedly from Timothy Savina, his boss at British Petroleum in Scott where he had been working, indicating that Mr. Lyle was turning his life around and shouldn't go back to jail.

But Assistant U.S. Attorney Brendan Conway thought the letter looked suspicious and asked police to check it out.

"Mr. Savina has indicated that the letter is a forgery," Mr. Conway said in court papers, "that he did not prepare or sign the letter, and that he did not authorize the preparation of the letter."

What's more, Mr. Savina said Mr. Lyle, who was a manager-in-training at BP, got through the company's criminal background check by claiming his felony record was really his father's.

When confronted, Mr. Savina said, Mr. Lyle admitted that he had a friend prepare the letter for him.

"Mr. Lyle has now been terminated from his employment at BP," said Mr. Conway.

After the forgery came to light, Judge Bloch scheduled a new hearing for Dec. 21, at which time there was a good chance Mr. Lyle would go to jail. But Mr. Lyle didn't show and the judge, who has a reputation as the toughest on the federal bench in Pittsburgh, issued a warrant for his arrest.

Michael Novara, Mr. Lyle's public defender, was not available yesterday.

Mr. Lyle had been arrested by Pittsburgh police for credit card theft before 2003, but after another arrest that year authorities decided to lump him together with 11 other defendants as part of "Operation Identity Crisis," a joint effort of the U.S. Justice Department, U.S. Postal Inspectors, Federal Trade Commission, U.S. Secret Service and various banks.

Pittsburgh police had found Mr. Lyle, 19 at the time, in possession of more than 15 counterfeit credit cards, more than 3.1 million American Express card numbers, 158,765 Discover card numbers and 43,000 Visa card numbers.

A federal grand jury indicted him in 2003, he pleaded guilty the following year and Judge Bloch sentenced him to 27 months.

The judge also ordered him to pay $3,549 in restitution to various retailers that he defrauded and not to commit any more crimes.

Kansas Judge Lets Attorney General Press Abortion Case (USAT/AP)

USA Today, December 27, 2006

TOPEKA, Kan. (AP) — A judge agreed Tuesday to let Kansas' attorney general, a vocal abortion opponent, try to persuade him to reinstate charges against a well-known abortion provider.

District Judge Paul W. Clark scheduled a hearing for Wednesday after Attorney General Phill Kline asked him to reconsider his decision to dismiss the case against Dr. George Tiller over a jurisdictional issue.

Kline, who lost his re-election bid in November and leaves office in three weeks, filed 30 misdemeanor counts last week accusing Tiller of illegally performing 15 late-term abortions.

On Friday, Clark dismissed the charges after Sedgwick County District Attorney Nola Foulston argued that Kline didn't have the authority to file the charges.

The judge said he would consider on Wednesday only whether a district court can limit a district attorney's power to dismiss a criminal case and, if there are circumstances allowing a court to intervene, whether they are present in Tiller's case.

Clark said Attorney General-elect Paul Morrison could participate.

Kline, a Republican and staunch abortion opponent, lost the Nov. 7 general election to Morrison, a Democrat.

Kline has been investigating whether Tiller and other abortion providers performed illegal late-term abortions in Kansas or failed to report suspected child abuse as required by law. Earlier this year, he obtained the records of 90 patients from Tiller's clinic and a clinic operated by Planned Parenthood of Kansas and Mid-Missouri.

Tiller's attorneys have contended the charges are groundless.

Kline spokesman Jan Lunsford and Foulston spokeswoman Georgia Cole did not immediately return calls Tuesday seeking comment.

Tiller's clinic, one of the few in the country to perform late-term abortions, has been a high-profile target of abortion opponents for decades. The clinic was bombed in 1985, and Tiller was shot in both arms by a protester in 1993.

Pet Store Owners Find Airline Luggage Lost From International Flights In Houston Trash Bin (AP)

AP, December 27, 2006

HOUSTON: Authorities were trying to figure out how dozens of pieces of luggage belonging to international air travelers ended up in a trash bin behind a Houston pet store.

FBI special agent Rolando Munoz said 68 pieces of luggage from various international flights were discovered. He said the luggage was turned over to Continental Airlines to sort out.

Sgt. Dana Wolfe, a spokeswoman for the Harris County Sheriff's Office, which first responded to the luggage report, said the bags belonged to travelers at George Bush Intercontinental Airport. She said tags on the bags showed some of the travelers were going to or from London and Dubai.

The Houston Police Department is handling the case, Munoz and Wolfe said. A Houston police spokesman had no additional details Tuesday night.

Mary Clark, a spokeswoman for Continental, said she did not know if the contents of the bags were stolen.

"We're going to be investigating and the authorities are going to be investigating," she said, adding that the airline was working with other carriers to match the bags with lost luggage claims. She did not have the names of the other airlines but broadcast reports identified them as Continental Airlines, Lufthansa, British Airways and U.S. Airways.

The owners of a Pet City store found the luggage.

Cybercrooks Deliver Trouble (WP)

By Brian Krebs

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

It was the year of computing dangerously, and next year could be worse.

That is the assessment of computer security experts, who said 2006 was marked by an unprecedented spike in junk e-mail and more sophisticated Internet attacks by cybercrooks.

Few believe 2007 will be any brighter for consumers, who already are struggling to avoid the clever scams they encounter while banking, shopping or just surfing online. Experts say online criminals are growing smarter about hiding personal data they have stolen on the Internet and are using new methods for attacking computers that are harder to detect.

DOJ_NMG_0109319

"Criminals have gone from trying to hit as many machines as possible to focusing on techniques that allow them to remain undetected on infected machines longer," said Vincent Weafer, director of security response at Symantec, an Internet security firm in Cuptertino, Calif.

One of the best measures of the rise in cybercrime is junk e-mail, or spam, because much of it is relayed by computers controlled by Internet criminals, experts said. More than 90 percent of all e-mail sent online in October was unsolicited junk mail, according to Postini, an e-mail security firm in San Carlos, Calif. Spam volumes monitored by Postini rose 73 percent in the past two months as spammers began embedding their messages in images to evade junk e-mail filters that search for particular words and phrases. In November, Postini's spam filters, used by many large companies, blocked 22 billion junk-mail messages, up from about 12 billion in September.

The result is putting pressure on network administrators and corporate technology departments, because junk mail laden with images typically requires three times as much storage space and Internet bandwidth as a text message, said Daniel Druker, Postini's vice president for marketing.

"We're getting an unprecedented amount of calls from people whose e-mail systems are melting down under this onslaught," Druker said.

Spam volumes are often viewed as a barometer for the relative security of the Internet community, in part because most spam is relayed via "bots," a term used to describe personal computers that online criminals have taken control of surreptitiously with computer viruses or worms. The more computers the bad guys control and link together in networks, or botnets, the greater volume of spam they can blast onto the Internet.

At any given time, between 3 million and 4 million compromised computers are active on the Internet, according to Gadi Evron, who managed Internet security for the Israeli government before joining Beyond Security, an Israeli security firm. And that estimate only counts spam bots. Evron said millions of other hijacked computers are used to launch "distributed denial-of-service" attacks -- online shakedowns in which attackers overwhelm Web sites with useless data and demand payment to stop.

"Botnets have become the moving force behind organized crime online, with a low-risk, high-profit calculation," Evron said.

He estimated that organized criminals would earn about $2 billion this year through "phishing" scams, which involve the use of spam and fake Web sites to trick computer users into disclosing their financial and other personal data.

Another trend experts cite is the steady shift of Internet criminal activity from nights and weekends to weekdays, suggesting that online crime is evolving into a full-time profession for many.

Symantec found that the incidence of phishing scams has dropped significantly on Sundays and Mondays in the United States. The firm found a similar trend when it examined the pattern of new virus variants compiled and released by attackers.

"The bulk of the fraud attacks we're seeing now are coming in Monday through Friday, in the 9-to-5 U.S.-workday timeframe," Symantec's Weafer said. "We now have groups of attackers who are motivated by profit and willing to spend the time and effort to learn how to conduct these attacks on a regular basis. For a great many online criminals these days, this is their day job: They're working full time now."

Criminals are also becoming more sophisticated in evading anti-fraud efforts. This year saw the advent and wide deployment of Web-browser based "toolbars" with embedded technology designed to detect when users have visited a known or suspected phishing Web site. But many scam artists responded by developing new methods of hosting their fraudulent Web sites and routing traffic to them that made them harder for law enforcement and security experts to thwart.

"We've seen a pretty big evolutionary jump in tactics used by phishers over the past year, and I believe it's because some of the toolbar makers and the good guys who work to get these scam sites shut down have really done a good job at preventing them from being successful," said Dan Hubbard, vice president of research for Websense, an online security firm in San Diego.

The past 12 months also brought a steep increase in the number of software vulnerabilities discovered by researchers and actively exploited by criminals. The world's largest software maker, Microsoft, this year issued software fixes to 97 security holes that it classified as "critical," meaning hackers could use them to break into vulnerable machines without any action on the part of the user.

In contrast, Microsoft shipped just 37 critical updates in 2005. Fourteen of this year's critical flaws were known as "zero day" threats, meaning Microsoft first learned about the security holes only after criminals had already begun using them.

The year began with a zero-day hole in Microsoft's Internet Explorer, the Web browser of choice for about 80 percent of the world's online users. Criminals were able to exploit the flaw to install keystroke-recording and password-stealing software on millions of computers running Windows software.

At least 11 of those zero-day vulnerabilities were in the Microsoft Office productivity software suites, flaws that bad guys mainly used in targeted attacks against corporations, according to the SANS Internet Storm Center, a security research and training group in Bethesda. Microsoft issued patches to correct a total of 37 critical Office security flaws this year.

The year also was notable for a wave of attacks exploiting flaws in software applications that run on top of operating systems, such as media players and Web browsers. In February, attackers used a security hole in AOL's popular Winamp media player to install a hidden program when users downloaded a seemingly harmless playlist file. This month, a computer worm took advantage of a design flaw in Apple Computer's QuickTime media player to steal passwords from about 100,000 MySpace.com bloggers, accounts that were then hijacked and used for sending spam. Also this month, security experts spotted a computer worm spreading online that was powered by a six-month old hole in a corporate anti-virus product from Symantec.

Many security professionals speak highly of Microsoft's Vista, the newest version of Windows scheduled for release next month. The program includes improvements that should help users stay more secure online, such as a Web browser with new anti-fraud tools, as well as operating system changes that should make it more difficult for rogue software or viruses to make unwanted changes to key system settings and files.

But some security vulnerabilities have been identified in Vista already, including at least one in its new browser, Internet Explorer 7. Moreover, experts worry that businesses will be slow to switch to the new operating system and note that even if consumers adopt it more quickly, Microsoft will continue to battle security holes in legacy versions of its Office product.

Some software security vendors suspect that a new Trojan horse program that surfaced last month, called "Rustock.B," may serve as the template for future malicious software. The program morphs itself slightly each time it installs itself on a new machine in an effort to evade anti-virus software. In addition, it hides in the deepest recesses of the Windows operating system, creates invisible copies of itself, and refuses to work under common security analysis tools in an attempt to defy identification and analysis.

"This is about the nastiest piece of malware we've ever seen, and we're going to be seeing more of it," said Alex Eckelberry, president of the security vendor Sunbelt Software in Clearwater, Fla. "The new threats that we saw in 2006 have shown us that the malware authors are ingenious and creative in their methods."

Leading Cyber-Pirates Of The World (WSJ)

By Paul Mcmanus

The Wall Street Journal, December 27, 2006

There is a new and grave threat to companies selling proprietary wares and services online: Their brand can be tarnished and customers stolen by a keystroke. With the Web now the shopping mall of choice for time-crunched consumers, cyber-thieves are "dressing up" Web sites and tweaking competitors' domain names to capture unsuspecting shoppers.

The more sophisticated scammers are criminals who electronically embed specially coded software programs on the browsers of PCs. Simply clicking on to a Web site link can plant code in a computer that takes command of its browser. These bugs hijack a search and redirect it to a fraudulent site masquerading as the legitimate one. The consumer unwittingly gives away personal and financial information that can be sliced, diced and resold worldwide.

The brand, too, is the victim of this theft. In the luxury hospitality sector, for example, where a hotel's reputation for privacy, personal service and an exceptional experience is a major asset, anything that misleads or defrauds the guest can cause permanent damage. And the consumer can end up paying top dollar for an inferior property. A traveler who believes he's using The Leading Hotels of the World's Web site to make a reservation at a five-star hotel in Paris might be electronically kidnapped and booked at a two-star with a lyrical French name. Everyone loses: The traveler is duped. Our member hotel loses revenue. And in the eyes of that traveler, our brand is robbed of credibility and cachet.

The modus operandi of this breed of pirate is to challenge a long-established company's trademark and Web site domain name -- or simply to ignore it. The brand that's attacked is forced to spend large amounts of time and money registering trademarks and URLs in 50 or 60 countries, or litigating protracted lawsuits. I speak from costly experience: In one case, travelers complained that when they searched for "palace" hotels at our Web site, they were rerouted to a site owned by a South African company that claimed to offer luxury hotels rooms at steep discount. We took legal action and after an eight-year battle won judgment for trademark infringement, shutting down the site.

What's needed is a set of international laws protecting business and consumers against Internet fraud plus a global squad of cyber crime-busters to enforce them. The U.S. has specific computer fraud laws and the FBI takes "thousands of complaints" annually through its Internet Crime Complaint Center (www.ic3.gov). But perpetrators who zero in on businesses like mine often work in countries with no laws protecting Web users and lax or little cooperation with U.S. or other foreign law-enforcement agencies.

Collaboration is the only realistic solution for the private sector to protect brands from online pirates. The global Internet community is already working together through ICANN, the Internet Corporation for Assigned Names and Numbers, a nonprofit that creates and allocates Internet protocol addresses, and resolves disputes over rights to domain names. ICANN is a natural for stepping into the computer crime arena. It has respect, international treaties, a global presence and a solid organizational structure. But don't expect ICANN to wage war all by itself. Those of us in the business world who can't rely on the government for brand protection have to be partners in long battle.

Rapist Preys On Men In Suburban Houston (AP)

By John Porretto, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 27, 2006

A rapist who has struck at least five times since April in and around Baytown has not only spread fear in this working-class community but also piqued the interest of those who study the criminal mind. The reason: He preys on other men.

That makes him something of a rarity in the world of crime.

"It's the least prevalent kind of serial rape, and largely underreported," said Jack Levin, a leading criminologist and director of the Brudnick Center on Violence at Northeastern University in Boston.

Levin and other experts say male-on-male rape sometimes stems from sexual encounters gone bad. But that does not appear to be the case with the rapist in this oil-refining town of 70,000 people about 30 miles east of Houston.

Instead, he methodically identifies and stalks young men and attacks them at gunpoint or knifepoint in or near their homes, according to police Capt. Roger Clifford. Sometimes he robs his victims, too, but rape appears to be the primary motivation, police said.

"This is certainly of interest, an interesting case," Levin said.

The U.S. Justice Department says one in 33 men in the United States has been a victim of a rape or attempted rape, compared with one in six women. Experts say men are far less likely to report a rape to authorities, because they fear being perceived as weak or see the attack as an assault on their masculinity.

In fact, investigators in Baytown fear there may be other victims of the rapist who are too ashamed to come forward.

"There's a lot of emotional damage that goes with being raped, especially when the victims are men," said Lynn Parrish, a spokeswoman for the National Rape, Abuse & Incest National Network. But she added: "The best way to get this rapist off the street is for more people to come forward."

Three of the attacks have occurred in the city, the other two on the outskirts of town. The most recent attack was Nov. 30. Clifford would not give details of the rapes but said at least one victim managed to thwart the attack.

No one has been seriously hurt.

"But it's only going to take one victim who resists enough or in the wrong way until the gun is going to go off, the knife is going to be used, and we're going to have a victim with serious injuries or who's dead," Clifford said.

Criminologists have seen cases of serial killers who raped or otherwise had sex with their male victims - among them, John Wayne Gacy and Jeffrey Dahmer. But psychologically, this is a different phenomenon.

Levin said it is rare for a serial rapist to become a serial killer.

"I think the reason has to do with the absence or presence of a conscience," he said. "A serial rapist is more likely to have a conscience. Otherwise they'd take the life and silence the victim."

Victims have described the Baytown attacker as a clean-shaven black man, 18 to 21 years old, 5-foot-10 to 6 feet tall and about 200 pounds, with a shaved head. Police have released a sketch and are working with the FBI's behavioral sciences unit to develop a psychological profile. DNA testing also is under way.

Fliers with the sketch have been circulated around schools and Baytown's Lee College, with an enrollment of about 6,000.

Jay Ali, an 18-year-old who works at the local mall, said he has been spreading the word among friends. "There's a loose psycho running around raping men," he said.

The local paper, The Baytown Sun, has run the sketch and details of the crimes at the top of its front page nearly every day since the most recent attack, and an electronic bulletin board on its Web site is filled with discussion about the rapes.

"I have selfish reasons for wanting this guy caught," Marie W. wrote in a posting Dec. 12. "I have a son who fits this guy's target group. ... I want him off the streets and locked up like yesterday."

Virginia DNA Review Hobbled (WP)

By Candace Rondeaux

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

A year after Virginia's crime lab launched an unprecedented review of old cases that experts said could free dozens of wrongly convicted people, the project appears to be years from completion, and some are questioning the credentials of the private company selected to do the DNA testing.

DOJ_NMG_0109322

Former Virginia governor Mark R. Warner (D) ordered a full review of the cases last December after an analysis of old evidence revealed that two men were not guilty of sexual assault. Warner pardoned the men, who became part of a wave of exonerations that reignited a national debate over post-conviction DNA testing.

At the time, Virginia crime lab director Paul Ferrara predicted that the retesting project would be completed within two years and could free dozens of innocent inmates. But now, just days from retirement, Ferrara has revised his prediction, saying changes at the lab have stalled progress.

"We got nowhere for a while. It has suffered some delays because of staff turnover," Ferrara said. "But we're as interested and as anxious to see this thing through as everyone else. We could see as many as 30 possible exonerations when this is all over with."

The physical evidence came to light in 2001, when an inmate asserted his innocence under a new state law that for the first time granted the right to request testing of newly discovered evidence more than 21 days after sentencing. Lab analyst Mary Jane Burton, who retired in 1988 and died in 1999, and two other lab workers meticulously preserved pieces of clothing smeared with blood, semen or saliva before DNA testing got underway in the early 1990s. A cursory review of a small sample of Burton's files has exonerated five former convicts.

Earlier this year, legal experts speculated that the retesting effort could be slowed when Ferrara, 64, announced in August plans to retire by the end of this year. Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) has not selected Ferrara's successor, but the state's Forensic Science Board has interviewed several internal and external candidates, and a decision is expected next month, Virginia officials familiar with the process said.

The evidence review entails a painstaking, multi-step process of separating out cases contained in 660 boxes packed with thousands of files from 1973 through 1988, identifying suspects convicted in each case and determining if physical evidence samples can be tested for DNA.

So far, graduate students hired to help with the project have sifted through more than 329,000 cases, Ferrara said. They will sort and index about 234,000 more files held at regional labs across the state before the bulk of the work is done. They have logged 3,135 cases that have some form of biological evidence retained in the file. No DNA tests have been performed on any of the evidence yet, but Ferrara said he hopes to send the first batch out for testing soon.

"It's going to be slow," Ferrara said. "But I think anyone would rather see us proceed cautiously rather than haphazardly."

The slow pace, however, concerns some. Peter Neufeld, co-director of the New York-based Innocence Project, which has helped exonerate more than 170 inmates, lauded the state for launching the review, saying other states should follow Virginia's example. But Neufeld, who said his organization has several cases pending in Virginia, worries that the review isn't moving quickly enough.

"To allow that to drag as long as it has is unfortunate. It undermines the efficacy of what Governor Warner had intended. It slows down the exoneration of innocent Virginians who are languishing in prison," Neufeld said.

The state selected Bode Technology, a private Fairfax County-based lab, to conduct DNA tests on the samples, a contract valued at an estimated $1.4 million. Bode has won several contracts with the state and has been awarded about $9.3 million overall for outsourced work, according to the Virginia Department of Forensic Science.

But Bode's recent dealings with another state crime lab have been rocky. In August 2005, the company made national headlines after the Illinois State Police canceled a $7.7 million contract with Bode because it failed to identify semen on 22 percent of the rape kit samples it was charged with testing.

Edward Blake of Forensic Science Associates in California, a pioneer of DNA testing, said he is skeptical of Bode's ability to handle the retesting effort in Virginia. A longtime critic of Virginia's crime lab, Blake said the dust-up in Illinois raises serious questions about quality control at Bode.

"I wouldn't trust anything that they did -- not after seeing their work on several cases and the problems in Illinois. With Bode especially since they have a long-term contract with the state of Virginia, they are totally motivated not to see a problem," Blake said.

Calls to Bode General Manager and Vice President Maureen Loftus were not returned.

Ferrara said he's confident Bode is up to the task. "Over the course of the last 20 years, people have found occasions to criticize every private and public lab there is," he said. "That's to be expected. We've worked with Bode for a long time and have long experience with them."

Law Mandates Disinterment Of Murderer (WP)

By Tara Bahrampour

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0109323

The remains of a man convicted of murdering an elderly Hagerstown, Md., couple will be removed from Arlington National Cemetery as part of a bill signed into law by President Bush.

Bush signed the $3.2 billion bill, the Veterans Benefits, Health Care and Information Technology Act of 2006, on Friday.

The bill seeks to improve benefits and health care for veterans and their families. It also requires the Secretary of the Army to remove the cremated ashes of Russell Wayne Wagner, who was convicted of murdering Daniel Davis, 84, and Wilda Davis, 80, in 1994.

Vernon G. Davis, son of the murdered couple, said yesterday that he was relieved to hear of the change, which he had worried would never come to pass.

"We just got an extra Christmas present, and I think the whole family's satisfied," he said. "For him to do something like that to Mom and Dad, and then you turn around and honor him like that, it was completely wrong."

"Arlington Cemetery is reserved as a place of honor for men and women who have served their nation in the armed services. It is appropriate to remove the remains of individuals, who, by their own criminal actions, have brought dishonor to themselves and the memory of their service," said Tony Frato, a White House spokesman.

Wagner died in early 2005 of a heroin overdose while serving two life sentences. An Army private who served during the Vietnam War and was honorably discharged in 1972, Wagner was eligible for parole at the time of his death, which made him eligible for an Arlington service. He was buried with honors in August 2005.

But after publicity about the case and pressure from the couple's family and Sens. Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho), Barbara A. Mikulski (D-Md.) and Ken Salazar (D-Colo.), the case was revisited.

Congress passed a law in 1997 barring people convicted of capital crimes from being buried in a national cemetery, a law designed to block the possibility of Oklahoma City bomber Timothy McVeigh, a veteran, being buried at Arlington.

But some veterans have been reluctant to support too many restrictions, worrying that too broad a law might bar too many people.

Backwoods Celebrity Faces Long Prison Term For Incest (WP)

By Blaine Harden

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

Robert Hale, a Bible-toting father of 15 who calls himself Papa Pilgrim, became an anti-government celebrity in Alaska by driving a bulldozer across a national park that encircles his land.

The Lord told him that using the bulldozer to clear 14 miles of derelict road through the park was a loving thing to do, Hale said in an interview three years ago.

"In order for me to love my children, I have to be a provider," Hale said then, explaining that he needed the bulldozer to fetch supplies for his children, whom he and his wife were home-schooling in an ultra-strict Christian way.

He said his children read only the Bible, always bathed with their clothes on and were not allowed to see one another naked.

Yesterday in a Palmer, Alaska, courtroom, Hale, 65, answered very different questions about his behavior and his family: He pleaded no contest to multiple charges that he raped one of his daughters.

The plea, which came three weeks before Hale was to face trial on 27 felony charges of rape, incest and coercion, punctuates an implausible saga that stretches from Texas to the outback of eastern Alaska. It is a story by turns picaresque, outrageous and sad.

Hale and his now-estranged wife, Kurina, who calls herself Country Rose, and their children, who all have names from the Bible, bought a 410-acre ranch inside Wrangell-St. Elias National Park, the largest national park in the United States.

Much of the money for the $450,000 purchase in 2002 came from the Alaska permanent fund dividend. It is an oil-funded annual payment that this year was worth $1,107 to each state resident. After Hale and his family moved to Alaska in 1998, the dividend provided the onetime subsistence farmers -- who also earned money performing gospel music -- with more cash than they had ever had.

The ranch, which they named Hillbilly Heaven, is an in-holding, which means it is surrounded by federal land controlled by the National Park Service. Under the 1980 law that established much of the vast national park system in Alaska, in-holders are guaranteed "reasonable and feasible" access to their property.

Hale's bulldozer romp stretched that guarantee beyond the breaking point. The Park Service cited Hale for violating federal law.

But land-rights activists, who in Alaska and across the West have complained for decades about persnickety law enforcement in and around federal parks, adopted Hale and his family as camera-ready symbols of America's frontier spirit.

DOJ_NMG_0109324

They could sing, they made their own clothes, and Papa was handy with a sound bite. He accused the federal government of trying to starve his family. "It is like the Alamo," he said.

"We are going to make the Pilgrims poster children for abuse of federal power," Chuck Cushman, executive director of the American Land Rights Association, said in 2003.

With land-rights activists footing the legal bills, Hale's challenge to federal authority went all the way to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit in San Francisco. This February, a three-judge panel ruled against the family, although the court said in the fall that it might take another look at the case.

To drum up publicity for the court challenge, Hale and his handlers from the land-rights movement invited me and other reporters to spend the night at Hillbilly Heaven in the late summer of 2003.

In the course of a long evening spent with his children and his wife, who listened to Hale in worshipful silence, it seemed that he held a cultlike control over his family. None of the older children, several of whom were in their 20s, wanted or needed any life outside the family, Hale said then. He said they were all virgins.

Hale, it turned out, had had an extraordinarily odd life before bringing his family to Alaska.

He grew up affluent in Fort Worth, the son of I.B. Hale, an All-America tackle at Texas Christian University who in 1939 was the first-round draft pick of the Washington Redskins.

While in high school, Robert Hale eloped to Florida in 1958 with Kathleen Connally, the 16-year-old daughter of John B. Connally; Connally was to become governor of Texas and was wounded when President John F. Kennedy was assassinated. Shortly thereafter, she died of a shotgun blast to the face, an apparent suicide that Hale said occurred while he was with her in a hotel room.

In the 1970s, when Hale called himself "Sunstar" and lived as a hippie, he met Kurina Rose Bresler, then 16. They moved with their first two children to a subsistence farm in New Mexico on land owned by actor Jack Nicholson. They lived there for more than 20 years, tanning leather, breeding dogs and antagonizing many neighbors. It was there they became born-again Christians, Hale said.

But it was in Alaska, after the celebrated bulldozer ride and while Hale's lawsuit was still rattling through the federal court system, that family life exploded.

Hale was indicted in the fall of 2005, accused of raping and abusing an unnamed daughter, and he fled the area where he had lived with his family. After a two-week manhunt he was arrested without incident, and he has been in jail since.

Until last week, Hale had been expected to contest the charges against him. In a trial, his wife and many of his children would have testified against him.

In the end, he made a deal. Hale, a diabetic in poor health, pleaded no contest and will receive a sentence of at least 14 years in prison.

Maryland's Death Penalty (WP)

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

THE MARYLAND COURT of Appeals has thrown a big wrench into the state's already anemic death penalty enforcement. It ruled last week that Maryland's procedures for lethal injection were adopted without adequate legislative oversight. With that ruling, which will effectively halt executions until new procedures are adopted, the Maryland court joined what is fast becoming a national trend. Earlier this month, Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R) halted executions there after a botched lethal injection took over half an hour. A court in California blocked use of that state's execution cocktail. Nationally, there have been fewer executions this year than in any in the past decade -- and delays associated with challenges to lethal-injection protocols, which are now said to cause significant pain, constitute one of the reasons for the low figure.

For those of us who oppose capital punishment, any public debate that slows the wheels of death is a good thing. That said, this issue seems more than a little absurd. Leaving aside the technicalities of Maryland administrative law, it is a little tough to understand why states that have no scruples about killing people as punishment for their crimes might blanch at a brief period of discomfort for the condemned along the way. This is, after all, the intentional infliction of death; why should anyone expect it to be pretty? The sudden scruples around the country about the fact that taking human life may actually involve pain can only be understood as a surrogate for the real issue: whether Americans want to be taking life at all.

In some states this question is still taboo. Getting rid of the death penalty is all but unthinkable in Virginia, for example. But Maryland is different. Its death penalty has been used only five times since the Supreme Court reinstated capital punishment in 1976. It plays only the most incidental role in the state's criminal justice system -- so incidental, ironically, that its use creates wild regional and racial disparities in the administration of justice. Executions have been suspended in the past. Were the death penalty abolished in Maryland, almost nobody would miss it.

DOJ_NMG_0109325

The Maryland court action is therefore an opportunity for a much broader discussion of the utility, justice, necessity and morality of capital punishment. It comes at a propitious moment. Incoming governor Martin O'Malley (D) personally opposes the death penalty. He did not appear inclined to dismiss the court ruling as a mere technicality -- which, formally speaking, is all it really is. That's good. Maryland doesn't need a big debate about how it kills people, but the time is ripe to debate whether it should stop.

FBI Says Files In Leak Cases Are 'Missing' (NYS)

By Josh Gerstein, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, December 27, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — The FBI is missing nearly a quarter of its files relating to investigations of recent leaks of classified information, according to a court filing the bureau made last week.

In response to a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit, the FBI said it identified 94 leak investigations since 2001, but that the investigative files in 22 of those cases "are missing" and cannot be located. "There is no physical slip of paper on the shelf which indicates that the file has been charged out to a particular FBI employee, so therefore there is no way of knowing where the file may actually be," an official in the bureau's records division, Peggy Bellando, wrote in a December 22 declaration.

"That's an amazing number," an academic who has studied the FBI's record-keeping procedures, Athan Theoharis of Marquette University, said in an interview yesterday. "These are very sensitive investigations. ... They could be called to account for whether they are monitoring reporters. These are records that should be handled very well."

Over the past decade, the FBI has waged an epic struggle to computerize and automate its records systems. The agency abandoned a $170 million "Virtual Case File" project last year after years of Congressional hearings and critical evaluations led to the conclusion that the system would never be implemented successfully.

One frequent critic of government database programs, Barry Steinhardt of the American Civil Liberties Union, said that record makes it understandable that a substantial proportion of the leak files would be mislaid.

"It's par for the course," Mr. Steinhardt said. He noted that the Justice Department has already put about 1 million case records into a database, called OneDOJ, that is being made widely available even though the files may contain unverified or erroneous data. "They want to distribute it to law enforcement in every city in the United States, but here the FBI can't manage its own files," the critic said.

Ms. Bellando's declaration said the 22 missing files pertain to 51 cases listed as closed and not to 43 other leak cases listed as pending.

Last month, a federal judge in San Francisco, Maxine Chesney, ordered the FBI and other agencies to respond by Friday to this reporter's requests for information on the frequency and outcome of leak probes. The requests followed a spate of high-profile federal investigations into press leaks, including a special prosecutor's inquiry into the leak of a CIA operative's identity, as well as a separate case in which two pro-Israel lobbyists and a Defense Department analyst were indicted for trafficking in classified information.

The Justice Department, the FBI, the CIA, and the Department of Defense told Judge Chesney last week that they will be unable to meet the court-imposed deadline and need as many as 120 additional days to complete work on the requests, which were filed in March.

A spokeswoman for the FBI, Catherine Milhoan, said she could not comment on the ongoing litigation, but noted that the records search is continuing and has been complicated by procedures for handling classified materials. She also said all hope for recovering the missing files is not lost. "It doesn't mean there aren't other avenues in place to locate those documents," she said.

Mr. Theoharis, a professor emeritus of history, said that in the 1960s the FBI used procedures known as "do not file" and "summary memoranda" to avoid placing files in the central records system. As a result, he said, the bureau would tell judges or members of Congress that searches turned up no records, when files actually existed in a secondary system.

"There's no reason to think they're not doing the same thing today," Mr. Theoharis said. "I don't want to sound conspiratorial but I don't think one can discount this."

Seracare Wins Court Approval to Send Bankruptcy Reorganization Plan to Creditors for Vote

DOJ_NMG_0109326

WASHINGTON (AP) -- SeraCare Life Sciences Inc., which makes medical supplies from blood plasma, has won court approval to send its shareholder-backed bankruptcy plan to creditors for a vote.

Judge Louise DeCarl Adler of the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in San Diego on Thursday signed off on the biotechnology company's disclosure statement, which outlines its plan to exit Chapter 11 through a rights offering to existing shareholders.

Under bankruptcy law, a judge must approve such a statement before a company can send its plan to creditors for a vote.

A group of SeraCare shareholders, led by hedge fund Harbinger Capital Partners, has agreed to backstop a $20.2 million rights offering that would finance the company's bankruptcy exit. The group holds over 30 percent of SeraCare's common stock.

Shareholders, last in line for repayment in a Chapter 11 case, will get one share in the reorganized company for each share they own, along with the right to participate in the rights offering, which will offer shares at $4.75 each. Options and warrants will be reinstated after SeraCare emerges from bankruptcy.

Harbinger will also buy SeraCare's bank debt and allow it to use the cash collateral securing the debt without paying default interest through June 2007.

Votes on SeraCare's reorganization plan are due Jan. 31. Judge Adler scheduled a confirmation hearing on the plan for Feb. 15.

The company reached a deal with the shareholders after scrapping a management-backed plan to issue $25 million in unsecured notes ultimately convertible into common stock at a rate of $5.50 a share.

Under the terms of the proposed Chapter 11 plan, SeraCare will pay all of its debt, including settlements with the government and with shareholders stemming from securities-fraud claims, in full.

The Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department have been investigating SeraCare, which on March 15 announced it would restate its financial results for the first three quarters of 2005. SeraCare's chairman, chief executive and financial chief were fired in March, just before the company filed for bankruptcy protection.

Its stock was subsequently delisted from trading on Nasdaq. In over-the-counter trading Tuesday afternoon, the shares rose 5 cents to $6.10.

The company was formerly headquartered in Oceanside, Calif., but has since moved its operations to West Bridgewater, Mass.

Small Businesses Fight Fickle Rules (NYT)

By Ron Nixon

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

In 1995, Joseph N. Cooper won a multiyear contract worth up to $8 million to do public relations for the Immigration and Naturalization Service. He received the contract through a Small Business Administration program established to increase opportunities for small companies.

But not long after the work was under way, the deal was awarded instead to three multimillion-dollar companies, which were listed as disadvantaged in contract documents. After years of trying to win the contract back, Mr. Cooper filed a false-claims lawsuit against the companies, asserting that they had committed fraud by saying they were small businesses.

This year, to Mr. Cooper and his lawyer's surprise, the court ruled that although evidence showed the companies were indeed not small businesses, fraud had not been committed because the I.N.S. knew their true status when the work was awarded to the companies — J. Walter Thompson, the Bernard Hodes Group and Cass Communications.

The case was dismissed.

"We were floored," Mr. Cooper said in an interview. "The ruling essentially said that I was right, the companies were not small, but so what."

That experience points to the kind of Catch-22 world that some small-business owners face when they challenge the awarding of government contracts.

Many studies have shown that hundreds of government contracts set aside for small business are being awarded to large corporations. Federal laws provide several mechanisms that allow small-business owners who suspect that contracts have been awarded to large companies to protest.

But small-business owners say that the rules in many cases impose nearly impossible standards on them. Even if they do succeed in protesting an award, they say, and prove that federal agencies are intentionally awarding small-business contracts to big companies, there are almost no penalties. Often, the large companies get to keep the contacts.

"It's a hollow victory," said Raul Espinosa, a small-business owner in Florida who has won several protests. "You might win the size protest, but you can't claim the contract because the agency allowed delivery to take place and what's worse, the penalties for the violations aren't enforced."

Mr. Espinosa is leading a coalition of six small-business associations seeking to change the process.

DOJ_NMG_0109327

Congress may be more receptive to their calls for change next year, when two longtime critics of the practice assume leadership positions for the committees overseeing small business.

Senator John F. Kerry, Democrat of Massachusetts and the incoming chairman of the Committee on Small Business and Entrepreneurship, has proposed giving the S.B.A. more time to complete size determinations and to help prevent big businesses from slipping under the radar of a bureaucratic contracting process.

The S.B.A. recently required businesses to report their size every five years. Mr. Kerry's proposal would make the reports annual.

"The protest process is supposed to keep the system honest, but what's the point of protesting a contract if nothing happens?" Senator Kerry said

Nydia M. Velázquez, Democrat of New York and the incoming chairwoman of the House Small Business Committee, said she would work to rectify the problems faced by Mr. Cooper and other small businesses by ensuring that there is an effective protest system in place. She also wants to make sure that penalties are enforced.

"The fact that large businesses are being awarded with small-business contracts, and that there is no system in place with penalties or consequences for this, is extremely concerning," Ms. Velázquez said.

If a small-business owner believes that a company has been illegally awarded a small-business contract the owner has several options in protesting the award.

The first is to file a so-called size protest with the S.B.A., asserting that the competitor is too big.

Under this process, a company has five days after being notified of a winning bidder to initiate the protest. If the agency decides that the winning company is not small, it can recommend that the contract be rescinded.

But that almost never happens, Mr. Espinosa says.

Last year, Mr. Espinosa protested an Air Force contract, offering documentation showing that the winning company was actually a subsidiary of a larger concern, and thus ineligible.

At first, the S.B.A. ruled that the company was a small business, but Mr. Espinosa appealed the decision to the agency's Office of Hearings and Appeals and an administrative law judge ruled in his favor. Despite the ruling, the winner kept the contract.

"There needs to be some reform in the size protest system," Mr. Espinosa said. "Otherwise, why should small-business owners bother and why would large companies worry about getting caught?"

The S.B.A. said it could only recommend that contracts be rescinded and could not compel other agencies to follow the recommendation.

Albert B. Krachman, a lawyer at the firm of Blank Rome in Washington, who has represented small businesses, said, "The system is basically set up in such a way that the policing is left up to the businesses themselves."

What's more, he said, "There is no incentive from the contracting officers or other government officials to see if the companies they are giving small business set-asides to are indeed small-business concerns."

Gary M. Jackson, assistant administrator for size standards at the S.B.A., agrees that the policing of the small-business contracting system is left up to competitors, but asserts that they are in a better position than contracting officers to know which is a small business and which is not.

Another remedy for small businesses is through the courts.

As Mr. Cooper did, small-business owners can file lawsuits asserting that fraud was committed in the awarding of set-aside contracts to large businesses. But legal specialists say the filing false-claims lawsuits can be a costly undertaking. The law also contains several legal hurdles that make it almost impossible to win, they say.

Mr. Cooper said that he was convinced that a lawsuit was his only hope.

At first, Mr. Cooper and his lawyer argued in the Court of Federal Claims that the I.N.S. had not operated in good faith when it stopped giving him work on the contract.

The I.N.S. said it was not satisfied with Mr. Cooper's work and the cost associated with it. But in a deposition, a contacting officer at the agency said no evidence was ever offered to him questioning the quality of Mr. Cooper's work. A government audit found that the cost was actually reasonable.

Still, the court sided with the I.N.S. and said that because the agency had given Mr. Cooper the minimum amount on the contract there was no evidence the agency had not operated in good faith. Mr. Cooper appealed the ruling, but an appeals court upheld the lower court ruling.

Mr. Cooper and his lawyer then filed a lawsuit in the Federal District Court for the District of Columbia. They argued that the two companies that had been awarded contracts to complete the work that Mr. Cooper's firm had originally been awarded had committed fraud when they said that they were disadvantaged businesses.

DOJ_NMG_0109328

A lawyer for the companies, Bruce M. Ginsberg of the law firm of Davis and Gilbert in New York, denies that they ever misstated their size to the I.N.S. “These are multimillion-dollar companies,” Mr. Ginsberg said. “They would not represent themselves as small businesses. We have no idea how they came to be marked that way in the I.N.S. documents.”

Among the evidence offered by Mr. Cooper were contract documents in which the companies were described as disadvantaged and a Justice Department investigative report showing that the companies had verbally confirmed their disadvantaged status with an officer at the I.N.S., though both companies were two of the largest advertising firms in the country.

“We thought we had a slam-dunk,” said Cyrus Phillips, a lawyer doing pro bono work for Mr. Cooper.

But when the judge ruled otherwise, he not only dismissed the case but also ordered Mr. Cooper to pay legal fees and other expenses to the companies he had sued.

Mr. Cooper said the ruling was a fatal blow to his personal and professional life. The legal bills he incurred have left him bankrupt and out of work.

“I did nothing wrong and tried to point out that the government was intentionally giving set-asides to large companies, and I’m the one who pays for it,” Mr. Cooper said. “I wish I’d never done business with the federal government.”

Courts Seek New Ways To Handle Mentally Ill Criminal Defendants (AP)

AP, December 27, 2006

CLEVELAND - A program in Cuyahoga County courts, started in response to concerns mirrored in the justice system nationwide, aims to better understand and deal more efficiently with people who are mentally ill.

The county and several other communities across Ohio have established mental health courts to specifically handle such defendants. In the Cleveland-area program, some municipal and common pleas judges oversee mental health cases and try to place defendants with psychological problems into court-supervised treatment programs.

"We're not dealing with a high population of people with really good, secure home lives," Municipal Judge Kathleen Keough said. "We get people whose life has been in upheaval for years and who don't know any of their rights. No stability. Nobody really to count on."

In the past, those awaiting trial who showed signs of mental illnesses, such as depression or schizophrenia, tended to stay in jail two to three times longer than others while officials determined if they were competent to stand trial. Because those people might need close supervision and daily medications, the cost of keeping them behind bars can be as much as double that for others.

The program in Cuyahoga County sprang from an initiative started three years ago to try to better handle mentally ill defendants.

"The goal is to have a place where police can bring someone who needs evaluation or stabilization so they don't languish in jail," said Shaker Heights Municipal Judge K.J. Montgomery, who heads the initiative.

Recent studies indicate that mental disorders affect one of every four adults in the United States. Yet a recent U.S. Department of Justice study found that more than half the inmates in the nation's prisons and jails have mental health problems.

Part of that can be traced to fewer psychiatric hospitals, said Dr. Philip J. Resnick, director of forensic psychiatry at Case Western Reserve University. In 1960, more than 550,000 people were in psychiatric hospitals throughout the country, Resnick said. With the closing of many of the hospitals, that number has dropped to about 70,000.

The Bureau of Justice Assistance, part of the U.S. Justice Department, helps to administer the federal government's Mental Health Courts Program. The program funds projects that seek to improve the way courts help adults with mental disabilities or illnesses. Mental health courts generally deal with nonviolent offenders.

More than 150 of these courts exist and more are being planned, according to the bureau's Web site.

Cuyahoga County Common Pleas Judge Mary Jane Boyle, one of five Cuyahoga County judges overseeing cases with mentally ill defendants, said most crimes committed by the mentally ill happen when the person is not taking medications.

Corey Miller, a coordinator for Recovery Resources, a nonprofit group that provides mental health programs and services throughout northeast Ohio, said many of the inmates tell him they got into trouble either because they cannot afford to pay for their medications or they find it easier to cope with their illnesses by turning to drugs or alcohol.

Keough said the mental health dockets give defendants a chance to get help.

"Sometimes the best thing to happen to them," she said, "is when they get into court."

ANTITRUST:

Delta's Antitrust Objections To Merger May Be Overstated (DEAL)

By Cecile Kohrs Lindell, The Deal

The Deal, December 27, 2006

Delta Airlines Inc. is using the looming specter of antitrust regulation as a key reason to fight an $8.5 billion takeover bid from US Airways Group Inc., but antitrust experts say Delta's argument is exaggerated.

The airline's Dec. 19 warning about the antitrust risks titled, "Proposed US Airways/Delta Merger Would Be Highly Anticompetitive" begins with a statement that the two airlines have "overlapping networks."

While it is true that the two nationwide carriers compete in many routes, the notion that antitrust problems make the deal a nonstarter "is just silly," according to a former government antitrust official.

The Department of Justice "is clearly going to look at this, and it's probably going to take four to five months," but Delta's warning that the review will take a year is not correct, according to the lawyer who asked that his name not be used.

In a Dec. 21 response to Delta's antitrust analysis, US Air acknowledges that some shuttle services between New York and Washington would have to be sold off, and that there are competitive problems with flights between Cincinnati and Charlotte, N.C., as well as Cincinnati and Philadelphia. Two city pair overlaps, according to US Air, is a far cry from the alarmist Delta report that identified more than 30 overlapping city pairs.

The key issue now is how US Air can proceed because Delta is in bankruptcy. Under bankruptcy rules, US Air can't launch a hostile bid for its competitor, but it can lobby creditors to put pressure on Delta.

"Delta can pursue multiple, parallel paths to emerge from bankruptcy," he said.

One path could be joining with US Air to file premerger notification forms with the government, which would initiate an in-depth official review. That review would give the parties, and the bankruptcy judge, a clear view of what divestitures would be required to get the deal done.

A group of creditors already formed the Unofficial Committee of Unsecured Claimholders of Delta Air Lines Inc., which represents some $2.25 billion of unsecured debt. That group said "it expects Delta to consider methodically, proactively and fairly strategic alternatives to its proposed standalone Chapter 11 plan to ensure that creditor recoveries are maximized in the Chapter 11 process."

If that group -- or other creditors -- "somehow, through some means, can force Delta to make the HSR filings" the murky antitrust issues would likely clear up in a few weeks, the lawyer said.

McClatchy Co. Flagship Newspaper Star Tribune Sold To Private Equity Group For $530 Million (FINDLAW/AP)

By Joshua Freed, Ap Business Writer

AP, December 27, 2006

(AP) - MINNEAPOLIS-Newspaper publisher The McClatchy Co. said on Tuesday that it will sell its flagship newspaper Star Tribune to a private equity firm for $530 million (â,¬401.8 million), a sharp drop from the $1.2 billion (â,¬910 million) it paid to acquire the newspaper just eight years ago.

McClatchy said it decided to sell the newspaper to Avista Capital Partners through a private bidding process "after a strategic reevaluation of its portfolio of holdings" following McClatchy's purchase of Knight Ridder for $4.5 billion (â,¬3.4 billion) earlier this year.

McClatchy faces a large tax bill from selling off 12 other newspapers earlier this year as part of its purchase of Knight Ridder. It said the tax benefit of selling the Star Tribune at a loss is worth $160 million (â,¬121.3 million), raising the total value of the deal to $690 million (â,¬523 million). McClatchy said it would use the money to pay down its Knight Ridder debt.

McClatchy chairman and CEO Gary Pruitt said in a written statement that the Star Tribune "is a profitable business that has generated significant returns for the company over the years. However, as we continue to analyze our business following the Knight Ridder acquisition, it became clear that selling the Star Tribune strengthens McClatchy's competitive position."

"This deal came about because of very specific conditions involving the Star Tribune and today's changing media landscape. We have no plans to sell any other newspapers," Pruitt said in an e-mail to McClatchy employees.

Avista does not own any other daily newspapers. It was founded in 2005 by seven former partners and nine former professionals from DLJ Merchant Banking Partners, the private equity affiliate of Credit Suisse Group, according to the statement announcing the sale.

DOJ_NMG_0109330

"Avista is a company that believes in the future of newspapers and is strongly committed to the success of the Star Tribune," Publisher and President Keith Moyer told Star Tribune employees in an e-mail.

"I have had the opportunity to get to know Avista leadership quite well recently, and I can say this without hesitation: They are progressive, very smart, good-hearted people who believe that no other media platform can reach a local audience as effectively as newspapers and their product extensions," Moyer wrote.

Moyer said he would report to Chris Harte, a member of Avista's executive advisory board, who will also be named the newspaper's chairman.

Newspaper industry analyst John Morton found the sale "inexplicable and disappointing."

"The Minneapolis Star Tribune has a good reputation, has always had a good reputation. It is the kind of newspaper that you would have hoped a company like McClatchy would continue to own," he said.

"Clearly what is happening to McClatchy is that they are much more concerned about their overall financial performance than they are about publishing newspapers, the way I read it," Morton said.

Associated Press Writer Brian Bakst contributed to this report.

Private-Equity Group Taps Veteran Lobbyist (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, December 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A group of major private-equity firms has tapped a former videogame lobbyist to lead a trade group to promote the industry's interests here.

The Private Equity Council, set to begin operations early next year, said in a statement that Douglas Lowenstein will serve as its first president and chief executive officer. To take the post, he is stepping down as president of the Entertainment Software Association, which represents the U.S. videogame industry.

Private-equity firms typically buy controlling stakes in companies in the hopes of quickly cashing out, either through a stock offering or by selling them to competitors or other private-equity firms at a profit.

The private-equity trade group has been in the works for a year, as a vehicle to highlight the positive side of takeover deals for lawmakers, government officials and others.

In its statement, the PEC said it plans to be a "leading advocate for the domestic and international private-equity industry as well as a resource for those seeking to better understand the industry's role in the rapidly evolving global economy."

Members of the council include Apollo Management, Bain Capital Partners LLC, Blackstone Group, Carlyle Group LP, Hellman & Friedman LLC, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co., Madison Dearborn Partners LLC, Providence Equity Partners Inc., Silver Lake Partners, Texas Pacific Group and Thomas H. Lee Partners LP.

As the size of the industry has grown -- by some estimates, available capital managed by private-equity firms exceeds $700 billion -- the industry has faced resistance in Washington and in foreign capitals. Chinese and some European governments, in particular, have made it more difficult for private-equity firms to take over local companies.

Mr. Lowenstein, 55 years old, has headed the entertainment software group and its predecessor organization, the Interactive Digital Software Association, since 1994. According to National Journal, a magazine here covering lobbying and public policy and which compiles a comprehensive list on lobbyist activities every two years, Mr. Lowenstein received about $800,000 a year in salary and compensation in his current post.

Private Funds Prepare To Lobby (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

Some top private-equity funds have joined to form a lobbying organization to head off potential regulation.

The funds have become some of the most active purchasers of U.S. corporations, pooling money from private investors and companies and augmenting those sums with loads of debt. More than 28 percent of the dollar value of acquisitions announced in the United States this year involved private-equity firms, up from 3 percent five years ago, according to Dealogic.

The new organization, the Private Equity Council, is backed by such leaders in the burgeoning business of company buyouts as Blackstone Group, Carlyle Group and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts. Douglas Lowenstein, president of the Entertainment Software Association, which represents the U.S. video game industry, will head the trade association.

The move is the latest effort by the financial services industry to bolster its presence in Washington. The association that represents hedge funds, the Managed Funds Association, recently added to its staff, and the Securities Industry Association and the Bond Market Association merged this year to form what they hope will be a more influential lobby. The combined organization is the Securities Industry and Financial Markets Association, or SIFMA.

In late spring, several of the nation's largest private-equity firms started to discuss creating a lobby group. The decision was precipitated by recognition that they were becoming the target of tough criticism in the United States and in Europe; in Germany, for instance, a state governor referred to private-equity firms as "locusts."

Carlyle, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and other firms were sued last month by investors who claimed they conspired to hold down the amounts they pay for companies. A regulator in Britain is also investigating market abuse in private-equity transactions.

Private-equity firms collect large pools of funds from wealthy individuals, pension funds, college endowments and other sources and use the proceeds, along with loans, to buy all or large parts of companies. Hedge funds also amass money from similar sources but engage in usually shorter-term investments in such things as stocks and bonds.

Both are lightly regulated by the government, and that has caught the attention of lawmakers and senior officials in the executive branch, including those in the Securities and Exchange Commission. Christopher Cox, chairman of the SEC, has been pressing for more oversight of hedge funds, for example, which is now a $1 trillion industry.

The core group of firms behind the Private Equity Council are Blackstone, Carlyle, KKR and Texas Pacific Group. Initially, the association will consist of 15 to 20 firms and will be staffed by Lowenstein and a small group of senior people who will focus on commissioning research about the private-equity industry and its benefits to the economy.

Lowenstein could not be reached for comment yesterday, but in statement the council said it "will become a leading advocate for the domestic and international private equity industry as well as a resource for those seeking to better understand the industry's role in the rapidly evolving global economy."

Carlyle, Blackstone, Buyout Firms Form Lobby Group (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Brett Cole

Bloomberg, December 27, 2006

Dec. 26 (Bloomberg) -- Buyout firms including Carlyle Group and Blackstone Group LP formed the industry trade association Private Equity Council in Washington today as regulators increase their scrutiny.

Douglas Lowenstein was appointed chief executive officer, a group of buyout firms said in a statement. Lowenstein is now president of the Entertainment Software Association, which represents the U.S. video-game industry.

Private-equity firms and management have announced a record $718 billion of takeovers in 2006, Bloomberg data show. Carlyle, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and other firms were sued in November by investors who claim they conspired to hold down prices they pay when buying companies. The U.K. market regulator also is researching market abuse in private-equity transactions.

The council ``will become a leading advocate for the domestic and international private equity industry as well as a resource for those seeking to better understand the industry's role in the rapidly evolving global economy," according to the statement.

Other members of the council include Apollo Management LP, Bain Capital LLC, Hellman & Friedman, Madison Dearborn Partners LLC, Providence Equity Partners, Silver Lake Partners, Texas Pacific Group, Thomas H. Lee Partners LP and KKR.

Lowenstein is traveling today and unavailable for comment, said Daniel Shapiro, a spokesman for the Private Equity Council.

Club Deals

Shareholders filed a suit in New York on Nov. 15 claiming they were shortchanged because private-equity firms tempered bidding for leveraged buyouts such as the $33 billion takeover of hospital chain HCA Inc., the largest LBO ever.

So-called club deals, where firms team up to make offers, broke antitrust laws, said investors, who are seeking unspecified damages. Before the suit, the Justice Department said it was investigating possible antitrust behavior.

Private-equity firms have come under fire in Europe for loading up target companies with debt while recouping costs with fees and dividends.

The U.K.'s Financial Services Authority said last month it's monitoring loans that banks are extending to fund leveraged buyouts on concern excessive debt may risk the stability of the nation's financial markets. Leverage reached a 10-year high in Europe in April, when buyout firms borrowed the equivalent of six times the annual cash generated by the companies they acquired, according to Standard & Poor's.

Buyout firms use their own funds and debt secured on the companies they acquire to pay for takeovers. They typically seek to expand companies or improve their performance before selling them within five years to other investors.

Texas Pacific Tops Buy-outs With $101bn (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0109332

By Peter Smith In London

Financial Times, December 27, 2006

Texas Pacific Group has beaten Blackstone and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts to become the world's most prolific buy-out group in 2006, notching up 17 deals with an aggregate value of just over $101bn.

The figures reflect an extraordinary year for private equity in which the value of announced deals has risen to a record $700bn, more than double the record set in 2005 and 20 times bigger than in 1996, according to Thomson Financial, the data provider.

The wave of private equity deal activity, accounting for nearly one-fifth of all global mergers and acquisitions, has helped underpin a huge rise in the value of stock markets globally.

TPG notched up high-profile deals across the world, including Australia's Qantas airline, Las Vegas casino giant Harrah's, and Univision, the US's largest Spanish-language broadcaster. No other buy-out group has ever done more than $100bn worth of deals in a single year, a coup for TPG in an environment where being known as the biggest buy-out group helps open doors to the financing community and company boardrooms.

Blackstone, which topped the US league table, took part in global deals worth $93bn, while KKR, number one in Europe, managed a world total of $78bn. Bain Capital took part in $85bn worth of deals.

The US also regained its crown from Europe as the world's most active private equity market, recording $403bn of announced deals, treble that of 2005.

Charlie Bott, co-head of Goldman Sachs' financial sponsors group, said the US figure had been driven up primarily by a number of very large US deals, including HCA, the hospital group, Equity Office Partners, the real estate company, and Freescale Semiconductors.

Most of the large US deals were bought off the public markets by buy-out groups working in teams.

William Maltby, head of leveraged finance and financial sponsors at Deutsche Bank, said the climate in Europe for so-called take-privates had been harsher. "It has been very tough to buy listed businesses in Europe, especially the UK," he said. "Once you start targeting companies that are perceived as national champions, the outcome for private equity bidders becomes political and random.

"We still don't quite know what the upper end of the deal range is. Getting the capital together for a €10bn [$13.1bn] deal is relatively easy, even €30bn. But making the deal happen is the tough part."

The private equity boom is expected to continue, fuelled by unprecedented liquidity in the debt markets, huge capital raisings by the buy-out funds, deal opportunities in industries in need of restructuring or consolidation, and companies ripe for takeover in less mature markets.

However, Mr Bott had mixed views on the outlook. "I don't think the market will carry on being as robust for the whole of next year as it is today.

"We could be sitting here in one year's time saying the outlook for 2008 is less strong than it was for 2007."

¦ A dozen of the largest US private equity groups, including TPG, yesterday announced that Douglas Lowenstein, a lobbyist for the video-game industry and president of the Entertainment Software Association, would lead their newly-formed trade association in Washington. The Private Equity Council aims to improve the industry's image of buy-out firms amid the dealmaking boom.

"The active investment approach taken by private equity firms . . . has had a profound and positive impact on job growth, industry competitiveness, and profitability. Millions of pension plans participants have profited from the superior returns," the group said.

Mr Lowenstein has led the charge in lobbying for a tougher stance on video-game piracy, and helped manage charges that the video-game industry had overstepped the limits of acceptable violence and sexual content in recent years.

Reliance Prepares For Hutchison Essar Bid (FT)

By Amy Yee In Delhi, Tom Mitchell In Hong Kong And Andrew Parker In London

Financial Times, December 27, 2006

Reliance Communications, India's second-largest mobile operator, is in talks with at least four private equity firms about combining forces to make an offer for Hutchison Essar, a smaller rival.

Vodafone Friday confirmed it was considering the acquisition of a controlling stake in Hutchison Essar, India's fourth-biggest mobile operator.

Reliance's talks with private equity firms underlines the likelihood of a bidding war for Hutchison Essar, which has an enterprise value of about $14bn.

DOJ_NMG_0109333

Shares in Hong Kong-listed Hutchison Telecommunications International, which holds 67 per cent of Hutchison Essar, rose 8 per cent on Vodafone's statement, to a record high of HK$19.08. Reliance declined to comment. However, people familiar with the company said it was in talks with Apax, Blackstone, Carlyle and KKR.

On Thursday, Vodafone's board gave the go-ahead for management to prepare an offer for Hutchison Essar. Leading Vodafone investors have reacted cautiously but positively to the prospect of a $13.5bn-plus offer for Hutchison Essar. Vodafone's shares closed down 1.2 per cent at 142p Friday. Vodafone said in a statement earlier: "The board of Vodafone continues to believe the mobile market in India has great potential and is therefore considering the acquisition of a controlling interest in Hutchison Essar. Such a transaction would be consistent with its stated strategy of seeking selective acquisition opportunities in developing markets. The process is at an early stage and may or may not lead to a transaction."

Vodafone is seeking to counter slowing revenue growth in its core European businesses by increasing its presence in emerging markets. Hutchison Telecommunications International said in a statement it had "been approached by various potentially interested parties", which it did not identify, and cautioned that a transaction was not guaranteed.

Hutchison Telecommunications International is a subsidiary of Hutchison Whampoa, the Hong Kong-based conglomerate.

Hutchison Whampoa has declined to comment. But people familiar with the group have said that an offer of $13.5bn would be regarded as low and unlikely to result in a deal.

Investors in Hutchison Whampoa have become accustomed to the conglomerate disposing of assets so as to bolster its interim and full-year results.

Hutchison Whampoa executives have denied such sales of assets are designed to offset losses from its third-generation mobile businesses, where it has invested more than $25bn. Operating losses at the company's 3G businesses reached $4.65bn in the first half of this year.

House Democrats Want To Redistribute Big Oil Money To Conservation, Renewables (AP)

By H. JOSEF HEBERT

AP, December 26, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - Democrats in the U.S. House of Representatives in the first weeks of the new Congress plan to establish a dedicated fund to promote renewable energy and conservation, using money from oil companies.

That is only one legislative hit the oil industry is expected to take next year as a Congress run by Democrats is likely to show little sympathy to the cash-rich, high-profile business.

Whether the issue is rolling back tax breaks _ some approved by Congress only 18 months ago _ pushing for more use of ethanol and other biofuels instead of gasoline, or investigations into shortfalls in royalty payments to the government, oil industry lobbyists will spend most of their time playing defense.

Details of a renewable fuels fund have yet to be worked out. Nonetheless, it is one of the initiatives the House will take up during its first 100 hours in session in January, according to aides to Nancy Pelosi, the Democratic leader. At least some of the money _ revenue gained by rolling back some tax breaks _ will go to a program to support research into making ethanol from sources other than corn.

"What we'll do is roll back the subsidies to Big Oil and use the resources to invest in a reserve for research in alternative energy," Pelosi, a California Democrat, recently told reporters.

But the oil issue likely to be first out of the legislative block in January concerns the ability of the federal government to recover royalties many lawmakers believe have been unfairly avoided by oil and gas companies drilling in deep waters of the Gulf of Mexico.

The Interior Department has been trying to get more than 50 companies to rework 1998-99 drilling leases that allow the companies to avoid paying billions of dollars in royalties because of a government mistake in writing the leases. Recently five companies agreed to a compromise to pay royalties on future production under the leases, but not from oil and gas already taken from the federal waters.

Most of the other companies argue that the leases represent a binding contract and have not even talked to Interior officials about them.

The industry intransigence has upset many in Congress, both Republicans and Democrats, who say they want to find a way to force the companies back to negotiations on the flawed leases. One approach is legislation barring companies from bidding on future leases unless they agree to renegotiate the flawed ones.

"There will be a new cop on the beat to force every big oil company that is currently lining its pockets with taxpayer dollars to come back to the negotiating table," Rep. Edward Markey, a Democrat, declared.

Pelosi calls the royalty avoidance from the 1998-99 leases the biggest oil industry subsidy issue she intends to tackle early. Congressional estimates have put the potential royalty loss at as much as $10 billion (?7.5 billion) over the life of the leases.

Rep. Henry Waxman, the incoming chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, has promised to continue pressing the Interior Department on the matter, which also has been the subject of extensive hearings under Republican leadership.

Recently Waxman and Rep. Tom Davis, a Republican and the committee's departing chairman, asked the Justice Department to review Interior's claim that royalties legally cannot be collected from past production under the leases.

House Democrats also are targeting a handful of oil industry tax breaks for repeal. Both Republican and Democratic lawmakers say there is unlikely to be an attempt to push more sweeping measures such a new tax on the oil industry's windfall profits.

Members of both parties have said they also want to make another stab at passing a federal law against oil company price gouging, an issue that will gain momentum should oil and gasoline prices again soar amid huge industry profits.

At the top of the hit list is a tax break that was aimed at promoting U.S. manufacturing but has provided a windfall for the oil industry as well. The provision reduces the corporate tax rate on profits from products made in the United States.

As for oil companies rolling in profits with $60 (?45.5)-a-barrel crude, it is "a break they didn't earn, deserve or need," says Rep. Jim McDermott, a Democrat. McDermott tried to eliminate the tax break in May but was unsuccessful. He estimates that oil companies are saving as much as $700 million (?530.6 million) in taxes a year because of it.

Democrats also are targeting other benefits for refinery investments and for expenditures for certain types of oil and gas exploration. Those measures, passed by Congress last year as part of a broad energy bill, are estimated to cost the government about $1.3 billion over 10 years.

Executives of the largest oil companies have said they do not need those tax breaks and do not oppose their repeal. Congress earlier this year already eliminated the tax incentive on exploration for the five largest companies.

The White House is not opposed to rolling back some of the tax breaks that Congress approved last year. President George W. Bush has said the industry does not need the subsidies given today's oil prices and industry profits.

2007 Energy Outlook: Costs Up (CSM)

By Ron Scherer

The Christian Science Monitor, December 27, 2006

NEW YORK

Remember this? Motorists complaining at the pump as the price of gasoline rises. Airlines bumping up airfares to cover expensive jet fuel. And delivery services tacking on surcharges, reflecting a record price for a barrel of oil.

But it's not just a description of this past spring. It's also the forecast for next year, probably just when school lets out for the summer and motorists are starting to put more miles on the odometer.

"We could see close to $85 a barrel on crude next year," says Phil Flynn of Alaron Trading in Chicago.

If the forecast comes true, energy could be a dominant factor in the economic outlook for 2007 because, unlike this year, the potential increases would come when the economy is expected to be struggling. It would thus be the wrong time for the equivalent of a tax increase, which is how economists describe a spike in consumer energy costs. And it could catch the Federal Reserve in the middle of an energy-fueled jump in the inflation rate: Usually, the Fed tries to counter inflation by raising interest rates, but in a soft economy, it would rather cut interest rates.

"If we get a surge in energy prices next year, then the probability of a recession increases dramatically," says Dennis Jacobe, chief economist for the Gallup Organization in Washington. "It depends on how fast the rise takes place."

Yes, some energy analysts are beginning to think 2007 will be a case of déjà vu for consumers and business. In this scenario, prices start to ratchet up in the spring, peak sometime in the summer at a new record, and then fall back to lower levels later in the year.

Right now, the weather is an important factor, especially for the price of oil. Tuesday, oil prices hovered around $62 a barrel, some $18 a barrel below the high for the year, as relatively warm weather affected the Northeast. "We have had a relatively mild winter so far, some 20 percent to 30 percent above average [temperatures]," says John Felmy, chief economist at the American Petroleum Institute in Washington.

Last week, the National Weather Service said the warm weather in the Northeast will continue into the first week of January. But Mr. Felmy worries that a return to "normal" temperatures in January could prevent refiners from switching to gasoline production, because they would have to produce more home heating oil. "To get back a normal winter, it has to be colder than normal the rest of the winter," he frets.

It's not just the weather that's keeping a lid on prices. US economic growth is slowing - down to about 2 percent growth in the gross domestic product. The slower growth means crude-oil demand is slack - up only 0.2 percent on a year-to-date basis.

Sluggish demand has already forced OPEC to reduce production by as much as 600,000 barrels per day. OPEC's reduction also means the cartel has the ability to ramp up production to keep prices in check.

In addition, non-OPEC sources are expected to increase next year, as new discoveries in Russia, Brazil, and the US Gulf of Mexico come onstream. The Department of Energy estimates this could add a few hundred thousand barrels of oil a day to the world supply.

Any new supplies, however, could quickly be absorbed by China. With its economy expected to expand by another 9 to 10 percent, its oil demand is expected to increase by about 7 percent, estimates Paul Ting of Paul Ting Energy Vision in Short Hills, N.J.

China currently imports between 3 million to 3.5 million barrels of oil per day, Mr. Ting estimates. This indicates it would need an additional 200,000 barrels each day to satisfy its larger appetite.

But as Ting points out, "it's never simple when it comes to the Chinese energy landscape." For example, with a significant amount of its oil coming from the Middle East, China is placing more importance on energy security. "The lack of a strategic petroleum reserve [in China] is a big issue," says Ting. "So in the next year or so, they will start to accumulate 100 million barrels of oil, which translates into an additional 100,000 barrels of oil per day."

While China grapples with surging demand, some analysts believe geopolitical concerns about energy may once again roil the energy markets.

In April, Nigeria, a key oil provider, will hold a presidential election. In the oil-rich delta area of Nigeria, dissidents are attacking oil platforms and kidnapping workers.

"Separatists are already attacking the infrastructure, and the unrest could climax in April," says John Kilduff, an energy trader at FIMAT USA, a commodities broker.

Tuesday, in an indication of the difficulties facing business operations in Nigeria, a gasoline pipeline there exploded, killing at least 200 people.

Energy markets will also be tuned in to the situation in Iraq, says Amy Myers Jaffe, professor of energy policy at Rice University in Houston. In one possible scenario, there might be some manipulation of the price of oil because of the ongoing sectarian strife in Iraq between the Shiites and the Sunnis, she says. She cites as an example the Iran-Iraq war in the 1980s, when Saudi Arabia, a mainly Sunni Muslim state, tried to keep oil prices down to hurt Iran, which is mainly Shiite.

"The fact the Saudis have not done it yet does not mean they would not do it," she says. "They have enough spare capacity to do this again if they see political facts they don't like."

If the strife in Iraq were to spread, that could pose a major risk. Most of the oil production in the region is in areas controlled by Shiites, even in Saudi Arabia, says Professor Jaffe. "There is the possibility this could become not just a crisis in Iraq but could spread to other populations. The reality is that if you commute to work, you have to care that there is no extended civil war in the Gulf."

U.S. Wants Polar Bears Listed As Threatened (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

The Bush administration has decided to propose listing the polar bear as threatened under the Endangered Species Act, putting the U.S. government on record as saying that global warming could drive one of the world's most recognizable animals out of existence.

The administration's proposal -- which was described by an Interior Department official who spoke on the condition of anonymity -- stems from the fact that rising temperatures in the Arctic are shrinking the sea ice that polar bears need for hunting. The official insisted on anonymity because the department will submit the proposal today for publication in the Federal Register, after which it will be subject to public comment for 90 days.

Identifying polar bears as threatened with extinction could have an enormous political and practical impact. As the world's largest bear and as an object of children's affection as well as Christmastime Coca-Cola commercials, the polar bear occupies an important place in the American psyche. Because scientists have concluded that carbon dioxide from power-plant and vehicle emissions is helping drive climate change worldwide, putting polar bears on the endangered species list raises the legal question of whether the government would be required to compel U.S. industries to curb their carbon dioxide output.

"We've reviewed all the available data that leads us to believe the sea ice the polar bear depends on has been receding," said the Interior official, who added that U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service officials have concluded that polar bears could be endangered within 45 years. "Obviously, the sea ice is melting because the temperatures are warmer."

Northern latitudes are warming twice as rapidly as the rest of globe, according to a 2004 scientific assessment, and by the end of the century, annual ocean temperatures in the Arctic may rise an additional 13 degrees Fahrenheit. As a result, researchers predict that summer sea ice, which polar bears use as a platform to hunt for ringed seals, will decline 50 to 100 percent. Just this month, researchers at the National Center for Atmospheric Research outlined a worst-case scenario in which summer sea ice could disappear by 2040.

By submitting the proposal today, the Interior Department is meeting a deadline under a legal settlement with three environmental advocacy groups -- the Center for Biological Diversity, the Natural Resources Defense Council and Greenpeace -- that argue the government has failed to respond quickly enough to the polar bear's plight. The department has been examining the status of polar bears for more than two years.

NRDC senior attorney Andrew Wetzler, one of the lawyers who filed suit against the administration, welcomed the proposal for listing.

"It's such a loud recognition that global warming is real," Wetzler said. "It is rapidly threatening the polar bear and, in fact, an entire ecosystem with utter destruction."

There are 20,000 to 25,000 polar bears worldwide, 4,700 of which live in Alaska and spend part of the year in Canada and Russia. The other countries with polar bears in their Arctic regions are Denmark and Norway.

Although scientists have yet to fully assess many of the 19 separate polar bear populations, initial studies suggest that climate change has already exacted a toll on the animals.

The ice in Canada's western Hudson Bay is now breaking up 2 1/2 weeks earlier than it did 30 years ago, giving polar bears there less time to hunt and build up fat reserves that sustain them for eight months before hunting resumes. As local polar bears have become thinner, female polar bears' reproductive rates and cubs' survival rates have fallen, spurring a 21 percent population drop from 1997 to 2004.

Scientists have not charted the same rapid decline within the U.S. polar bear populations, but federal scientists have observed a number of troubling signs as the bears have resorted to open-water swimming and even cannibalism in an effort to stay alive.

Polar bears normally swim from one patch of sea ice to another to hunt for food, but they are not accustomed to going long distances. In September 2004, government scientists observed 55 polar bears swimming offshore in the Alaskan Beaufort Sea, an unprecedented spike, and four of those bears died. In a separate study that year, federal scientists identified three instances near the Beaufort Sea in which polar bears ate one another.

The Interior official said government officials studying Alaskan polar bears in the southern Beaufort Sea area have observed thinner adult bears and a lower rate of survival among cubs. Although the population has yet to dip, "unless the polar cub survival rate goes up, it would have to happen," the official said.

Still, the official added that the decision to propose polar bears as threatened with extinction "wasn't easy for us" because "there is still some significant uncertainty" about what could happen to bear populations in the future.

"This proposal is sort of like a scientific hypothesis. You put this out there and say to the world, 'Tell us, is this right or is this wrong?' " the official said, adding that Interior will hold several public hearings about its proposal. "We're projecting what we think will happen in the future, not just what's happening at this moment."

The department could take up to a year to complete its proposal, and it could abandon the listing if it unearths new scientific projections about the bears' fate. But that appears unlikely, as recent models have consistently pointed to a faster deterioration of Arctic sea ice.

Although federal officials cited rising sea temperatures once before in a threatened species proposal -- in May, when they called them a "major stressor" on Caribbean elkhorn and staghorn corals -- today's proposal will mark the first time the administration has identified climate change as the driving force behind the potential demise of a species.

Robert Correll, the scientist who chaired the international Arctic Climate Impact Assessment in 2004 and now directs the global change program at the H. John Heinz III Center for Science, Economics and the Environment, said in an interview that the proposal to place polar bears on the endangered species list is "highly justified."

Correll added that he is participating in an administration-funded study at the Center for Strategic and International Studies on how climate change could affect national security and foreign policy.

That, along with the proposal on polar bears, he said, "plays into a reality that, in my opinion, they're going to be rethinking their position" on global warming.

EXCO To Buy Two Gas Fields From Anadarko (WSJ)

By John M. Biers

The Wall Street Journal, December 27, 2006

Anadarko Petroleum Corp. agreed to sell two Louisiana natural-gas fields for $1.6 billion to EXCO Resources Inc., in its latest push to reduce debt after a pair of large acquisitions.

The sale covers Anadarko's Vernon and Ansley fields, which produce 192 million cubic feet of natural gas a day, or about 11% of the company's gas production.

The fields "have been great assets for the company," Anadarko Chief Executive Jim Hackett said. "However, the fields have reached the stage in their development cycle where it makes sense for us to monetize them, reduce leverage and focus on other attractive opportunities in our portfolio."

Anadarko, an oil and natural-gas producer based in The Woodlands, Texas, has been busy this year, purchasing Oklahoma City oil and natural-gas developer Kerr-McGee Corp. and Denver natural-gas producer Western Gas Resources for $21 billion over the summer before implementing an aggressive asset-sale program in the fall to reduce debt. The EXCO sale brings the total revenue from the asset sales to $8.1 billion. Anadarko has also agreed to sell assets in Canada and the Gulf of Mexico.

Anadarko had net debt of $26 billion at the end of the third quarter. The company's goal is to notch it down to $12 billion by the end of 2007, Anadarko Chief Financial Officer Al Walker said earlier this month.

A company spokeswoman said Anadarko is also actively marketing a variety of other onshore properties in the U.S., including the "Golden Trend" in Kansas and Oklahoma, an enhanced oil-recovery venture in western Texas, some assets in the Northern Rockies and a partial interest in its K-2 complex in the Gulf of Mexico. The company also hopes to sell some producing properties in Qatar and its Venezuela interest, the spokeswoman said.

Shares of EXCO, a Dallas specialist in onshore developments, were up $1.06, or 6.3%, at $17.90 in 4 p.m. composite trading, while Anadarko shares were up 56 cents at $42.70, both on the New York Stock Exchange.

Farmers And Conservationists Form A Rare Alliance (NYT)

By Jessica Kowal

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

MOUNT VERNON, Wash. — The standoff here between farmers and environmentalists was familiar in the modern West.

With salmon and wildlife dwindling in the Skagit River Delta, some environmentalists had argued since the 1980s that local farms should be turned back into wetlands. Farmers here feared that preachy outsiders would strip them of their land and heritage.

This year, though, the standoff ended — at least for three longtime farmers in this fertile valley, who began collaborating with their former enemies to preserve wildlife and their livelihoods.

The Nature Conservancy, which usually buys land to shield it from development, is renting land from the three farmers on behalf of migrating Western sandpipers, black-bellied plovers, dunlins, marbled godwits and other shorebirds.

From private and public funds, including a grant from the federal Environmental Protection Agency, the farmers, David Hedlin, Gail Thulen and Alan Mesman, will together receive up to $350,000 for three years of labor, expenses and the use of 210 acres, said Kevin Morse, the Skagit Delta project manager for the conservancy.

Each man has committed about 70 acres to this project, which is called Farming for Wildlife. A third of that land will be flooded with a few inches of fresh water in the spring, fall and winter. This will create shallow ponds to entice thousands of birds, some of them on their way to and from the Arctic, to stop and snack on tiny invertebrates and worms as they travel along the Pacific flyway.

More than a dozen shorebird species have declined primarily because of the loss of local wetlands, said Gary Slater, research director at the Ecostudies Institute here and a consultant for the Nature Conservancy.

The farmers see the Nature Conservancy's willingness to pay them as an acknowledgment that they should not be expected to sacrifice their land or their living for wildlife. This approach effectively turns shorebirds into another crop to manage, instead of grounds for a lawsuit.

"The stewardship ethic in this valley is incredibly strong, but it doesn't trump the bank," said Mr. Hedlin, 56, who, with his wife, Serena Campbell, grows farmer's market produce, vegetable seeds, pumpkins, winter wheat and pickling cucumbers on their 400-acre farm.

Mr. Hedlin's 70-acre Farming for Wildlife parcel has been under water since a heavy November rain breached a dike and flooded the field, in a preview of what environmentalists hope will happen. Edged with wild roses and blackberry bushes, this accidental lake quickly attracted wintering waterfowl like trumpeter swans, coots, and mallard, teal and wigeon ducks.

An hour north of Seattle and an hour south of Vancouver, British Columbia, this region's glorious tulip farms attract hundreds of thousands of tourists each April. Skagit farmers also produce about 80 crops of commercial significance, including seeds used to grow beets, spinach and cabbage around the world, many of the red potatoes eaten in the United States, and vegetables and dairy products sent to farmer's markets and restaurants in the Pacific Northwest.

Thousands of years of flooding on the Skagit River deposited a rich layer of topsoil in the "magic Skagit," as Mr. Hedlin calls the valley. European immigrants flocked here starting in the 1860s and built Victorian houses for their families on the board-flat green fields.

They also constructed an elaborate network of earthen dikes to capture land from the saltwater delta and prevent the rivers from flooding their farms. On this managed agricultural landscape, tens of thousand of acres of farmland were once tidal wetlands, Mr. Hedlin said.

Since the mid-1990s, residents have tried to slow development as strip malls and housing subdivisions marched northward from Seattle. Skagit County residents pay extra taxes to buy development rights from farmers, and a charitable group, Skagitonians to Preserve Farmland, warns that "Pavement is forever."

Many conservationists have also decided that farms are better than pavement, and say they are willing to balance preservation with profitable land use.

Mr. Morse lives here and even volunteered to spend two days last spring selling Mr. Hedlin's produce at a farmer's market.

"We don't know anything about farming," Mr. Morse told the farmers recently over coffee and sandwiches at the Rexville Grocery. "You guys are the stewards of the land. You tell me what to do."

For this experiment, each farmer's 70-acre parcel has been planted with a mixture of clover and grass to enrich the soil. While a third of the land will be periodically flooded for birds, a third will be fenced as pasture for dairy cows, and the rest will be mowed and otherwise left alone.

Farms here are gradually shifting toward organic production because consumers willingly pay much more for organic food. As another incentive to join Farming for Wildlife, the 210 acres will be available for organic use after three years.

Mr. Mesman will start producing organic milk with his 225 Holstein cows next spring. Mr. Thulen sees a big market for organic potatoes.

"In my time, I can see our little valley was farmed very hard," said Mr. Thulen, whose 2,000-acre farm was begun by his grandfather in 1867. "That pendulum has swung to get the ground healthy again."

In an ideal world, the Nature Conservancy would love to persuade farmers to add wetlands to their regular crop rotation. To that end, the group's scientists will analyze soil samples to assess whether shallow flooding might improve soil fertility as much as cow manure and mowed grass do.

In a similar project on the Tule Lake National Wildlife Refuge in Northern California, farmers reported better potato yields and fewer nematodes, a harmful worm, on land that had been purposefully flooded. But scientists say this may not apply in the Skagit Valley, where the soil has a higher clay content.

Whether or not they end up with more productive land, the three farmers seem pleased to try something new without financial risk.

"If 100 years from now," Mr. Hedlin said, "there are healthy viable family farms in this valley and waterfowl and wildlife and salmon in the river, then everyone wins."

Meat And The Planet (NYT)

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

When you think about the growth of human population over the last century or so, it is all too easy to imagine it merely as an increase in the number of humans. But as we multiply, so do all the things associated with us, including our livestock. At present, there are about 1.5 billion cattle and domestic buffalo and about 1.7 billion sheep and goats. With pigs and poultry, they form a critical part of our enormous biological footprint upon this planet.

Just how enormous was not really apparent until the publication of a new report, called "Livestock's Long Shadow," by the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations.

Consider these numbers. Global livestock grazing and feed production use "30 percent of the land surface of the planet." Livestock — which consume more food than they yield — also compete directly with humans for water. And the drive to expand grazing land destroys more biologically sensitive terrain, rain forests especially, than anything else.

But what is even more striking, and alarming, is that livestock are responsible for about 18 percent of the global warming effect, more than transportation's contribution. The culprits are methane — the natural result of bovine digestion — and the nitrogen emitted by manure. Deforestation of grazing land adds to the effect.

There are no easy trade-offs when it comes to global warming — for example, cutting back on cattle to make room for cars. The human passion for meat is certainly not about to end anytime soon. As "Livestock's Long Shadow" makes clear, our health and the health of the planet depend on pushing livestock production in more sustainable directions.

Clone On The Range (WP)

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

WHEN YOU TRY your first clonedog, you might not even notice. The Post's Rick Weiss reported Monday that the Food and Drug Administration is expected to vouch this week for the quality of meat and dairy products from cloned animals and their offspring. So far, ranchers and breeders have voluntarily kept food from such animals off of Americans' dining room tables. That will probably change soon.

A recent poll by the Pew Initiative on Food and Biotechnology indicates that a majority of Americans get queasy at the thought of clonal animal products lining supermarket shelves. But to its credit, the FDA stuck to the science -- the great bulk of which supports its reported conclusion.

In a study set to be published in January, scientists at the Agriculture Department's Meat Animal Research Center raised over 400 animals -- more than half of them offspring of clones -- in identical conditions. An independent lab scrutinized more than 14,000 characteristics of the animals' meat composition and health, and only one animal returned results considered abnormal. This mirrors the findings of other studies.

Cloning animals with superior genetics will make animal products better and less expensive. Breeders aim to grow genetic twins of animals with desirable traits -- such as leaner, tastier meat -- in order to breed them and improve herds over generations. The only difference between this technique and traditional animal husbandry is the production of a genetic copy at the outset. As more high-quality breeding stock becomes available, the value of such animals will decrease, lowering production costs. Americans who don't want to eat animal products made this way will undoubtedly have the opportunity to do so through niche producers.

Opposition to the cloning of livestock has proved powerful. The International Dairy Foods Association helped delay FDA action for years out of fear that American dairy goods would become less attractive abroad. According to the Pew poll, a large number of Americans object to animal cloning out of religious concerns, views that anti-cloning groups will no doubt exploit to distract the public from the scientific evidence. But the FDA's job, in this as in other matters, is to fairly assess the science.

Authorities Bust Multi-million Dollar Hampton Roads Cocaine Ring (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, December 27, 2006

NORFOLK, Va. -- Federal authorities say they've charged 11 people believed to be involved in a Hampton Roads drug-dealing ring that has sold a ton of cocaine worth more than $8 million over the last 13 years.

One suspect, Linwood Parker, is thought to have earned as much as $2.9 million from cocaine sales, authorities said.

Most of the suspects have been arrested over the last 10 days. An informant helped with the case by wearing a microphone as police taped Hampton Roads drug deals over the last year, authorities said.

Drug Enforcement Administration officials worked with state and local authorities on the case, which officials said is one of the largest drug cases in the last 13 years.

The informant, who has never been formally charged, was arrested in Norfolk last year during a cocaine deal. Authorities searched his house, seizing $50,000 and "significant financial records," according to an affidavit filed by the DEA and the U.S. Attorney's office.

He's told DEA officials that in 1993 he began buying cocaine from Naeron Mudie, a Jamaican native who moved to Hampton in the early 1990s to establish a drug trade, the affidavit said.

Mudie and six others have been charged in a separate indictment with related crimes.

In 2001, the informant began buying cocaine directly from a source in the Bahamas, the affidavit said.

Most recently, the informant told business associates that a large cocaine shipment was due on Dec. 17. But the shipment was actually arranged by the DEA, court records said.

Arrests Break Up Hampton Roads Cocaine Ring, DEA Says (VAPILOT)

By Tim McGlone, The Virginian-pilot

Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot, December 27, 2006

NORFOLK - Federal authorities say they have broken up a drug conspiracy ring suspected of distributing about a ton of cocaine, worth more than $8 million.

Eleven people have been charged in the alleged conspiracy, which authorities said dates back 13 years. It is one of the largest drug cases over that time, federal officials said.

"This was a significant organization working in the Tidewater area," said Randy Benavente, resident agent in charge of the local Drug Enforcement Administration. The case was investigated by the DEA's drug task force of federal, state and local authorities.

Most of the suspects were arrested over the last 10 days. One defendant, Linwood C. "Lenny" Parker, is suspected of grossing $2.1 million to $2.9 million on the sale of cocaine. He is scheduled to appear in U.S. District Court today.

Authorities say the case grew out of the cooperation of an unidentified individual who wore a microphone as authorities tape-recorded and videotaped drug deals throughout Hampton Roads over the past year.

The informant told the DEA that in 1993 he began buying crack from Naeron B. Mudie, a Jamaican native who had moved to Hampton in the early 1990s to establish a drug trade, according to a 34-page affidavit filed in court by the DEA and the U.S. Attorney's Office. Mudie and six others are charged in a separate indictment with related crimes.

The informant declined to take over Mudie's business when Mudie went to prison for a short time in 1996 but continued selling drugs throughout Hampton Roads. In 2001, he began buying cocaine directly from an unidentified source in the Bahamas, the affidavit says.

Between 2001 and 2004, the informant purchased about 770 pounds of cocaine from his Bahamas source as well as another person in Florida and distributed it in Hampton Roads, according to the court document. He paid between $20,000 and $22,000 a kilogram, or 2.2 pounds.

In fall 2005, the informant was arrested in Norfolk during a transaction involving 9 kilo s of cocaine. Authorities searched his house, seizing $50,000 and "significant financial records," the affidavit says.

The informant has not been formally charged and instead has been working with the task force.

According to the records, the informant promised the others that a large shipment of cocaine was due to arrive Dec. 17. The shipment was actually arranged by the DEA.

Benavente of the DEA declined to comment further on the case. Prosecutors in the U.S. Attorney's Office also declined to speak about the case.

The defendant Parker and two other suspects, Michael L. "Caddi" Sparrow and Isaac Ivan "Dog" Banks, are accused of selling the most cocaine - hundreds of pounds, worth millions of dollars.

Authorities are seeking to seize $8.6 million, the estimated gross proceeds of the entire ring. It is believed that most of the money has been sent to off shore banks.

Other suspects identified in court records as smaller dealers or couriers are: Julius C. Bernard, Tameka E. Branch, Thomas J. Cambell III, Dwayne Anthony Griffith, Crystal A. Hickson, Kenneth L. Williamson, Linda Watkins, and a defendant whose name was not immediately known.

Attorneys representing several defendants did not return calls seeking comment.

Mexican Drug-kingpin Suspects In Court Today (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, December 26, 2006

Two men believed to be high-ranking members of a Mexico-based smuggling ring are scheduled to appear today in federal court in San Diego to discuss future court dates and arrange for legal representation.

Francisco Javier Arellano-Felix, 37, and Manuel Arturo Villarreal Heredia, 31, were named last week in a seven-count federal grand jury indictment on racketeering, drug trafficking and money laundering charges in an operation that dominated the Mexican drug trade for more than a decade. The ring flooded the United States with hundreds of tons of cocaine, marijuana, methamphetamine and heroin.

The indictment accuses the men of maintaining control of a drug trafficking empire through kidnappings and up to 20 slayings, including beheadings, of rivals in the drug trade, law-enforcement officers and members of the press.

DOJ_NMG_0109341

Both men were arrested in August by U.S. authorities while deep-sea fishing 15 miles off the coast of La Paz, Mexico, and have been in custody in San Diego ever since. The U.S. Coast Guard apprehended them aboard a boat known as the "Dock Holiday."

The new indictment replaces one handed up in 2003 that did not include the continuing criminal enterprise charges that could lead to their executions. Mexico has balked at extraditing those facing a possible death sentence.

A decision by federal prosecutors on whether to seek the death penalty will be made by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales at a later date.

The indictment describes Mr. Arellano-Felix as the gang's principal organizer and top leader since March 2000, and Mr. Villarreal as a hired assassin in command of crews that carried out enforcement operations and drug trafficking activities.

Both men pleaded not guilty during brief court appearances last week before U.S. District Judge Larry Alan Burns.

The gang, often referred to as the Tijuana Cartel, has been considered one of the most powerful and violent drug trafficking organizations in Mexico. At the height of its power, it was responsible for the transportation, importation and distribution of multi-ton quantities of cocaine, marijuana, heroin and methamphetamine into this country from Mexico -- primarily from Tijuana into San Diego and Los Angeles.

Jesus Labra Aviles, long considered the financial mastermind of the organization, was arrested in Mexico City in March 2000 by the Mexican military with the support of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's (DEA) Tijuana office, which ensured he was not released.

That was followed by the arrest of Ismael Higuera-Guerrero, a top lieutenant, two months later by the Mexican military in coordination with DEA. He had been the most overt member of the gang arrested, directing operations in Tijuana for years.

Gift Cards Just The Ticket For Organized Crime (CNS)

CanWest News Service, December 26, 2006

OTTAWA - Those gift cards that countless Boxing Day shoppers will be cashing in today are also landing under the Christmas trees of organized-crime groups, who use them as ``virtual currency'' for drug deals and money laundering, according to the RCMP.

A recent organized-crime threat assessment for Canada and the United States identified gift cards and prepaid debit cards as one of the tools in the financial-crime kit of organized crime. The assessment was compiled by the RCMP, the FBI and the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

``All these cards were built for legitimate purposes, obviously,'' said John Sullivan, acting director of the RCMP's proceeds-of-crime branch. ``But as with any new technology, as soon as criminal organizations see a gap, they exploit it.''

Sales of gift cards have exploded in recent years, making them a ubiquitous feature at retailers such as Chapters, HMV and Home Depot.

During last year's holiday season, 82 per cent of Canada's largest retailers offered such cards, up from 53 per cent in 2003, according to a recent Statistics Canada study.

Sales figures for Canada are tough to come by, but U.S. numbers suggest gift cards are a booming business. The U.S. National Retail Federation estimated Americans will spend $24.8 billion US on gift cards this holiday season.

Many retailers offer gift cards in set denominations. The deposit limit on such ``closed'' cards make them less attractive for organized-crime groups, Sullivan said.

They prefer ``open'' cards with higher deposit limits, such as those offered by credit-card companies, he said.

RCMP officers said such cards are now accepted as valid currency between crime syndicates. Instead of a suitcase of cash, operatives might show up for a drug deal with a fistful of gift cards.

``Let's just say a kilo of cocaine is sold for $30,000 on the market. Well, you come in with 15 cards loaded with $2,000, and you pay for that commodity,'' said Stephane Sirard, an intelligence analyst with the RCMP's criminal-intelligence directorate.

The cards are also useful for transferring money across the border, because they don't qualify as ``monetary instruments'' and aren't subject to reporting limits, he said. Individuals crossing the border with $10,000 or more must file a report with Canadian border authorities.

Internet-savvy crooks could also launder money by converting it into gift cards, then sell the cards online for less than the value stored on the card, Sirard said.

An informal search of Ebay.ca found more than 2,000 gift cards on sale in Canada, many at asking prices below face value.

Gift cards are an attractive option for crime groups because they can be obtained without going through the ``mainstream'' banking system, Sullivan said.

DOJ_NMG_0109342

MasterCard Canada, for example, offers a gift card that can be loaded up to $2,500. A website that promotes the card said applicants require no credit check, security deposit, employment or income verification.

Applicants can apply for a card at various retail locations across Canada, such as convenience stores and payday-loan outlets. Once they complete the registration online, the card is mailed to them and they can load and reload it with cash at any of the retail locations.

MasterCard Canada didn't return a call for comment.

When poorly managed, prepaid-card programs can be a ``vehicle for money laundering and terrorist financing," conceded Gord Jamieson, director of risk management and security at Visa Canada.

But he said his company has taken a number of steps to prevent its cards from being used for criminal purposes. Prepaid Visa cards available to individual applicants have a deposit limit of $500 in Canada and cannot be reloaded or used at an ATM.

The company does offer a prepaid card with no deposit or reloading limit, but cardholders typically apply through their employers. Visa also tracks purchasing to ensure the card isn't used in countries known as money-laundering havens, he said.

``We've put some pretty tight controls around this so it's not an attractive option for money laundering."

Sullivan said prepaid cards only recently appeared on the RCMP radar. He declined to comment on specific cases where gift cards have been seized, but said the Mounties' assessment is based on ``more than just anecdotal evidence."

Gift Cards Popular With Underworld Set (CP)

Afghan Heroin's Surge Poses Danger In U.S. (LAT)

By Garrett Therolf, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 26, 2006

The world's purest form can kill more addicts, as seen in L.A. County.

Supplies of highly potent Afghan heroin in the United States are growing so fast that the pure white powder is rapidly overtaking lower-quality Mexican heroin, prompting fears of increased addiction and overdoses.

Heroin-related deaths in Los Angeles County soared from 137 in 2002 to 239 in 2005, a jump of nearly 75% in three years, a period when other factors contributing to overdose deaths remained unchanged, experts said. The jump in deaths was especially prevalent among users older than 40, who lack the resilience to recover from an overdose of unexpectedly strong heroin, according to a study by the county's Office of Health Assessment and Epidemiology.

"The rise of heroin from Afghanistan is our biggest rising threat in the fight against narcotics," said Orange County sheriff's spokesman Jim Amormino. "We are seeing more seizures and more overdoses."

According to a Drug Enforcement Administration report obtained by The Times, Afghanistan's poppy fields have become the fastest-growing source of heroin in the United States. Its share of the U.S. market doubled from 7% in 2001, the year U.S. forces overthrew the Taliban, to 14% in 2004, the latest year studied. Another DEA report, released in October, said the 14% actually could be significantly higher.

Poppy production in Afghanistan jumped significantly after the 2001 U.S. invasion destabilized an already shaky economy, leading farmers to turn to the opium market to survive.

Not only is more heroin being produced from Afghan poppies coming into the United States, it is also the purest in the world, according to the DEA's National Drug Intelligence Center.

Despite the agency's own reports, a DEA spokesman denied that more heroin was reaching the United States from Afghanistan. "We are NOT seeing a nationwide spike in Afghanistan-based heroin," Garrison K. Courtney wrote in an e-mail to The Times.

He said in an interview that the report that showed the growth of Afghanistan's U.S. market share was one of many sources the agency used to evaluate drug trends. He refused to provide a copy of DEA reports that could provide an explanation.

The agency declined to give The Times the report on the doubling of Afghan heroin into the U.S. A copy was provided by the office of U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), a member of the Senate Caucus on International Narcotics Control.

This potent heroin, which the DEA says sells for about $90 a gram in Southern California, has prompted warnings from some officials who deal with addicts that they reduce the amount of the drug they use. Many addicts seeking the most euphoric high employ a dangerous calculation to gauge how much of the drug they can consume without overdosing. An unexpectedly powerful bundle of heroin, therefore, can be deadly.

"I tell people, 'If you're using it, only use half or three-quarters of what you used to,' because of the higher potency," said Orlando Ward, director of public affairs at the Midnight Mission on Los Angeles' skid row.

Health workers in boutique rehab centers as well as health clinics for the homeless say increasing numbers of clients are addicted to more powerful heroin.

"My patients say it's more available and cheaper," said Michael H. Lowenstein, a doctor at the Waismann Method detoxification center in Beverly Hills.

Antonio Maria Costa, executive director of the U.N. Office on Drugs and Crime, warned world health authorities in October of the increase in Afghan heroin.

"This, in turn, is likely to prompt a substantial increase in the number of deaths by overdose, as addicts are not used to injecting doses containing such high concentrations of the drug," he said.

From 1980 through 1985, Afghan heroin dominated the U.S. market, with a 47% to 54% share, according to the DEA.

DOJ_NMG_0109344

AFGHANISTAN'S share dwindled to 6% for much of the 1990s, as competition from Southeast Asia and Colombia grew. Meanwhile, the Taliban was cracking down as it gained territory, virtually eliminating poppy production after taking over the country.

Once the fundamentalist Islamic government was overthrown in 2001, Afghans turned once again to the poppy trade to survive in one of the poorest countries in the world.

A report released Nov. 28 by the World Bank said U.S. and European efforts to end Afghanistan's $2.3-billion opium business were failing.

The production of opium used to produce heroin reached its highest level ever in Afghanistan this year. It accounted for more than one-third of Afghanistan's gross domestic product and 90% of the world's supply of illicit opium, mainly going to Asia and Europe, according to the report.

The poppy crop now drives the economy in some regions of the embattled nation, helping to fund a Taliban resurgence.

In the United States, Afghan and Mexican poppies tied for second place among sources of heroin in 2004, according to the DEA's Heroin Signature Program. South America, led by top supplier Colombia, held 69% of the market.

That figure had dropped 19 percentage points from the 2003 level as U.S. and Colombian efforts to eradicate the trade enjoyed success and as Afghanistan's share increased, according to the DEA.

The Department of Homeland Security also has found evidence of increasing Afghan heroin in this country. The agency reported skyrocketing numbers of seizures of heroin arriving at U.S. airports and seaports from India, not a significant heroin-producing country but a major transshipment point for Afghan drugs.

The seizure of heroin packages from India increased from zero in 2003 to 433 in 2005 — more than 80% of total mail seizures of heroin arriving in the U.S. that year.

In the meantime, although they may not recognize the product as coming from Afghanistan, addicts across the country are increasingly coming into contact with more powerful heroin.

"There is a different kind of heroin now," said Eric Wade, a 32-year-old recovering addict in Portland, Ore. "It is very, very strong, and it is cheaper than the other stuff. Not everybody has access to it, but I've seen more people overdose … on that stuff."

In Ballwin, Mo., an affluent suburb of St. Louis, two sisters were arrested in the spring, accused of selling "China white" heroin between classes at their high school.

Capt. Tom Jackson, who leads the St. Louis County Police Department's bureau of drug enforcement, said investigators thought the heroin traveled to the campus from Afghanistan with the help of Nigerian traffickers, a Chicago gang and a downtown St. Louis drug dealer.

"This China white is so pure that they can snort it or smoke it," Jackson said. "So, no needles or track marks."

Afghan Heroin Taking Over U.S. Market (UPI)

UPI, December 26, 2006

LOS ANGELES, (UPI) -- Supplies of heroin from Afghanistan are rapidly replacing lower quality Mexican heroin, and could lead to a rise in U.S. addiction and overdoses, a report says.

Los Angeles has seen a large impact, with heroin-related deaths jumping from 137 in 2002 to 239 in 2005, nearly 75 percent, the Los Angeles Times reported.

Experts said that within the three years other factors contributing to overdose deaths remained unchanged.

A report from the Drug Enforcement Administration said Afghanistan's poppy fields have become the fastest-growing source of heroin in the United States since 2001.

Another DEA report said that heroin from Afghanistan may take up more than 14 percent of the Unites States market.

Remnants Of A Trial Prompt A Crusade (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

Jim Savage has been living in a world of guard shacks, green security poles and Jersey barricades lining the street outside his home next to the federal courthouse in Alexandria.

They were put there for the trial of a terrorist, Sept. 11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, and they were supposed to come down when the trial was over. Seven months after it ended, they are still there.

So Savage, who calls the security measures an eyesore, mounted a one-man crusade to have them removed. He retrieved a judge's order saying the additional security was supposed to be temporary and tried to meet with the judge. He contacted the City of Alexandria, but was told the federal government has jurisdiction over his street.

Yesterday, Savage learned that his campaign will probably meet with only mixed success. The U.S. Marshals Service said plans are in the works to remove most of the barricades and to replace them with a permanent security wall near the courthouse. Officials said the wall will be more attractive than the faded concrete barricades and will fit with the neighborhood's architecture.

"This idea of some sort of a Berlin Wall really fits. It will be like Checkpoint Charlie," Savage, a former criminal investigator for the U.S. Army, said when told about the plans by a reporter. "The fact is that a court order allows these security measures to be present, and the basis for that order is over. To put up something permanent with the expectation that maybe you might have a terrorist trial in the future is really stretching things."

John Hackman, the acting U.S. marshal for Alexandria, said he understood the concerns of Savage and other residents at the Carlyle Towers condominium complex. "We are doing our best to reach a balance that will provide security as well as the aesthetic that the neighborhood requires," Hackman said. "But terrorism is not something where we say okay, we had a trial, and it goes away. We need to be constantly vigilant, and obviously the Alexandria court has high-profile cases."

Michael Kulstad, a marshal's spokesman, said the agency investigated 1,111 threats or "inappropriate communications" to members of the judiciary nationwide in fiscal 2006, including to judges, prosecutors and witnesses. Just last week, a federal prisoner was indicted in Richmond on charges of sending a letter bomb to the federal courthouse there.

The Alexandria federal courthouse has been a focus of additional security since the Justice Department made it the venue of choice for terrorism trials after Sept. 11. Officials have said they chose Alexandria for the Moussaoui case in part because Northern Virginia's jury pool is viewed as more conservative than New York's and because the Richmond-based U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit has been considered the nation's most conservative appellate court.

The Alexandria courthouse is not the first in Northern Virginia to wrestle with enhanced security. In 1998, the Fairfax County courthouse added metal detectors and barricades for the sentencing hearing of Mir Aimal Kasi, a Pakistani man who opened fire outside CIA headquarters, killing two people. When the trial ended, the security stayed.

"Nobody wants this stuff, but when security experts say it's necessary, I think it's irresponsible not to do it," said F. Bruce Bach, who as chief circuit judge at the time approved the security measures. "We're living in a different day and age today."

In 2002, Alexandria faced the prospect of two high-profile trials starting within days: Moussaoui's and that of John Walker Lindh, a Californian accused of fighting for the Taliban in Afghanistan.

On June 18, 2002, U.S. District Judge Claude M. Hilton, then the chief judge, ordered marshals to take all necessary security measures but specified they would be "during the pending of these cases." Lindh pleaded guilty soon after. Moussaoui's case dragged on, but he pleaded guilty last year.

Moussaoui's death penalty trial this year featured rooftop snipers and bomb-sniffing dogs. That level of security ended with the trial, during which Moussaoui was sentenced to life in prison.

But guard shacks and barricades still dot two streets surrounding the courthouse, with green security poles dug into the sidewalks. Traffic outside Savage's apartment building, which is across the street from the courthouse, must squeeze into small lanes around the shacks and a series of in-ground, collapsible metal security barricades. Federal officials did remove some of the barricades further up the street after the Moussaoui trial.

Savage was outraged when he pulled Hilton's 2002 order from the federal court clerk's office. Learning that U.S. District Judge James R. Spencer in Richmond is now the chief judge, Savage tried to meet with him to seek an order overturning the original one but said he was told to express his concerns in writing. Spencer did not return a telephone call seeking comment.

Although several other Carlyle Towers residents said they want the barricades taken down -- and the condo association board is seeking their removal -- Savage has been working mostly alone.

His next step? Writing the letter to Spencer, but delivering it to "his boss" -- U.S. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. Then, Savage said, "it may be time to move."

IMMIGRATION:

Lawsuits Challenge Texas Town's Immigration Law (LAT)

By Miguel Bustillo

The Los Angeles Times, December 27, 2006

HOUSTON, Texas — A Dallas suburb that has barred landlords from renting to illegal immigrants was sued Tuesday by two civil rights groups that allege the controversial ordinance turns property owners into immigration agents and violates federal law.

The challenge by the American Civil Liberties Union and the Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund seeks to derail a new law that would require property managers to check the immigration status of apartment renters in Farmers Branch, Texas. The ordinance, approved last month, is set to take effect Jan. 12.

Farmers Branch -- a city of 28,000 north of Dallas that is about 37 percent Hispanic -- is one of dozens of U.S. municipalities that, frustrated with federal government inaction, have adopted tough local measures to stem illegal immigration.

But the Farmers Branch ordinance is seen as a turning point for Texas, a state that largely has avoided the kind of confrontational immigration policies commonplace elsewhere.

"This is the first ordinance of its kind in Texas, the beginning of what we hope will not be a lasting trend here," said Lisa Graybill, legal director of the ACLU of Texas. "Stop and think what it would be like if every little town tried to adopt its own illegal immigration policy. It would be a nightmare."

The ACLU and MALDEF are challenging the law on several constitutional grounds. They argue that it violates the due process clause because it does not make clear which immigration documents are acceptable and which are not, the contract clause because it interferes with a business transaction between landlord and tenant without proper cause, and the equal protection clause because it only applies to some landlords. But the primary argument is that it exceeds the city's powers because only the federal government can enforce immigration laws.

While opponents of unchecked immigration have hailed Farmers Branch leaders for taking a courageous stand, many landlords have complained that they are being thrust into the volatile immigration debate -- and some local business owners have complained that Hispanics may no longer feel welcome in the city.

Some Texas leaders, meanwhile, have expressed concern that the city's stance is divisive and could harm the entire state's reputation. Last month, Farmers Branch Mayor Bob Phelps awoke one morning to find the words "Viva Mexico" spray-painted in red on the side of his house.

Tuesday's immigration lawsuit is the third filed against Farmers Branch, which also passed a resolution last month establishing English as the city's official language. Last week, a group of apartment owners asked a federal judge to declare the rental law unconstitutional. Earlier this month, a local real estate agent alleged that city leaders repeatedly discussed the ordinance behind closed doors, violating Texas' open meetings law.

The city recently created a legal defense fund to collect donations from supporters and sympathizers, and has received more than $6,000.

Phelps and Councilman Tim O'Hare, who spearheaded the immigration law, did not return phone calls Tuesday. Matthew Boyle, the assistant city attorney, said Farmers Branch would not discuss any pending litigation, but noted that city leaders had anticipated challenges to the law.

"The city was overtly threatened with litigation as far back as August, when this was being discussed. So we knew it would be no surprise that some litigation would be filed, and have been preparing for it," Boyle said.

Civil Rights Groups Sue Over Rent Law (FINDLAW/AP)

By Anabelle Garay, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 27, 2006

(AP) - DALLAS-Two civil rights groups filed a lawsuit Tuesday challenging a new law in a Dallas suburb that outlaws renting apartments to illegal immigrants, alleging the ordinance violates federal law and forces landlords to act as immigration officers.

The American Civil Liberties Union and the Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund filed the suit on behalf of residents and landlords in Farmers Branch, just north of Dallas. It is the third lawsuit brought against the city since the ordinance passed in November.

The lawsuit claims the measure, scheduled to take effect Jan. 12, is so poorly drafted that it excludes even legal immigrants from renting.

"Immigration enforcement must be left to the federal government, not each local municipality," said Lisa Graybill, legal director of the ACLU of Texas. "Otherwise Texas will end up with a patchwork system that is impractical and unenforceable."

Farmers Branch spokesman Tom Bryson said the city will not comment on pending litigation.

On Friday, the owners of three apartment complexes filed a lawsuit asking a federal court to declare the rent law unconstitutional. In another lawsuit filed earlier this month, a Farmers Branch resident alleged that the mayor repeatedly violated the state's open meetings laws to deliberate the ordinances.

The new law calls for property managers or owners to verify the immigration or citizenship status of apartment renters. The City Council also approved resolutions making English the city's official language and allowing authorities to become part of a federal program so they can enforce immigration laws.

Since 1970, Farmers Branch has changed from a small, predominantly white bedroom community with a declining population to a city of almost 28,000 people, about 37 percent of them Hispanic, according to the census.

More than 50 municipalities nationwide have considered, passed or rejected similar laws, but until now that trend hadn't been duplicated in Texas.

Our Founding Illegals (NYT)

By William Hogeland

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

EVERY nation is a nation of immigrants. Go back far enough and you'll find us all, millions of potential lives, tucked in the DNA of our African mother, Lucy. But the immigrant experience in the United States is justly celebrated, and perhaps no aspect of that experience is more quintessentially American than our long heritage of illegal immigration.

You wouldn't know it from the immigration debate going on all year (the bipartisan immigration bill-in-progress, announced this week, is unlikely to mention it), but America's pioneer values developed in a distinctly illegal context. In 1763, George III drew a line on a map stretching from modern-day Maine to modern-day Georgia, along the crest of the Appalachians. He declared it illegal to claim or settle land west of the line, all of which he reserved for Native Americans.

George Washington, a young colonel in the Virginia militia, instructed his land-buying agents in the many ways of getting around the law. Although Washington was not alone in acquiring forbidden tracts, few were as energetic in the illegal acquisition of western land. And Washington was a model of decorum compared to Ethan Allen, a rowdy from Connecticut who settled with his brothers in a part of the Green Mountains known as the Hampshire Grants (later known as "Vermont"). The province of New York held title to the land, but Allen asserted his own kind of claim: He threw New Yorkers out, Tony Soprano style, then offered to sell their lots to what he hoped would be a flood of fellow illegals from Connecticut.

Meanwhile, illegal pioneers began moving across the Alleghenies and into the upper Ohio Valley, violating the king's 1763 proclamation and a few more besides. (George would today be accused of softness on immigration; he kept shifting the line westward.) Immigrants from such déclassé spots as Germany and Ireland violated the laws and settled where they pleased. The upper Ohio was rife with illegal immigrants, ancestors of people who, in country clubs today, are implying a Mayflower ancestry.

Parallels to today's illegal immigration are striking. Then as now, it was potentially deadly to bring a family across the line. But once across, illegals had a good chance of avoiding arrest and settling in. Border patrols, in the forms of the British Army and provincial militias, were stretched thin. The 18th-century forest primeval, like a modern city, offered ample opportunities for getting lost. Complex economies thrived in the virgin backwoods, unfettered by legitimate property titles.

When conflicts developed between the first and second waves of illegals, some salient social ironies arose, too. By the early 1770's, George Washington had amassed vast tracts to which his titles were flatly invalid. The Revolution rectified that. With British law void, Washington emerged from the war with his titles legal by default. But he acquired another problem: low-class illegals were squatting on his newly authenticated, highly valuable property.

Washington harbored no fond feeling for breakers of laws that he too had recently flouted. "It is hard upon me," he lamented without irony, "to have property which has been fairly obtained disputed and withheld." He went to court to have the squatters evicted, complaining that they had "not taken those necessary steps pointed out by the law." He was appealing to righteousness from atop a high but wobbly horse.

Descendants of the great immigration experiences of the 19th and 20th centuries visit the Ellis Island Immigration Museum to learn of the tribulations of ancestors who risked much to become Americans. Those of us whose ancestors risked everything as illegal immigrants, and in the process helped found a nation, owe our forebears a debt of gratitude, too. Without their daring disregard of immigration laws, we might not be here today.

Immigrants' Jobs Vanish With Housing Slowdown (WP)

By Nick Miroff

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

The gold rush came in drywall, laminate flooring and granite countertops, and Amilcar Guzm?n came with it.

Guzm?n left El Salvador at age 18 in 1999 and landed in Manassas. Soon he had $15-an-hour jobs cutting lumber, driving nails and running a Bobcat loader. He got a car, got married. The Washington region was hungry for houses, houses, houses, and word of the boom reached Mexico and Central America, drawing thousands more eager, jobless men like him.

Then sometime last year, Guzm?n said, the rush began to go bust, little by little, month by month. The contractors stopped hiring. The phone stopped ringing. Washington, it seemed, had all the houses it could hold .

So Guzm?n got a plane ticket. On Jan. 20, he is taking his family back to El Salvador, with plans to open an auto repair shop with the money he has saved. "There's no work here anymore," he said, having spent the past month unemployed. "And when there's no work, it's time for Latinos to go back to the countries where they came from."

Hispanic immigration to the Washington region has always followed a seasonal pattern, as the winter puts a chill on outdoor labor and drives workers south. But with home sales and housing starts dropping after years of steady growth, many Hispanic workers -- legal and illegal -- say the good times are gone.

"The Hispanic population in Virginia has grown too much," said Guzm?n, echoing the sentiments of those who support tough immigration policies, "and that's closed off a lot of job opportunities."

Demographers who track migration patterns and embassy staff members say it's too soon to tell exactly how the housing construction decline has affected the region's Hispanic population. But stories of departing workers abound. Some workers say they're headed home; others, spurred by rumors of construction jobs, try their fortunes in the Carolinas, Georgia, New Orleans.

"It's a little better here, but not much," said Raul Amayas, 21, a Salvadoran immigrant reached by phone in Charlotte. Amayas left Manassas last month after losing his $400-a-week landscaping job. Now he's making $300 a week as a busboy at a Mexican restaurant. "It's hard here. Ugly," Amayas said.

Other immigrant workers said they're optimistic things will pick up again.

Juli?n Cabrera, 42, arrived in Woodbridge in 2004, a sharecropper from El Salvador who could no longer feed his nine children on the $5 a day he earned growing corn and beans. He has been snagging work at Route 1 and Longview Drive ever since. A year ago, he would get hired at least three times a week. But he hasn't found work once this month and is thinking of going to Texas, where his brother-in-law might be able to get him a job with a contractor. Until then, he's not sending money home to his family in El Salvador.

"I call my wife every eight days," he said, eyeing passing cars for potential employers. "I just tell her to be patient."

According to the National Association of Realtors, housing starts have fallen 23.5 percent between October 2004 and October 2006, and data released this month by the Northern Virginia Association of Realtors show home sales in that area plunged 45 percent between November 2004 and November 2006. Home sales in suburban Maryland are down 34 percent between November 2004 and November 2006, according to the Maryland Association of Realtors.

DOJ_NMG_0109349

The effects of the slowdown are also rippling through Hispanic-owned businesses. "A lot of my customers have gone to Florida, to the Carolinas," said Carlos Castro, owner of the Todos Supermarket chain and chairman of the Hispanic Business Council in Prince William County.

Sales are down slightly at Castro's stores, but he said some of his suppliers are experiencing 30 to 40 percent decreases in local orders, with smaller, less-established businesses taking the biggest hit.

Tracking the departure of immigrants from the Washington area is difficult. "In terms of actual data, it's too soon to say," said Steven A. Camarota, research director of the Center for Immigration Studies, which supports limiting immigration. "If the economy turns down and we were to ratchet up enforcement, there would be a multiplier effect. But that isn't likely to happen. The most likely scenario is movement into other sectors of the economy and greater geographic dispersion."

Among illegal immigrant Hispanic men in the region, as many as one in three work in construction, Camarota said. No other U.S. industry employs more illegal immigrants, he said.

"A slowdown in the construction industry hits illegals much harder than the rest of the general population," Camarota said.

Gustavo Torres, executive director of CASA of Maryland, said he's concerned that tensions over immigration will spread and intensify if large numbers of idle construction workers are not quickly absorbed by other services and industries. "We've seen workers leaving for other states for jobs in construction or agriculture," he said.

Torres argued for the need for job training programs to help workers make the transition into other sectors, saying he feared that "confrontation will accelerate further" if the slowdown worsens.

"That's one of the dangers of importing lots of workers," said Ira Mehlmen, spokesman for the Federation for American Immigration Reform, which seeks to curb illegal immigration. "After their services are no longer required, you end up with them and with their families. "There isn't much reason for them to return home when services and other benefits are available."

But for many, and single men in particular, home has a powerful pull nonetheless. Aurelio Cruz has a wife and four children back in Puebla, Mexico, and every day that he's apart from them and doesn't find work "is a day of my life that I've wasted," he said.

The month of December has been lost to Cruz; he hasn't been hired once. "It's a bad situation," he said. He was thinking of going home this month, but weeks of standing along Route 1 in Woodbridge waiting futilely for work have postponed his plans.

"I came here to take care of my family," he said. "I can't go home with nothing. I can't go home the way I came."

Cost Of Care A Disabled Son Imperils Family's Immigration Hope (WSJ)

By Miriam Jordan

The Wall Street Journal, December 27, 2006

MARTHA'S VINEYARD, Mass. -- Zandro Souza, an immigrant from Brazil, rose in six years from being a restaurant dishwasher who barely spoke English to a successful chef in upscale restaurants here on Martha's Vineyard. Last year, after a long bureaucratic journey, Mr. Souza and his wife, Fernanda, were tantalizingly close to winning green cards that would let them remain in the U.S.

See video of Zandro Souza and other immigrants speaking2 at a Thanksgiving luncheon hosted by the Massachusetts Immigrant and Refugee Advocacy coalition. Mr. Souza begins speaking about two minutes into the clip.

But during a final interview with a U.S. immigration official in Providence, R.I., the Souzas' five-year effort to win legal status hit a wall. "I have no problem approving you and your wife," Mr. Souza says the official told him. "But I need more information about your son."

The Souzas' 11-year-old son, Igor, is blind and developmentally delayed. His condition requires countless doctor visits, frequent runs to the emergency room and more than $1,000 a month in medication. Mr. Souza says he has paid almost all of Igor's medical bills -- about $20,000 annually -- out of pocket, without insurance or help from government programs. He feared accepting aid would jeopardize his family's attempt to gain permanent U.S. residency.

According to Mr. Souza, the immigration official told him that if Mr. Souza and his wife died, their son could become a "public charge." Although the family tried to prove that Igor would be cared for if his parents passed away, the U.S. government earlier this year denied green cards to the couple and their son and placed them in deportation proceedings. This time the government cited another reason for rejection -- that they applied for and entered on tourist visas but intended to stay permanently.

"If this were only about me, I would throw in the towel" and return to Brazil, says Mr. Souza, 30 years old. "But I want the best for my son."

The Souzas' story shows how compassion can collide with hard-nosed financial considerations as the U.S. decides which immigrants should be admitted and which should be turned back. The Souzas rose through hard work and paying their own way.

DOJ_NMG_0109350

Yet they also hurt their case by entering the country on a false pretext, although many immigrants who later gain U.S. citizenship do the same.

Admitting productive, self-reliant people has long been a goal of U.S. immigration policy. The Immigration Act of 1891, one of the country's first efforts to regulate immigration, allowed the exclusion or deportation of any individual deemed to be a burden on the public purse, referring to "idiots, insane persons, paupers, or persons likely to become a public charge."

At Ellis Island, newcomers inspected by public-health officials and deemed unfit were returned to their country of origin. Steamship lines were often fined for having ferried them to the U.S. Later, legal immigrants from Mexico and Asia faced similar scrutiny on entering from the West.

A 1996 federal law says immigrants must be legal U.S. residents for five years before they qualify for Medicaid, which pays medical expenses for the poor. However illegal immigrants cannot be refused emergency medical care.

Between 1921 and 1930, 10,703 foreigners were deported on public-charge grounds. In more recent years, the government has cited other more basic reasons for forcing someone to leave, such as having entered the country illegally.

In 2005, 75,532 foreigners were deported for entering the U.S. without proper documents or through fraud or misrepresentation. Public charge was the official reason for only 824 out of the total 208,521 deportations that year.

Illegal-immigrant children are entitled to attend public schools, and special-needs children receive the same services as other students. In recent years, however, the escalating cost of providing education to children with special needs has fueled clashes between advocates for disabled students and those concerned that they are draining already-limited school budgets.

In Massachusetts about 16.5% of the state's student population receives special education. The cost of educating these children is increasing faster than for mainstream students and placing a financial burden on many school districts, according to school administrators.

Shawn Saucier, a spokesman for U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, says privacy laws prevent the agency from commenting on the Souzas' case. "However, if we were talking to a couple who had a son with disabilities, we would have to be satisfied that the child would not become a public charge," he says.

James R. Edwards Jr., an adjunct fellow with the Hudson Institute, a conservative Washington think tank, says the public-charge concept is rooted in this country's emphasis on self-sufficiency. "We aren't interested in taking foreign countries' criminals ... and certainly not those unable to support themselves," says Mr. Edwards, who favors restricting immigration.

As for the Souzas, he says, "My heart goes out to the family and the kid." However, he says, the U.S. already contends with "native-born Americans who face the same kind of crisis, with their children being ill and suffering disease."

Mr. Souza and his wife met as teenagers in 1990 in Cuparaque, a small Brazilian town. In 1994, Fernanda, then 17, became pregnant and the couple decided to marry.

Igor was born on March 1, 1995. At seven months, he was diagnosed with congenital toxoplasmosis, caused by a parasite that is present in uncooked meat and the fecal matter of cats. Transmission to the fetus can cause severe problems, including mental retardation, seizures, blindness, and even death. Doctors believe that Ms. Souza was infected by the cats in her grandmother's home, and Igor contracted the condition from his mother during pregnancy.

The couple soon realized that Igor's condition would require careful management and virtually around-the-clock monitoring, not to mention a panoply of special drugs. The Souzas had access to free care through Brazil's vast public health-care network, but the large hospitals and long waiting lists were difficult to navigate. To get Igor to the doctor, Fernanda rose at 4 a.m., taking two buses to line up just to make an appointment for a month later. The family couldn't afford private care on Mr. Souza's $300 a month salary working in a restaurant.

The Souzas saw an answer thousands of miles to the north, on Martha's Vineyard where Brazilian immigrants are the backbone of the local tourism industry. In 1989, Mr. Souza's father, José, found summer work in a restaurant called the Navigator, eventually settling here in 1997.

In 2000, Mr. Souza arrived in the U.S. on a six-month tourist visa. He joined his father at the restaurant, rising to become daytime chef. His hourly wage doubled to $17. At night, he worked a second job up the street at the Harbor View Hotel's Coach House, one of Martha's Vineyard's finest restaurants. Mr. Souza moved swiftly from dishwasher to sauté cook to lead line cook, overseeing all the workstations in the kitchen. "He has a passion," says Jim Moore, the restaurant's food and beverage director, who took Mr. Souza to demonstrate his cooking -- including his mini lobster rolls -- at the upscale Tribeca Grill in New York City.

In early 2001, Mr. Souza brought his wife and son to the U.S. The two took an overnight van to Rio de Janeiro, where an official at the U.S. consulate issued them tourist visas.

Igor started kindergarten at the Oak Bluffs School, where he was assigned a special assistant, as well as occupational and physical therapy. About 400 students attend Oak Bluffs School, where Igor today is in the fifth grade. About 20% of them require special-education services. However, "only three or four have the level of need requiring a one-on-one assistant" such as Igor, says James Weiss, Martha's Vineyard school superintendent. Mr. Weiss estimates it costs more than $40,000 to educate Igor annually compared with $15,000 for "regular" students.

"He certainly is a youngster who impacts our budget in a significant way," says Dr. Weiss. However, "it's both our legal and moral obligation to help students who have identified needs."

As Igor mastered English, story time and music became his favorite classes. He began singing Beatles songs. A poem he wrote in Braille with the help of his teacher reads, "My favorite song is 'Yesterday.'" A lanky, curly-haired boy, Igor recently entertained teachers and classmates in the hallway with a rendition of "Hey Jude."

Initially, the family relied on friends to drive them to Boston for appointments with Blaise Bourgeois, a neurologist at Children's Hospital Boston. The consultations, every four or five months, cost the couple about $350 each, which they paid out of pocket according to bills and receipts reviewed by The Wall Street Journal.

Igor also required a special dentist, nutritionist, endocrinologist and frequent visits to his pediatrician. Every three months or so, Igor suffered a seizure that landed the Souzas in the emergency room of the Martha's Vineyard Hospital. One of his worst episodes, Christmas Eve in 2003, lasted 45 minutes. The emergency-room visits have cost between $1,500 and $2,500 each. Mr. Souza says Igor's medical bills this year are about $16,000; in previous years they have risen as high as $20,000.

Mr. Souza says he pays for his son's doctor visits and prescription medication on the spot. Mr. Souza says he still owes $4,000 to the hospital for emergency-care visits. "If I can't pay in one lump sum, I make sure and send a check in every month -- even if it's just for $100 or $300," says Mr. Souza.

Mr. Souza, his wife and son live with Mr. Souza's parents and other relatives in a three-bedroom house owned by Mr. Souza's father. Mr. Souza earns $5,000 to $6,000 a month; about 27% of that is deducted in taxes from his weekly paycheck. He contributes $600 a month to his parents' mortgage.

In 2001, Mr. Souza sought to take advantage of a temporary immigration law, known as Section 245i, to apply for an employer-sponsored green card for himself and his family. The bill allowed immigrants to adjust their status from within the U.S., even if they had overstayed their visas or entered the country illegally. Employers regarded the program as an opportunity to legalize their work force, while critics said it was tantamount to amnesty.

Alan Counsell, then manager of the Navigator restaurant, had previously agreed to sponsor Mr. Souza's father and mother. He agreed to sponsor the Souza family as well. "It was a small repayment" for their dedication, he says. "Anything I asked of them they gave me."

Mr. Counsell followed the requirement to place advertisements in the newspaper, to show that qualified chefs -- like Mr. Souza -- weren't readily available on the Vineyard. Mr. Souza paid for the ads -- and over the next few years paid almost $10,000 in fees to lawyers and the U.S. government.

In July 2003, the Souzas received notification that their employment authorization was being processed. Mr. Souza was thriving professionally, earning a reputation as a fine seafood cook and collecting employee awards. He acquired hundreds of cookbooks, which he says helped him improve his English. His favorite chef is the well-known New York restaurateur Mario Batali, whose picture on the cover of a 2002 edition of Gourmet Magazine Mr. Souza pinned to a wall.

Mr. Souza's son, who shares a bedroom with his parents, refuses to go to sleep before his father arrives home from work each night. On Mondays, Mr. Souza's only day off, the father picks up his son from school and treats him to pizza. On Sundays, the family dresses up for evening services at the local Brazilian evangelical church, where Igor sways and chants spiritual songs.

In 2004, the Souza family was fingerprinted and issued Social Security numbers and work permits, "I felt like the gates to freedom were opening," recalls Mr. Souza. "The only thing missing was the interview." The family was summoned to Providence for an 8 a.m. interview on May 13, 2005, the final step in the process.

Mr. Souza was nervous but hopeful. He and his wife took an oath to tell the truth, he recalls. They began answering questions from the adjudicator. Among them was the question of why the family had come to the U.S. Mr. and Mrs. Souza told the official that they had come here to make a better life.

As Igor squirmed in his chair and babbled in Portuguese, the immigration adjudicator turned to Mr. Souza and asked whether he relied on the U.S. government for the child's care. Mr. Souza answered without hesitation: "No."

Mr. Souza recalls the adjudicator then asking: "So you pay for his schooling?"

Mr. Souza answered hastily -- failing to explain that while his son attended public school, he paid for Igor's health care himself.

Then the immigration official voiced concern that the son would become a public charge if his parents passed away, Mr. Souza recalls. The Souzas left the room clutching a form letter with Igor's name filled in at the top. In the space next to 5, "PLEASE SUBMIT THE FOLLOWING," the official had written: "I-864 from your father Zandro Souza showing evidence you will not become a public charge." They had 12 weeks to supply the documentation.

"I can't even remember driving home," says Mr. Souza.

According to U.S. immigration policy, an applicant can overcome a public-charge inadmissibility issue by providing sufficient evidence that he or she is unlikely to become a public charge. This evidence can be a posted as a bond, an "affidavit of support" from friends or family, personal funds, or an offer of employment.

The Souzas set out to prove that, in the event of a tragedy, Igor would be cared for by their family, not the government. Mr. Souza sent evidence that his father's house on Martha's Vineyard -- bought for $265,000 several years earlier and now worth about $500,000 -- could be put in a trust in Igor's name if his parents died. It could then be sold, if necessary, to cover his health expenses. Some immigration attorneys question why the government requested an affidavit of support in the Souzas' case, because the family was being sponsored by an employer who already serves as a financial guarantor.

But this soon became a moot point. In January 2006, immigration authorities denied green cards to each member of the Souza family and ordered them to appear in court for deportation proceedings. The government was no longer raising the "public charge" issue. Rather, the government notice stated that Mr. Souza, his wife and Igor had come to the U.S. on six-month tourist visas in violation of U.S. law because their actual intention was to stay in the U.S. for good.

"I felt an empty feeling, like everything had been in vain," recalls Mr. Souza.

Mr. Saucier, the spokesman for immigration, says: "We don't look for one reason and deny the case. We issue it for all reasons applicable to the application."

While they wait for their deportation hearing in February, Mr. Souza continues to pay for Igor's health care. Early this month, the family paid $643.98 for two antiseizure drugs, according to receipts reviewed by the Journal.

Mr. Souza says that if his family receives their green cards, he will continue to pay for his son's medical costs. As new legal residents, the Souzas won't qualify for Medicaid for five years under current immigration law. And Mr. Souza's current income level already puts the family well above the poverty limit for Medicaid.

That's why Mr. Souza says he wants to cook for a larger restaurant or one owned by a chain. Those restaurants, he notes, offer health insurance.

TAX:

Tax Haven Wants Its Welcome Mat Back (WSJ)

By Robert Guy Matthews

The Wall Street Journal, December 27, 2006

For decades, the U.S. Virgin Islands was a friendly place for business owners looking to skirt U.S. taxes. Too friendly, Congress declared back in 2004, changing the relevant statute. Since then, the Treasury Department and Internal Revenue Service have been cracking down.

Now, elected officials and business leaders in the U.S. territory are complaining that the federal government has gone too far and the tax crackdown is threatening the local economy and government revenue. They are lobbying Congress to ease up.

"While these changes were aimed at preventing tax abuse by persons who neither lived nor worked in the Virgin Islands, the changes went too far, forcing many legitimate businesses to close their doors," Charles Turnbull, governor of the Virgin Islands (population about 109,000), told a Senate committee this year.

The controversy is a reminder that what looks like an odious tax dodge to the Treasury and IRS can look like a well-justified tax break to individuals and communities that benefit from it. The tension comes as the Treasury is under pressure to collect more of the taxes that are legally owed. The IRS estimates about 17% of all taxes owed -- about $290 billion every year -- go unpaid.

Forty miles east of Puerto Rico in the Caribbean, the U.S. Virgin Islands -- not to be confused with the British Virgin Islands -- include the islands of St. Croix, St. John and St. Thomas, and about 50 small islets and cays. They were named in 1493 by Christopher Columbus in reference to the legendary beauty of St. Ursula of Cologne and her 11,000 virgins. The U.S. bought them from the Danes for $25 million of gold in 1917 to improve military positioning during World War I.

Per capita income is just $14,500, less than that in Mississippi, the poorest state. The hilly islands have little room to grow food; many goods have to be flown or shipped in. About 80% of the territory's 43,000 jobs are tied to tourism.

In 1986, as part of a sweeping overhaul of U.S. tax laws, Congress opened the door to tax breaks to spur economic development in the territory. One of the biggest allowed the Virgin Islands to offer a deal to Americans who moved there to set up a business. Companies and individuals would pay the same taxes they paid in the U.S. -- minus 90%. By law, Virgin Islanders pay U.S. tax rates, but the money goes to the local government, not Washington.

To qualify, companies had to invest at least $100,000; hire at least 10 people, 80% from the Virgin Islands; and contribute $50,000 or more to local charities. The rules have since been eased in some cases.

DOJ_NMG_0109353

In later years, as Washington began to crack down on tax abuse of all sorts, the Virgin Islands came under scrutiny. "Something had to be done," said Benedetta Kissel, deputy international tax counsel at the Treasury Department. "We were getting reports that people were living and working in the U.S. but claiming 90% discounts on their tax returns."

In June 2004, the IRS warned companies in what is known as the Economic Development Commission program to avoid manipulating residency and income rules to qualify for the tax break. The Treasury and IRS also began implementing new regulations that significantly lengthened the time a person seeking the tax break had to live in the Virgin Islands. The old rule required a resident to be on the Islands for 122 days a year on average, over three years, to qualify. The new ones required a resident to spend at least 183 days, or roughly six months, every year.

The Treasury and IRS began enforcing the new regulation in earnest in early 2005, and -- to the consternation of some on the Islands -- the IRS asserted that it had authority to go back as far as it wanted without regard to the statute of limitations. IRS spokesman Terry Lemons wouldn't estimate how many audits are in the works, saying only that the Virgin Islands is facing increased scrutiny. "Basically, we have tried to figure out who was a bona fide resident who could claim these tax incentives," says Treasury's Ms. Kissel.

In the Virgin Islands, this is seen by some as overkill. "I don't think that there is any question that there were bad guys, but we here on the island are feeling the effects from the IRS," said Theodore Skolkus, a partner at Clearwater Consulting LLC. Four years ago, Mr. Skolkus, a tax attorney, set up a Virgin Islands consulting firm after moving from Arkansas to take advantage of the tax breaks. Because of new rules, he says, he has laid off two employees because one of his partners decided to leave the firm, taking away the extra business income to support existing staff.

Business owners say residency rules are a hardship because they have to leave the islands, often for long stretches to drum up clients.

In 2005, the Virgin Islands government spent at least $1.38 million lobbying the federal government on tax-related issues, according to Opensecrets.org. Included is a $140,000 fee to hire former Texas Republican Rep. Richard K. Armey. Mr. Armey, now with the law firm of DLA Piper, didn't return messages.

The number of financial firms that make the Virgin Islands their corporate home has fallen to less than 60 from 100 two years ago. One of the biggest to pull up stakes is a subsidiary of Chicago-based Driehaus Capital Management -- a retirement-planning outfit -- which expects to be gone by the end of the year. A Driehaus spokesman declined to give the reason for the company's departure.

Applications to sign up for the 90% tax breaks have fallen to zero, said Frank Schulterbrandt, chief executive officer of the Virgin Islands Economic Development Authority, which runs the program. He said the program created 3,000 high-paying jobs and generated about $114 million of tax revenue to the islands. The crackdown has chilled economic growth and scared away future investment, even though the agency has jettisoned those who were improperly claiming the tax break. "We have been blindsided and we didn't have time to negotiate," he said.

Firms that remain in the program are asking for permission to employ fewer locals than previously required.

Gov. Turnbull and Donna M. Christensen, a Democrat who is the territory's nonvoting delegate in Congress, insist they aren't looking to make the Virgin Islands a tax haven. But they argue that the U.S. government should balance cracking down on tax cheats with helping the islands to become more self-sufficient and its economy more diversified.

To buttress their argument, the territorial government hired PricewaterhouseCoopers to assess the effect of the tax breaks. That report said the islands could lose $80 million, or more than a tenth of the $633 million of corporate and individual tax receipts, if the economic-development program's tax incentives end.

Tax Breaks For Skyboxes (WSJ)

By Daniel Golden

The Wall Street Journal, December 27, 2006

This week, college football bowl games dominate television sports programming. But, off screen, little-known tax breaks are spurring the latest scrimmage over commercialism in college athletics. Some academics and legislators, contending that college football's multibillion-dollar building boom detracts from schools' educational mission, are targeting tax laws that treat payments for luxury seating and naming rights as charitable gifts.

Two congressional committees have looked into the tax breaks in recent months, seeking information from the National Collegiate Athletic Association and hearing testimony from critics. The tax benefits have also figured in a controversy at the University of Michigan over a proposed $226 million stadium renovation.

The tax perquisites, "could be the Achilles' heel of stadium expansions, a way to put the brakes on," says former University of Michigan President James Duderstadt.

Over the past decade, many football powerhouses have upgraded their stadiums, and the spending spree shows little sign of abating. Michigan plans to build 83 luxury suites at its stadium, known as "The Big House." The University of Texas recently embarked on a $175 million stadium reconstruction, adding 47 luxury suites. Partly as a result of debt payments on capital outlays, colleges' athletic spending is increasing more than three times as fast as their overall spending, according to the NCAA.

Universities typically finance these renovations by issuing tax-exempt bonds. They then make payments on the debt by leasing the new luxury suites and other preferred seating to individuals or corporations. Suites -- usually featuring 16 seats, catered food, televisions and high-speed Internet access -- are priced at $50,000 to $90,000 a year.

A selling point to alumni and other supporters is that they can deduct most of the lease fee from their taxable income. Under a 1988 federal law, taxpayers may deduct 80% of payment for the right to purchase seating at a collegiate sports event -- though not a professional one -- as a charitable contribution. Direct payments for game tickets, food, parking and other goods aren't deductible as charitable contributions but may be written off as a business expense if used to entertain clients.

Some colleges also pay debt by selling stadium naming rights to corporations, which can deduct the payment as a donation or business expense. The University of Maryland this year sold naming rights to its football field for $20 million over 25 years to Chevy Chase Bank to help fund a $50 million renovation that also adds 60 luxury suites. Under a 1997 federal law, colleges don't pay taxes on revenue from naming rights, which are considered part of their nonprofit mission rather than unrelated business income.

College athletic directors and boosters say they need the tax breaks to raise revenue to modernize stadiums and pay for less popular sports and academic tutoring for athletes. "I don't see a thing in the world wrong with" the 80% deduction, says oil executive W.A. "Tex" Moncrief Jr., who leases a luxury suite at the University of Texas stadium. "That money is used to further many educational activities."

Warren Hood, associate athletic director at the University of Illinois, said the 80% deduction is cited in its marketing brochures and has been helpful in pitching luxury suites. Illinois, which lost 10 of 12 football games this season, began construction last month on a $116 million stadium renovation financed largely by borrowing. Mr. Hood said the university has commitments from supporters to lease 45 of 48 new luxury suites priced from $45,000 to $59,000 a year.

Critics say these payments should not be deductible as charity because they purchase a valuable asset -- either premium seating or, in the case of naming rights, advertising. The 80% deduction is "ridiculous," says Smith College economist Andrew Zimbalist, author of a book on college sports. "I don't think intercollegiate sports support the educational mission. It's a separate activity."

A tax deduction for luxury boxes "isn't my style," says Rebecca McGowan, one of the University of Michigan's eight regents. She initially opposed the Michigan renovation out of concern that skyboxes "were going to be enormously expensive, for the benefit of relatively few people." But she switched sides after receiving assurances that more athletic revenue would be devoted to academic programs.

Mr. Duderstadt, the former Michigan president, told the Senate Finance Committee at a hearing this month that the "perverse treatment" of "mandatory fees" for luxury-skybox leases and season-ticket licenses as charitable contributions is "fueling an arms race in college sports, driving universities to debt-finance massive stadium expansion projects, exploit young student athletes, and tolerate multimillion-dollar coaches' salaries."

Iowa Sen. Charles Grassley, the outgoing Senate Finance chairman who will become ranking minority member in the next Congress, said through a spokeswoman that he'd "like to know how tax deductions for boosters who lease luxury boxes at college football stadiums help poor kids afford college." The incoming chairman, Montana's Sen. Max Baucus, expects to focus on whether federal tax incentives "are helping to provide educational access to students," and may look at tax breaks for athletic facilities in that context, a senior aide said.

According to a staffer, Sen. Grassley is considering taking up the investigation initiated by retiring House Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas into whether sponsorships and huge television deals for sports are consistent with colleges' tax-exempt status. In October, Rep. Thomas wrote to NCAA president Myles Brand, observing that major-college football and men's basketball "more closely resemble professional sports."

The California representative, who copied Sen. Grassley on the letter, asked Mr. Brand how much money athletic departments receive from corporate sponsorships and donations, including gifts made for the right to buy tickets. Mr. Brand responded in November that sponsorships generate $275 million in annual athletic revenues, and that donations to major-college athletic departments in 2004-05 were $845 million.

"Educational institutions ... have received favored status in every income tax act passed by Congress," Mr. Brand wrote.

Such consideration surfaces in the history of the 80% luxury-suite deduction. In 1986, the Internal Revenue Service ruled that gifts required to obtain a "substantial benefit," such as season tickets, are not deductible. Nevertheless, a tax-reform act passed that same year allowed full deductions for contributions for the right to buy seating at the University of Texas and

DOJ_NMG_0109355

Louisiana State University. The provision was pushed by the late Texas representative J.J. Pickle, a University of Texas alumnus and influential member of the House Ways and Means Committee, and the late Louisiana Sen. Russell Long, an LSU graduate and longtime member of the Senate Finance Committee.

In 1988, Congress extended the deduction to all universities but reduced it to 80%. "That was one of those blatant compromises," says Bruce Hopkins, a Kansas City, Mo., attorney specializing in nonprofit law. "They just plucked the 80% figure out of the proverbial air."

Even with the 80% deduction, some universities haven't raised as much money from premium seating as anticipated. The University of Colorado has leased nearly all of its 40 luxury suites but only 38% of 1,850 club seats, which cost between $1,500 and $2,200 a year, athletic director Mike Bohn says. Revenue from suites and club seats falls just short of the $3.2 million needed to pay down debt, he said, instead of the $5.7 million that leasing all of the seats would generate.

Opponents of Michigan's renovation doubt the university will find enough customers for its luxury suites, where alcohol will be banned. "Why pay a whole bunch of money, drive up to Ann Arbor, sit behind a glass wall and not be able to get a beer," says Laurence Deitch, one of two regents on the university's eight-member board who voted against the plan last month. "I think I'd stay home."

But Michigan administrators say at least 50 people have expressed unsolicited interest in leasing suites. "Would we do worse without the tax deduction?" asks Tim Slottow, the university's executive vice president. "I don't know. I wouldn't want to find out."

The Payroll Tax Trap (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 27, 2006

When these columns warned last month against a tax increase next year to "save" Social Security, White House officials said we were hooting at phantoms. Well, the more we listen to senior Republicans, the more worried we get.

Asked about a tax increase last week, President Bush refused to rule it out the way he had after the 2004 election. Instead, he said that, while he'd prefer not to raise taxes, in negotiating with Democrats he wants everyone's "ideas on the table." His spokesman, Tony Snow, was just as noncommittal on taxes, saying that "I'm not ruling it up and I'm not ruling it down." More than one GOP Senator has told us privately he's open to the idea. And no less a political student than Bill Thomas, the soon-to-retire Chairman of House Ways and Means, recently told a public forum that "I wish I were a bit more comfortable in listening to some of the noises that are currently being made" by his GOP colleagues. Uh, oh.

The issue is the price Mr. Bush is willing to pay to attract Democrats into a Social Security deal he could claim as a legacy. The President deserves credit for trying to reform Social Security while it is still in temporary surplus. But Democrats refuse to talk about personal retirement accounts for younger workers, and the White House is already signaling surrender on that proposal. The big question left is whether having everything "on the table" means conceding to Democratic demands for higher taxes today in return for future benefit cuts.

What liberals dearly want is to raise the payroll tax cap. Under current law, Americans pay a 12.4% Social Security tax on all wages up to $94,200 in 2006, and the cap rises each year with inflation. (There is also an uncapped 2.9% Medicare payroll tax on top of that.) So why not lift the cap a little more, say the taxers, perhaps to $150,000 if the trade-off is benefit cuts that will prevent even larger tax increases in the future?

One answer is that Social Security was always meant to be run like a pension program where the taxes paid by workers are linked to the benefits they get back during retirement. Eliminating or substantially raising the cap would convert Social Security into an overt income redistribution program. If that is the direction Congress wants to go, we should all then end the pretense that Social Security is some kind of "universal" insurance program and call it welfare for poor seniors.

Such a payroll tax hike would also eviscerate Mr. Bush's most impressive domestic achievement: the pro-growth tax cuts. If the tax cap were eliminated entirely, the President would be signing into law one of the largest tax hikes in U.S. history, or more than $1.3 trillion in new taxes over the first 10 years alone. About seven million families with an income of less than $150,000 a year would be hit with a tax increase of up to $6,000 a year.

This would also be a major tax hike on small-business employers, who pay half of the payroll levy (workers pay the other half themselves). As Mr. Bush's first chief economic adviser, Lawrence Lindsey, puts it: "The President would thus be not just raising taxes on entrepreneurs to well above the levels that prevailed in the Clinton administration, but to a rate higher than Carter." Some "legacy."

But wouldn't this all be worth it if we could take those future, unfunded liabilities off the books? Only if you think a tax increase now is worth a promise to cut benefits later. No one serious thinks those benefits will be paid anyway, so why make young current workers pay twice for the sins of their fathers?

Such a tax hike-benefit cut compromise would only exacerbate the generational inequity of Social Security. The paramount scandal of Social Security is not its insolvency but rather its abysmally low rate of return for new workers. Even if the payroll tax were left alone and all promised benefits were eventually paid out to young workers, these workers would get a tiny real annual rate of return of 1% to 1.5% on average, according to a Cato Institute analysis. Even a risk-free government bond pays 3% to 4%.

Taking personal accounts off the table eliminates the only option that will provide a better rate of return for future generations. As the nearby chart shows, personal accounts earning market returns would provide roughly twice as high an annual benefit to low income workers upon retirement, three times as high a benefit for middle income workers, and four times more to those with an income in today's dollars of $94,200 a year. Mr. Bush was right to link future cuts in benefits for wealthier earners to personal accounts.

As for the politics, Republicans might take note that AARP, the liberal senior lobby, is already calling a tax increase essential to a "balanced plan" for Social Security. And in a perverse way they're right: Such a plan would raise taxes on moderate-income Republican voters in return for cutting the benefits on those same Republicans. No wonder Democrats like the idea.

A tax increase of any kind with GOP fingerprints would remove the one big political brand advantage that Republicans still have over Democrats. It would make it far easier for Hillary Rodham Clinton to propose another tax increase in 2008 because GOP credibility in fighting the idea would be nil -- just as it was in 1992 after Mr. Bush's father raised taxes as part of his "deficit reduction" deal with George Mitchell. If Republicans now let themselves get sucked into a payroll tax increase, they'll deserve the same fate.

Mississippi: Judicial Nominee Withdraws (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

Michael Wallace, a Jackson lawyer, sent a letter to President Bush asking that his name be withdrawn from nomination to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit. Though Mr. Wallace wrote that he believed most senators would consent to his nomination, he said the incoming Judiciary Committee chairman, Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, “made it clear two weeks ago that he intends to permit vacancies to be filled only with ‘consensus nominees.’ ” Mr. Wallace said remarks Mr. Leahy inserted into the record at his confirmation hearing “establish that he does not regard me as such a nominee.”

Lawyer Asks Bush To Revoke His Nomination To The Bench (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

JACKSON, Miss., Dec. 26 -- A Mississippi lawyer asked President Bush to withdraw his nomination to an appellate court, saying that he does not believe that the senior Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee considers him a consensus nominee.

The lawyer, Michael B. Wallace, 54, of Jackson, said Tuesday that he made the request in a letter sent to the White House last week.

Wallace wrote that he thinks a majority of the Senate would consent to his nomination. But he said incoming Judiciary Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) "made it clear two weeks ago that he intends to permit vacancies to be filled only with 'consensus nominees' " and that Leahy has indicated that he doesn't consider Wallace to be such a nominee.

In February, Bush nominated Wallace, a former aide to Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), to fill the seat on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 5th Circuit vacated more than a year ago by Judge Charles Pickering Sr., also a Mississippian. The New Orleans-based 5th Circuit hears cases from Mississippi, Louisiana and Texas.

In November, Wallace's name was among six judicial nominations that Bush resubmitted to the Senate.

Wallace drew opposition from Democrats, civil rights groups and the American Bar Association, which for the first time in almost a quarter-century unanimously rated a judicial nominee "unqualified."

Wallace said various special interests and their supporters on the committee had made up their minds before he was allowed to testify or respond to criticism.

Lott said in a statement that he was disappointed that "petty partisanship" would keep Wallace off the court.

AIDS Program Loses Track Of Funds, Results (WT/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0109357

By Rita Beamish

The Washington Times, December 27, 2006

Even Bush administration officials acknowledge it was a lot to expect all at once: rush billions of dollars of help into AIDS-stricken nations, demand quick results from U.S. contractors, and then expect those contractors to produce tidy progress reports.

In the end, it was too much.

Government auditors found that accurate record keeping and monitoring often took a back seat in President Bush's three-year-old, $15 billion plan to fight HIV/AIDS in African and other poor countries.

The Bush administration says the situation has improved greatly because it has imposed tighter, standardized reporting systems on groups that receive U.S. money to ensure the accuracy of their reported results.

Lapses in verification, confusion over how to measure results and errors in counting people served by anti-AIDS programs were significant enough that at least one member of Congress wants lawmakers to investigate.

"While the global AIDS pandemic is an urgent humanitarian crisis that demands a rapid response, we cannot sacrifice results and accountability for speed," said Rep. Barbara Lee, California Democrat.

Rep. Henry A. Waxman, California Democrat and incoming chairman of the Government Reform Committee, agreed that Congress should probe accountability questions raised by government auditors.

Ambassador Mark Dybul, the administration's global AIDS coordinator, said there is a growing "culture of accountability" in the nations receiving U.S. help, and he is confident the overall numbers reported for the program are now accurate.

Early problems were expected as the administration demanded quick results from its contractors, Mr. Dybul said.

"You could've waited for three years to get all these systems in place, and an awful lot of people would have died," he said. "Our approach was get the services out, start moving the programs.

Auditors nonetheless plan to recommend improved reporting methods to ensure "reasonable assurance that what they say was done was actually carried out," said Joe Farinella, the assistant inspector general for the U.S. Agency for International Development, which conducted the audits.

Investigators focused on groups caring for infected people and AIDS orphans, and working to prevent spread of the disease.

They found that in Guyana, the AIDS program reported inflated numbers to Congress in its annual report. The government claimed 5,200 AIDS orphans received care in that country, but auditors documented fewer than 300, many of them not even affected by AIDS.

The opposite occurred in South Africa, where some provincial governments refused to disclose information on AIDS tests and counseling, causing "severe underreporting" of how many benefited from U.S.-backed services, auditors said. Officials said that problem was now resolved.

After reporting that millions of people were reached by mass media promoting sexual abstinence and use of condoms, the administration now has dropped that measurement completely, on grounds that it is impossible to know how many people hear radio messages.

Development analysts say that some of the new religious and community organizations doing the AIDS work were ill-equipped for the reporting demands accompanying U.S. grants.

"This whole push for new partners is a double-edged sword. You have to build their capacity to manage U.S. government money and particularly meet the reporting guidelines," said Patty Mechael, former program director for the charity CARE.

One of the largest contractors, Family Health International (FHI), experienced 83 percent inaccurate or unverified tallies from its subcontractors in impoverished Guyana.

FHI has since strengthened training for its local partners, "making sure the people clearly understand what they're measuring," Senior Vice President Sheila Mitchell said.

Some groups that didn't measure up have been dropped, and others who complained about reporting demands have warmed to the new systems, Mr. Dybul said.

He said the updates the administration released on World AIDS Day on Dec. 1 are accurate: 822,000 people receiving lifesaving drugs, and 4.5 million receiving care.

Crackdown On 'Earmarks' Still Leaves Room For Some (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, December 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Billions of taxpayer dollars will continue to flow next year to thousands of projects sought by lawmakers, despite Democratic leaders' vow to place a moratorium on so-called congressional earmarks when they take control of Congress next week.

DOJ_NMG_0109358

An earmark is a provision added to a spending bill for an item or program that wasn't requested by the agency getting the money or authorized by previous legislation.

Projects authorized in prior years and not yet completed will be largely unaffected by the moratorium unless federal agencies choose to stop funding them, officials say. In addition, more than 2,600 projects won passage in a 2007 defense appropriations bill before the moratorium was announced.

Even new projects could win funding if lawmakers persuade agencies to continue paying for them. "You have literally thousands of earmark lobbyists here in Washington," says Rep. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz., a leading critic of earmarks. "The pressure's going to be intense."

Democratic leaders announced this month that they would not include congressional earmarks in the final spending bill for the 2007 fiscal year, which runs through Sept. 30. "We will place a moratorium on all earmarks until a reformed process is put in place," said Sen. Robert Byrd of West Virginia and Rep. David Obey of Wisconsin, who will head the appropriations committees next year.

There were 13,012 earmarks in the 2006 budget totaling $67.1 billion, according to the Congressional Research Service.

No one is sure how existing projects should be treated. Until that's clear, some agencies say they will continue to fund thousands of projects carried over from 2006. "These agencies know who butters their bread," says Steve Ellis of Taxpayers for Common Sense.

Most of the government has operated under temporary budget authority since the fiscal year began Oct. 1, because the outgoing, Republican-controlled Congress passed only two spending bills, for defense and homeland security.

Among the earmarked projects that are still being funded:

·About 300 Department of Agriculture projects that cost about $150 million. These include the study of certain fungi in Wyndmoor, Penn., and Arctic germplasm in Palmer, Alaska. "Under the guidelines given to us, we are not to cut out anything," says Joseph Garbarino, the Agricultural Research Service budget director.

·Army Corps of Engineers projects, such as those for water and wastewater treatment. There were about 2,000 projects in the 2006 budget, including about 50 inserted by members of Congress without administration support. "We can't willy-nilly go stopping and starting things," says Gary Loew of the corps' civil works branch.

In addition, more than 6,000 projects authorized by the five-year, $286 billion transportation bill are financed mostly by the Highway Trust Fund's gas tax revenue. They are not likely to be held up by the Democrats' action.

The White House is considering giving agencies guidelines to follow on earmarks for 2007. "The administration wants to see reforms that provide greater transparency and accountability to the process, and which result in a reduction in number and amount of earmarks," deputy White House budget director Stephen McMillin says.

Ban On Pet Projects Won't Stop Trading (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, December 27, 2006

Democrats may have declared a one-year moratorium on pet projects treasured by members of Congress, but the move will hardly stop horse trading in Washington or moves by lawmakers to try to steer taxpayer money back home.

Nor will it touch billions of dollars in already budgeted Pentagon earmarks, which go to everything from research into better body armor for overseas troops to finding bone marrow matches to treat leukemia patients.

The temporary ban on earmarks — footnotes in spending bills that lawmakers use to deliver federal bacon to their states — has been greeted with applause by budget hawks and is seen as a savvy political move. But many in the rank and file are not happy.

"I've had my share of calls and they weren't to wish me a Merry Christmas," said incoming Appropriations Committee Chairman David Obey, D-Wis.

Earmarks have exploded in number and cost under GOP control of Congress and Congress got a black eye when former Rep. Randy Cunningham, R-Calif., admitted taking $2.4 million in bribes in exchange for earmarking projects to defense contractors. The Bush administration and budget hawks have protested in vain.

Obey and his Senate counterpart Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., have promised to eliminate lawmakers' pet projects as they fashion a catchall spending bill to close out about $463 billion in unfinished budget business — dumped on them by outgoing Republicans.

Byrd and Obey have announced a plan to fund most domestic agency accounts at 2006 levels, with some increases to avoid layoffs of federal employees and for politically sensitive programs such as veterans' medical treatment.

Some of the money to pay for such add-ons will come from accounts used by lawmakers to send earmarks back to their districts and states. But Congress is unlikely to drain all the money from such accounts — which run the gamut from agricultural research, flood control and grants to local police and fire departments, among many others.

That means projects will go ahead in many instances, but it will be up to Bush administration officials, spread throughout dozens of federal agencies, to determine who gets the money. Instead of looking to bills passed by Congress — or rosters of projects listed in accompanying reports — agency chiefs will have enormous discretion to award projects.

In response, lawmakers are likely to pick up the phone and write letters as they lobby agency officials to go ahead with their earmarks.

"We're going to continue to make the strongest case we can to whomever we need to fund projects we believe have a broad, positive impact on the district and are supported by the communities in which they exist," said Betsy Hawkings, chief of staff to Rep. Christopher Shays, R-Conn.

"Even if things aren't always earmarked in report language or in a bill, sometimes there's conversations that occur between members ... and agencies," said Christin Baker, spokeswoman for the White House budget office.

Some Democrats are worried that Bush officials will use their power to help their GOP friends.

"Republican members are going to get their projects and Democratic members will not," said a Democratic staff aide responsible for writing one of nine unfinished appropriations bills. The aide is not authorized to speak with reporters and declined to be quoted by name.

But GOP officials awarding earmarks also need to be careful or run the risk of retribution from powerful Democrats writing agency budgets later next year.

"As Senator Byrd likes to say, everybody has to come back to the watering hole," said Byrd's spokesman, Tom Gavin. "And the Appropriations Committee is the watering hole."

In going forward, Bush officials are likely to fund projects included in its February budget or approved in other bills such as the defense authorization measure.

That would mean construction of federal courthouses and other federal buildings is likely to go forward, as is new housing and other construction on military bases. But earmarks for projects such as grants for after-school programs and local hospitals are more likely to get shelved.

Democratic leaders vow to reform the earmark process by requiring the names of lawmakers be listed along with their projects. And they promise to scale back the number and cost of lawmakers' pet projects.

Some lawmakers are worried that in reducing the number of earmarks, a disproportionate share would go to powerful members of the Appropriations committees and to senior lawmakers, with far fewer given to the rank and file. A chief reason for the massive growth in earmarks is that GOP leaders spread them around to everyone who asked for them.

"People bemoan the 'explosion' of earmarks but what we did was we democratized it," said Rep. James Walsh, R-N.Y., a subcommittee chairman — or "cardinal"_ on the Appropriations Committee. "We took what was the purview of a few so-called cardinals ... and we gave members all across the country the opportunity to give us their priorities."

With Promises Of A Better-Run Congress, Democrats Take On Political Risks (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 23 — Republican rule on Capitol Hill drew to an exhausted end just before dawn on Dec. 9 after lawmakers dispatched a pile of bills that few had read and even fewer had helped write. Democrats say the era of such chaotic and secretive legislating came to a close as well.

After chafing for years under what they saw as flagrant Republican abuse of Congressional power and procedures, the incoming majority has promised to restore House and Senate practices to those more closely resembling the textbook version of how a bill becomes law: daylight debate, serious amendments and minority party participation.

Beyond the parliamentary issues, Democrats assuming control on Jan. 4 said they also wanted to revive collegiality and civility in an institution that has been poisoned by partisanship in recent years. In a gesture duly noted by Republicans, the incoming speaker of the House, Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, offered Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, who is remaining in Congress, the use of prime office space in the Capitol out of respect for his position.

Mrs. Pelosi has consulted with the new Republican leader, Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, in developing initiatives for the year, including a task force to explore independent enforcement of ethics rules. That was in sharp contrast to two years ago, when Republicans — who only grudgingly consulted Democrats — pushed through a set of diluted ethics rules that they were later forced to rescind. Democrats also supported a severance package for senior Republican aides, but the spending was blocked in the last hours of Congress by conservative Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0109360

A statement of principles by House Democrats calls for regular consultation between the Democratic and Republican leaders on the schedule and operations of the House and declares that the heads of House committees should do the same.

"We are going to give people an honest and contemplative body they can be proud of once more," said Representative Louise Slaughter, Democrat of New York and the incoming chairwoman of the Rules Committee.

Veteran Democrats said they did not sense that their colleagues wanted to retaliate against Republicans for perceived slights over the last decade. "We know we won in part because they got so nasty and unlikable," said Representative Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts.

Mr. Frank and Representative Edward J. Markey, a fellow Massachusetts Democrat, pointed to another difference between incoming Democrats and the Republicans who took control in 1995 and saw their mission as one of purging Democrats and hobbling government.

"Democrats want government to work," said Mr. Markey, who under the Republican majority was often frozen out despite his senior position on the Energy and Commerce Committee. "I have not had a conversation where Democrats sit around talking about who they want to get back at."

Yet pledges to engage Republicans legislatively carry risks. If Democrats do not follow through or revert to practices they have spent recent years condemning, they are certain to come under attack from watchdog groups and Republicans. Republicans are already accusing Democrats of backsliding by not guaranteeing them hearings and amendments on legislation to be considered in an initial 100-hour legislative program that Democrats view as a showcase for their new majority.

But Republicans are hoping Democrats stick to their guns and allow the minority a stronger voice on legislation. The opposition leadership said it would take the opportunity to put forward initiatives that could be potentially troublesome for newly elected Democrats in Republican-leaning districts who within months will have to defend their hard-won seats.

"There are going to be days when we will offer alternatives in ways that are going to be very appealing to Democrats in districts the president carried just two years ago," said Representative Roy Blunt of Missouri, who will be the second-ranking House Republican in the 110th Congress.

Republicans see the ability to force tough votes — which they avoided in the majority by stifling Democratic alternatives — as having two potential benefits: It can put vulnerable Democrats on record with positions that might not be popular at home, or it can fracture the untested Democratic majority. Mr. Blunt noted that even senior Democrats who served in Congress when Democrats held control had no experience dealing with a relatively thin, 16-seat majority that will not allow many lawmakers to avoid tough votes.

Democratic leaders said that in the spirit of a new beginning, they have every intention of allowing Republicans the kind of legislative opportunities that Republicans regularly denied Democrats. "Democracy is a risk," said Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the incoming majority leader. "And democracy is about alternatives."

But Mr. Hoyer and other Democrats also said that they were not naïve. If Republicans take the Democratic offer and try to advance politically charged amendments, Democrats will tighten the reins.

"We may well reject amendments which are designed solely for the purposes of creating a 30-second ad," Mr. Hoyer said. "We are not going to be foolish or stupid."

Democrats have not guaranteed Republicans an equal say, and the party's pledge to the minority states only that legislation should "generally" come to a vote under rules that allow "open, full and fair debate."

But to Congress watchers who grew increasingly outraged over Republican conduct of the House during the rule of Mr. Hastert and the majority leader Tom DeLay, the Democrats are definitely heading in the right direction.

"The House has been so egregiously run for a number of years that it was seen as contributing both directly and indirectly to the election results," said Thomas Mann, a Congressional scholar at the Brookings Institution. "There really is a strong political incentive to try to do business differently."

Democrats said explicitly that they would abandon some of the most disputed Republican practices. They point in particular to the vote on Medicare prescription drug legislation in 2003, when Republicans refused to shut off a House vote for three hours so they could twist arms and push the measure through just before sunrise. Democrats stipulate that votes should be completed within 15 minutes and not held open simply to manipulate the outcome.

Democrats are developing a proposal to guarantee that lawmakers have at least 24 hours to examine legislation. They have also called for "an end to the two-day work week" and the beginning of a "predictable, professional, family-friendly schedule that allows the legislative process to proceed in a manner that ensures timely and deliberative dispensation of the work of Congress."

In the House and Senate, the leadership is vowing to conduct full and open conference committees that reconcile differing legislation passed by the two chambers and produce a final bill. In recent years, those sessions have all but disappeared, with senior Republicans hashing out final versions behind closed doors, occasionally adding provisions passed by neither the House nor the Senate. Some of the major legislation approved in the final hours of the past Congress was written in private by just a few lawmakers and aides and rushed to the floor.

Democrats said the Republican majority typically refused to tell them even where the supposedly bicameral, bipartisan conference sessions were being held.

"We are going to have conferences with the House," said Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the incoming majority leader, "real conferences, public conferences, where public issues will be debated and voted upon."

Republicans said that Democrats exaggerated the degree to which they were excluded from legislative operations and that the Republican majority was less oppressive than House Democrats had been in the latter part of their 40-year majority before losing power in 1994. And they said that Democrats did not want to work with them but were more interested in scoring political points.

Democrats disputed those accusations. But even if there is some truth in them, they said, their years in the minority have made them newly sensitive to the need for a more democratic democracy.

"They really had disenfranchised about half of the American citizens," Ms. Slaughter said, referring to her Republican colleagues. "I felt my country was going down the drain. We are going to have a much more open process."

Drug Plan Companies Failed To Tell Of Changes (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 26 — Some prescription drug plans did not inform Medicare beneficiaries of impending changes in their costs and benefits, as they were required to do, Bush administration officials and Congressional aides said Tuesday.

This could be a serious omission in a program where beneficiaries need accurate information to choose among dozens of competing private plans.

Administration officials have told Congress that they may give these beneficiaries a six-week extension of the open-enrollment period, which ends Sunday. Beneficiaries could use the extra time to compare the options that will be available to them in 2007.

Drug benefits are administered by private insurers under contract to Medicare. Premiums, co-payments and the list of covered drugs vary by plan. In general, people who are enrolled in a drug plan and take no action by Sunday will remain in that plan throughout next year.

Even when a Medicare drug plan keeps the same name, its costs and benefits may change substantially on Jan. 1. Medicare officials repeatedly told insurers that they must notify beneficiaries of such changes by Oct. 31 of this year. But some insurers did not send out the "annual notice of change" documents, which can be 30 or 40 pages long.

The administration informed Congress of the problem last week. Administration officials said they would consider imposing penalties on companies that did not provide the necessary information to beneficiaries.

"There could be penalties for plans that did not send out the annual notice of change on time," said Jeff Nelligan, a spokesman for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services.

Mr. Nelligan said he understood that UnitedHealth Group, one of the largest Medicare drug plans, did not send the required notices to some of its beneficiaries in October. He said he did not know how many other plans failed to meet their obligations or how many people were affected.

Tom Koutsoumpas, senior vice president of Ovations, the UnitedHealth unit that serves the Medicare market, confirmed that the company had failed to send timely notices to some people enrolled in its prescription drug plans. He said he believed that Medicare would give those beneficiaries more time to choose a plan.

Peter L. Ashkenaz, a spokesman for UnitedHealth, said that perhaps 200,000 of its beneficiaries had not received the required notices by the Oct. 31 deadline. Even though people have until Dec. 31 to sign up for a plan, the Bush administration urged them to do so by Dec. 8, to avoid problems at the pharmacy.

Mr. Ashkenaz cited two reasons for the delay. UnitedHealth held back some notices because they included erroneous information that had to be corrected, he said. In addition, he said, a company printing the notices "had a fire that delayed production."

In every state but Alaska and Hawaii, more than 50 drug plans are available. Many have increased or reduced their premiums for 2007. Many have added coverage of generic drugs and reduced coverage of brand-name drugs. Some insurers have adopted new techniques to control the use of certain drugs. They can, for example, require doctors to get prior approval for prescriptions and can limit the number of pills given to a patient each month.

Insurers report other problems in the final days of the open-enrollment period. They say they have not received guidance from the government on exactly how to compute the late fees for people who did not join a Medicare drug plan when they were first eligible. The surcharge — an extra 1 percent for each month without drug coverage — adds up quickly.

The surcharge, known as a late enrollment penalty, depends on the number of months that a person went without drug coverage. Many insurers have asked the government whether they should calculate the penalty, based on the number of "uncovered months" reported by a beneficiary, or whether the government will compute the penalty.

In addition, Medicare and Social Security are still trying to straighten out problems in the withholding of prescription drug premiums from Social Security checks. Medicare mistakenly sent premium refunds to tens of thousands of people, and it failed to make the proper deductions for others.

Many insurers said they had experienced long delays in getting Medicare to correct the records on which their payments were based. These records show, for example, the date of a person's enrollment and changes in state of residence.

Most of the changes are supposed to be handled by a government contractor, IntegriGuard Enterprises, a national Medicare fraud-detection company. Teresa Houser, a spokeswoman for the company, said she could not immediately explain the delays. Federal officials noted a large backlog of requests.

Bush levitates

Arkansas motivator

If we were to ask readers to name a musically inclined Southern Baptist politician who grew up in the town of Hope, Ark., who became governor of his state and later chairman of the National Governors Association (NGA), you'd probably answer Bill Clinton.

And you'd be correct.

But did you know that Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee also hails from Hope, is a talented musician (bass guitar), a Baptist churchgoer, and even chaired the NGA? And for more than a year, as was the case with Mr. Clinton, he's been mentioned as a likely contender for the White House.

Next month, just in time for a 2008 candidacy, Mr. Huckabee's newest book, "From Home to Higher Ground," will arrive in bookstores. Our early copy explains how Americans can build a better country through simple lifestyle and attitude changes.

Earlier this year, Mr. Huckabee authored a different sort of motivational book, "Stop Digging Your Grave with a Knife and Fork." The book was an instant best-seller, showing readers how self-discipline, diet and exercise can lead to a happier, healthier lifestyle.

In 2003, the governor was warned by his doctors that he'd be dead within a decade if he didn't lose weight. He immediately began exercising and controlling his diet, and soon lost more than 110 pounds.

Rosie rules

Partly because Washington is world headquarters for the legal profession -- and partly because he delivers the best Christmas gifts to reporters -- Inside the Beltway is pleased once again to present Washington malpractice lawyer Jack H. Olender's (his firm is located at 888 17th Street NW, should you ever find a wrong toe amputated) "Top Ten Legal Predictions for 2007."

We should point out that Mr. Olender's annual predictions have a 90 percent success rate to date. So, without further ado:

1. Old Lawyers Never Die, They Just Lose Their Jobs: Large law firms are terminating lawyers at a defined age -- 65, 68, 70, pick a number. Mandatory retirement is fairly new at law firms, as lawyers with "experience" were once considered a firm's backbone.

2. $200,000 Signing Bonuses Aren't Just for Athletes: The current signing bonus for former Supreme Court clerks joining major law firms is $200,000.

3. More Long-distance Medical Malpractice: Given Americans save as much as 80 percent on surgery in foreign countries, look for more long-distance medical-malpractice claims.

4. More Malpractice by Gynecologists Performing Cosmetic Surgery: Doctors in many specialties are being invited to take crash courses to learn (or so they think) procedures from another specialty.

DOJ_NMG_0109363

5. Animal Law Grows: With a nation of animal lovers, it's no surprise that the number of animal-law practitioners continues to climb.

6. Lawyers Behaving Themselves: State bars and courts have toughened discipline, making lawyers toe the line.

7. Outsource All The Lawyers? Not quite, but lawyers and law firms are outsourcing a lot of their clerical, accounting and, yes, legal work to lawyers and firms in far-away places, such as India.

8. "Deal or No Deal" Contingent Fees: The days when "silk-stocking lawyers" at "white shoe" law firms looked down their collective noses at personal injury and malpractice lawyers who handle cases on a contingent-fee basis are long gone.

9. Bloggers Beware: An $11 million Florida jury award for a woman who claimed she was defamed on an Internet message board sends this message to all bloggers: Watch what you say on the Internet, or risk a damage lawsuit for libel and slander.

10. Employers and Pornography: Civil liability for money damages will become a factor in getting employers to monitor computer use to prevent the transmission of porn, for which employers can be held responsible.

Bonus Prediction -- "The Donald" Won't Sue Rosie: Donald Trump's threatened lawsuit against Rosie O'Donnell won't happen. Mr. Trump is too smart a businessman to file a frivolous lawsuit.

I hereby resolve ...

A reminder that Inside the Beltway is once again collecting New Year's resolutions, inviting readers to tell politicians -- indeed, members of the Democrat-controlled 110th Congress -- what they'd like them to accomplish in the coming year.

Frist Isn't Resting, On His Laurels Or Otherwise (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

Those who think formerly important people in Washington just vegetate once they leave town might note how outgoing Senate Majority Leader Bill "Dr. Video" Frist (R-Tenn.) keeps engaged as he heads out of town.

We got an e-mail just before Christmas, one he apparently sent to all his political action committee contributors, that was just chock-full of fascinating activities.

"We just today got back to Nashville," he writes in the Dec. 22 note, "and are tonight decorating the tree that we bought on the way home from the airport. Karyn and I enjoyed sharing our very last holiday season in our home in Washington over the last week, buying our 'Washington tree' and decorating it and the house extra early this year so we'd have plenty of time to enjoy it with friends as we said our goodbyes. 12 years of memories in that house!!"

But retirees shouldn't reminisce, and Frist won't. "Over the next couple of weeks, Karyn and I and the boys will be on the go; traveling and visiting with family and friends," he writes. For example, he said, he was heading to South Texas with two of his sons and some friends for a father-son hunt.

"Karyn, the boys and I will then spend the 23rd with Karyn's Mother and sister Trisha and their extended family (45 McLaughlins at their biannual McLaughlin family Christmas) in Austin. And then back to Nashville for Christmas Day to join the Frist clan," he writes. "We're rehabbing the home I grew up in, but it's not ready so we are living in the backyard in a garage apartment (now beautifully decorated by Karyn!)."

The key is to keep moving. "Another hunt with the family on the 26th to replicate the traditional southern hunt (at night) that we did exactly four years ago on the night that I became majority leader."

A hint of nostalgia there, but Frist quickly recovers. "I'll spend early January talking with and listening to folk around the country on the new focus for my leadership committee Volunteer PAC (VOLPAC) and promise to send along information before the end of the month."

Okay. Maybe all that doesn't excite you. But at the end of his message, Frist promises real news. "February I'm off on my annual medical mission trip delivering care, doing surgery, and treating AIDS patients in Kenya and Sudan and am so excited that Karyn will join me this year."

So stay active and keep moving. There's always a future presidential run to think about.President Kerrey Makes the Rounds

Speaking of presidential runs, let's remember there are other presidencies out there that offer some of the same trappings as the job in the White House. The New School announced last week that university President Bob Kerrey, another former senator whose presidential campaign quickly evaporated, is headed to India next week, stopping in three major cities "to meet top leaders in government, finance, culture, and education."

Kerrey "will participate in a town hall meeting" in Mumbai, and hold "three press conferences." Not Air Force One, but . . .HR to the Staff: Eat Something

Lots of government and private workforces were allowed to split early last Friday. But the National Science Foundation demanded that workers have lunch before heading out.

An e-mail from Paul Bealafeld in human resources explained how this works.

Bealafeld's e-mail said he was "following up on the director's . . . early dismissal message with the administrative timekeeping rules and procedures."

"Employees and teleworkers may discontinue work 3 hours prior to the end of their normal tour of duty and select administrative leave for the final 3 hours," he said. But "attaching the dismissal to the lunch break and leaving earlier than 3 hours prior to the end of the tour of duty is not authorized [so] the earliest time that employees could leave would be 12:30 p.m. if they signed in at 7 a.m."

Remember, "employees and teleworkers who discontinue work before the 3-hour dismissal are not entitled to any administrative leave and will be charged personal leave from the point of their departure until the end of their scheduled tour of duty for today."

So don't go off on an empty stomach.A White House Leak?

President Bush's pre-Christmas visit to Walter Reed Army Medical Center caused some unexpected problems, judging from an e-mail alert we received. There were the usual traffic rerouting and parking restrictions, from 8 p.m. on Dec. 21 until 2 p.m. the next day.

The e-mail lists 12 such changes likely to frustrate drivers and includes an apology:

Traffic will be blocked temporarily around the campus and re-routed if necessary. Sorry for the incontinence during this mission.

We're sorry, too.

An Early Test For Lawmakers (NYT)

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

Thanks to the 2001 tax cut law, over the next four years the federal government will forgo some $30 billion so America's wealthiest taxpayers can claim bigger write-offs for expenses like dependents and mortgage interest. One-third of those tax cuts kicked in this year, with the rest scheduled to take effect in 2008 and 2010. By then, most of the advantage will go to the top 0.3 percent of Americans — those making more than $1 million a year — who have until now been required to limit the amounts they are allowed to claim for things like the spousal exemption or the mortgage costs on a vacation home.

Over roughly the same period, the government is looking at a $14 billion shortfall in its share of financing for a crucial federal-state program that provides health insurance to poor children, the so-called Schip, or State Children's Health Insurance Program. Without full financing, 1.5 million children will be cut from the program or underserved.

Depriving children of adequate health care while giving the rich tax benefits that were intended for average Americans is flat-out wrong. The new Democratically controlled Congress must move quickly to prevent that. When it convenes in the new year, Congress should pass a law to freeze the tax write-offs at 2007 levels. That will not cause anyone's taxes to rise. But it would free up the money that is needed for children's health insurance.

It would also be an early sign that the new Congress is more in touch with current economic reality than its Republican-led predecessor. When the bolstered write-offs were enacted in 2001 the nation was still flush with the Clinton-era budget surpluses. And while we never supported the notion that tax cuts for the rich were an appropriate way to use the surplus, those championing the cuts could at least make the argument (quickly proved wrong) that the nation could afford it.

Since then, the budget surpluses have disappeared, the nation has gone to war, government services have been cut deeply and the percentage of uninsured children has started to rise again, after declining in every year since 1998. The children urgently need to win this one, and only the new Congress can help them.

OTHER NEWS:

Festive Mood Sustains Stock Indexes Despite Retail Worries In Light Trading (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, December 27, 2006

Stocks entered what investors sometimes call the year-end silly season, putting in widespread gains on thin trading activity as investors ignored disappointing retail-sales reports.

Some analysts credited a sharp decline in oil prices, the biggest in more than a month. Others said the few influential investors at work in the year's waning days were simply betting that the rally that began in July would last through year's end.

DOJ_NMG_0109365

The Dow Jones Industrial Average ended its three-session slump and rebounded 64.41 points, or 0.52%, to 12407.63.

It is up 15.8% this year, less than 70 points from the record 12471.32 hit one week ago.

The day's big news was a series of disappointing holiday-shopping reports from sources including MasterCard and the National Retail Federation, indicating retail-sales gains were lighter than last year. Some analysts said the gains were strong nonetheless, while others said they would appear stronger once gift cards were cashed in next month.

Others said investors were ignoring short-term news, and betting that the year's last week would show stock gains, as it usually does.

"This is just a continuation of the rally we have seen since mid-summer. People are expecting the market to hold up until year end," said Stephen Sachs, director of trading at mutual-fund group Rydex Investments in Rockville, Md. "The retail-sales news is going to be ignored this week, and it will catch up with us next week."

Crude-oil futures fell $1.31, or 2.1%, to $61.10 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Traders said oil investors were looking past tensions with Iran and focusing on mild winter weather, which holds down demand for fuels.

Oil futures are still up 9.5% from the recent 18-month closing low hit on Nov. 17, but are practically unchanged -- up just up 0.1% -- for the year to date.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 0.44%, or 6.14 points, to 1416.90, up 13.5% this year.

The Nasdaq Composite Index advanced 0.51%, or 12.33 points, to 2413.51, ahead 9.4% for the year.

Bond prices rose, pushing yields lower, because investors concluded that the weak retail-sales numbers suggest a soft economy, which will make the Federal Reserve less likely to raise interest rates.

Outside the U.S., stocks declined in dollar terms. Stocks in Japan hit a seven-month high, while China shares set a record. Most major European markets remained closed for Christmas holidays and reopen today. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, fell 0.04%, or 0.08 point, to 240.40.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks advanced1. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 1.02 billion shares, as 2,295 stocks rose and 1,027 fell.

Bond prices gained2. The 10-year Treasury note rose 5/32, or $1.56 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.607%. The 30-year bond was up 13/32 to yield 4.734%.

The dollar strengthened3. Late in New York, it traded at 119.15 yen, up from 118.81, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.3096 from $1.3141.

Former President Ford Dies At 93 (WP)

By J.y. Smith And Lou Cannon

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

Gerald Rudolph Ford Jr., who became the 38th president of the United States as a result of some of the most extraordinary events in American history and sought to restore the nation's confidence in the basic institutions of government, died Tuesday.

His wife, Betty, reported the death in a statement.

"My family joins me in sharing the difficult news that Gerald Ford, our beloved husband, father, grandfather and great grandfather has passed away at 93 years of age," Mrs. Ford said in a brief statement issued from her husband's office in Rancho Mirage, Calif., the Associated Press reported. "His life was filled with love of God, his family and his country."

The statement did not say where Ford died or list a cause of death, according to AP. Ford had battled pneumonia in January 2006 and underwent two heart treatments -- including an angioplasty -- in August at the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn.

President Bush issued a statement about the death shortly after midnight. "President Ford was a great American who gave many years of dedicated service to our country. . . . [H]e assumed the Presidency in an hour of national turmoil and division. With his quiet integrity, common sense, and kind instincts, President Ford helped heal our land and restore public confidence in the Presidency," Bush said. "The American people will always admire Gerald Ford's devotion to duty, his personal character, and the honorable conduct of his administration. We mourn the loss of such a leader . . ."

Ford was the only occupant of the White House never elected either to the presidency or the vice presidency. A former Republican congressman from Grand Rapids, Mich., he always claimed that his highest ambition was to be speaker of the House of Representatives. He had declined opportunities to run for the Senate and for governor of Michigan.

He was sworn in as president on Aug. 9, 1974, when Richard M. Nixon resigned as a result of the Watergate scandal.

"The long national nightmare is over," Ford said in his inaugural address. "I believe that truth is the glue that holds government together, not only our government, but civilization itself. That bond, though strained, is unbroken at home and abroad."

DOJ_NMG_0109366

Ford had become vice president on Dec. 6, 1973, two months after Spiro T. Agnew pleaded no contest to a tax evasion charge and resigned from the nation's second highest office. The former Maryland governor was under investigation for accepting bribes and kickbacks.

In the 2 1/2 years of his presidency, Ford ended the U.S. involvement in the war in Vietnam, helped mediate a cease-fire agreement between Israel and Egypt, signed the Helsinki human rights convention with the Soviet Union and traveled to Vladivostok in the Soviet Far East to sign an arms limitation agreement with Leonid Brezhnev, the Soviet general secretary. Ford also sent the Marines to free the crew of the Mayaguez, a U.S. merchant vessel that was captured by Cambodian communists.

On the domestic front, he faced some of the most difficult economic conditions since the Great Depression, with the inflation rate approaching 12 percent. Chronic energy shortages and price hikes produced long lines and angry citizens at gas pumps. In the field of civil rights, the sense of optimism that had characterized the 1960s had been replaced by an increasing sense of alienation, particularly in the inner cities. The new president also faced a political landscape in which Democrats held large majorities in both the House and the Senate.

But Ford's overriding priority was ending the constitutional and political crisis known as Watergate. It had begun June 17, 1972, when five operatives of Nixon's reelection campaign were caught breaking into Democratic National Committee headquarters in the Watergate office building.

The White House denied any involvement. But as the situation unfolded, the central question was whether Nixon had tried to obstruct the subsequent investigation. A special prosecutor sought answers on tapes Nixon had made of his Oval Office conversations.

The president resisted turning them over on the ground that this would violate executive privilege, but in July 1974, a unanimous Supreme Court ruled against him. Within days, prosecutors found a tape on which Nixon apparently ordered a cover-up. The House Judiciary Committee approved three articles of impeachment. Faced with the virtual certainty of a trial by the Senate, Nixon resigned.

Ford believed that his signal achievement was healing the national divisiveness caused by the "poisonous wounds" of Watergate, as he put it in his inaugural speech. "There is no question that this is the thing I contributed," Ford said 30 years later in an Aug. 25, 2004, interview with The Washington Post at his summer home in Beaver Creek, Colo.

When he assumed office, Ford immediately made clear his intention to change what historian Arthur M. Schlesinger Jr. called "the imperial presidency."

He was "acutely aware," Ford said in his inaugural address, that he had not been elected to the position he held, and he asked Americans "to confirm me as your president with your prayers." He said he had neither sought the presidency nor made any "secret promises" to attain it.

"In all my public and private acts as your president, I expect to follow my instincts of openness and candor with full confidence that honesty is always the best policy at hand," he said.

". . . Our Constitution works; our great republic is a government of laws and not of men. Here the people rule. But there is a higher power, by whatever name we honor Him, who ordains not only righteousness but love, not only justice but mercy.

"As we bind up the internal wounds of Watergate, more painful and more poisonous than those of foreign wars, let us restore the Golden Rule to our political process, and let brotherly love purge our hearts of suspicion and hate."

A new spirit was soon evident in the nation's leadership. The Oval Office, long a fortress for an embittered president who frequently fled its confines to his homes in San Clemente, Calif., or Key Biscayne, Fla., was thrown open to members of Congress, old friends, public officials, reporters.

The new president's approval rating reached 71 percent. He was photographed making his own breakfast. He was freely contradicted by his eldest son, and his aides spoke what was on their minds without waiting for official clearance. He appointed Jerald F. terHorst, a respected Washington correspondent, as his chief spokesman.

This euphoric honeymoon lasted precisely one month.

On Sept. 8, Ford granted Nixon a full pardon for all federal crimes he had "committed or may have committed" when he was in the White House. The only acknowledgement he received in return was a six-paragraph statement from Nixon in San Clemente saying that "I can see clearly now . . . that I was wrong in not acting more decisively only in dealing with Watergate, particularly when it reached the stage of judicial proceedings and grew from a political scandal into a national tragedy."

Ford said the pardon was necessary to bring Watergate to a close, that he would have had to pardon Nixon sometime in any case, and that it was easier to do it sooner than later.

The response was a tidal wave of criticism. Every opinion poll showed a large majority of Americans opposed the pardon. It was denounced in Congress, including by members of Ford's own party. Republican officials gloomily and accurately forecast that it had reintroduced the Watergate issue into the 1974 elections, which proved to be a Democratic landslide. White House spokesman terHorst resigned in protest.

DOJ_NMG_0109367

It was widely assumed that Ford had doomed his political career. By January 1975, his approval rating had plummeted to 36 percent. Not even two assassination attempts, both in California in 1975, generated significant popular support.

The consequences included a three-month delay in confirmation of Ford's choice of former governor Nelson A. Rockefeller of New York as vice president. In congressional hearings, it was disclosed that Rockefeller had made large private gifts to employees on the New York State payroll and that he had played a hidden role in financing a campaign book against Democratic gubernatorial nominee Arthur J. Goldberg. The disclosures undermined his ability to play an influential role in the Ford administration.

Many conservative Republicans in Congress joined Democrats in opposing Ford's programs. In mid-1975, Gov. Ronald Reagan of California, the darling of the right wing of the GOP, announced his intention to seek the Republican presidential nomination in 1976.

Ford beat back the Reagan challenge, but he narrowly lost the general election in November 1976, to the Democratic candidate, former governor Jimmy Carter of Georgia.

Asked in his 2004 interview with The Washington Post if the pardon had hurt him in the 1976 election, Ford replied: "It probably did. It was a close election, as you know . . . there is a group of bitter people who never forgave me and probably voted against me, and the net result is that they probably helped that I didn't win."

Ford closed strongly against Carter after trailing by as much as 30 points in the polls but was damaged by asserting during a debate that Poland was not under Soviet domination. Against the advice of aides who told him this was a blunder, Ford stubbornly waited several days before correcting himself. The impression of bumbling was exacerbated by reports of his purported clumsiness. During a trip to Austria, he tripped and fell while leaving Air Force One and there were several photographs of him falling while skiing.

But Carter began his own term with a graceful tribute that stands as the general assessment of the Ford presidency: "For myself and for our nation," Carter said in his inaugural address, "I want to thank my predecessor for all he has done to heal our land."

Throughout his years in Washington, Ford had a reputation for hard work, patience and self-confidence. These qualities gained him a place in the inner circles of the Congress. He was helped also by the fact that politically he was a man of the center. He was an internationalist in foreign affairs, a moderate on civil rights and social questions and a conservative on fiscal matters.

His standing in the government was evident in 1963 when President Lyndon B. Johnson named him to the commission that investigated the assassination of President John F. Kennedy. In 1965, he was elected minority leader of the House, the top Republican position in a House controlled by Democrats. He held that post until he became vice president.

When he retired from the White House, Ford wrote his memoirs, established his presidential library at the University of Michigan, served on the boards of various corporations, gave hundreds of speeches, played golf and divided his time between homes in Rancho Mirage, Calif., and Beaver Creek, Colo.

He apparently had no second thoughts about his career. "Once I determine to move, I seldom, if ever, fret," he wrote in his memoirs. It was one of the most notable aspects of his character and he never wavered from it.

In 1983, he told The Post that losing to Carter "truly hurt," but that he had been "doing as good a job as possible under very difficult circumstances" and that he was not going to "sit around and cry about it."

Instead of complaining, Ford pitched in to help his party. In 1980, he campaigned hard for his old foe, Reagan, who decisively defeated Carter. "I'm a political realist," Ford told The Post in 2004 in looking back on this election. "You win some and you lose some, and you have to accept the responsibility to do what you think in the bigger perspective. I sure didn't want Jimmy Carter to be president again in 1980 because I was very sour on his performance as president."

In the late 1970s, the Ford family received expressions of respect and sympathy from all over the country when former first lady Betty Ford described her successful struggle against addiction to alcohol and prescription drugs and how her husband and children had persuaded her that she needed help. The Betty Ford Clinic in Rancho Mirage, Calif., was named in her honor and became one of the nation's leading centers for the treatment of substance abuse.

In 1981, at the request of President Reagan, Ford joined Nixon and Carter in representing the United States at the funeral of Egyptian President Anwar Sadat. The three former chief executives flew to Cairo aboard Air Force One, and Ford and Carter began a warm friendship during the flight.

In 1999, President Bill Clinton conferred on Ford the Medal of Freedom, the nation's highest civilian honor. He also received the Congressional Medal of Honor. In 2000, when he was hospitalized after suffering minor strokes during the Republican National Convention in Philadelphia, there was an enormous outpouring of public affection and concern.

In "Years of Renewal," the third volume of his memoirs, which was published in 1999, Henry Kissinger, Ford's secretary of state, offered this assessment of the former president:

DOJ_NMG_0109368

"With Ford, what one saw was what one got. Providence smiled on Americans when -- seemingly by happenstance -- it brought forward a president who embodied our nation's deepest and simplest values."

In a passage on present-day politics, Kissinger drew an implicit distinction between Ford and subsequent White House occupants.

"The modern politician is less interested in being a hero than a superstar," he wrote. "Heroes walk alone; stars derive their status from approbation. Heroes are defined by inner values, stars by consensus. When a candidate's views are forged in focus groups and ratified by television anchor-persons, insecurity and superficiality become congenital. Radicalism replaces liberalism, and populism masquerades as conservatism."

In Kissinger's view, Ford was a leader in the heroic mold.

Born Leslie Lynch King Jr. on July 14, 1913, in Omaha, Neb., the future president was the offspring of a brief, failed marriage between Leslie King, a wealthy Wyoming wool merchant, and Dorothy Gardner King. The Kings divorced the following January, and she returned to her parents' home in Grand Rapids.

Soon thereafter, she married Gerald R. Ford, a young paint salesman whom she had met at an Episcopal Church social. He formally adopted her child, who was renamed Gerald R. Ford Jr. The Fords subsequently had three other boys.

Both Grand Rapids and Gerald Ford's paint-selling business prospered in the first years of the marriage. TerHorst, the former press secretary-turned-biographer, recounts that Gerald Ford Sr. "owned a touring car and there was enough money to take Mrs. Ford and young Jerry to Florida for vacations."

The future president was athletic, outgoing and happy in his youth. He became an adequate student, an outstanding football player, and an Eagle Scout. Later, when his father's business declined during the Depression, he tried to help by taking a $2-a-week lunch-counter job.

In the custom of those years, he had not been told that he was an adopted child. He found out abruptly when his well-to-do biological father, on the way to Detroit to pick up a new Lincoln, dropped by the lunch counter where his son worked and told him.

Leslie King invited his son to spend the summer with him in Wyoming after he graduated from high school. Ford turned him down, but he was shocked by the discovery of his adoption.

As terHorst recounted in "Gerald Ford and the Future of the Presidency": "Inside Jerry Ford, the hurt was deep." He quoted Ford as saying: "I thought, 'Here I was, earning $2 a week and trying to get through school, my stepfather was having difficult times. Yet here was my real father, obviously doing quite well if he could pick up a new Lincoln.' "

This incident occurred in 1930, the year Ford turned 17 and was a senior at South High School in Grand Rapids. He was an all-city center on the South High football team, which won the state championship that year.

Ford's football prowess opened a window to college, and his coach and some alumni from the University of Michigan provided him with a scholarship and a job waiting on tables. He was a benchwarmer behind an all-American center for two years, while Michigan won back-to-back Big Ten football championships.

Not until 1934, in his senior year, did Gerald Ford win a starting place on Michigan's football team. Then he was voted the most valuable player on a team that lost seven of eight games and offered professional football contracts with the Green Bay Packers and Chicago Bears. But Ford said in his autobiography that he thought the law would be a better career.

Ford graduated from the university in 1935 with a B average. He accepted a $2,400-a-year offer to serve as boxing coach and assistant football coach at Yale, meanwhile applying to Yale Law School. The law school turned him down in the belief that he would not be able to do well in his studies while coaching.

Ford was accepted on a trial basis in 1938 and did well enough in a couple of courses to be allowed to enroll full time. He graduated in 1941 in the upper third of his class with his best work in a course on legal ethics.

Returning to Grand Rapids, he founded a law practice with Philip W. Buchen, a fellow Michigan graduate who had been partly crippled by polio in childhood.

Already Ford was drawn to politics. He had become active in Grand Rapids the previous summer in the campaign of Republican presidential candidate Wendell Willkie, who went down under Franklin D. Roosevelt's third-term candidacy, but who carried Michigan. Ford's interest in Willkie revealed a consistent "internationalist" bent that was evident in all of his succeeding political conflicts.

The Willkie campaign also drew Ford into local Republican affairs, where he sided with a reform group known as The Home Front, which was seeking to break the power of an entrenched Republican boss.

Ford's budding political interests were interrupted by World War II. He joined the Navy and spent 47 months on active duty, two years of this time on the aircraft carrier U.S.S. Monterey, where he was once nearly swept over the side during a typhoon. He left the Navy in 1946 with the rank of lieutenant commander.

DOJ_NMG_0109369

He resumed his legal career in Grand Rapids and became active in a variety of community projects, culminating in 1949 when the national Junior Chamber of Commerce selected him as one of the nation's "10 most outstanding young men."

The year of 1948, when President Harry S.Truman was confounding pollsters by winning an upset victory over Thomas Dewey, was a time of decision for Gerald Ford. He ran for the U.S. House of Representatives in what seemed to be a hopeless battle against the entrenched Republican conservative, Bartel J. Jonkman, of western Michigan's 5th congressional district.

Jonkman was of Dutch descent, and the Dutch were the largest single ethnic group in the district. He was considered an isolationist who opposed American involvement overseas in general and aid to Europe as proposed by President Truman under the European Recovery Plan in particular.

In retrospect, Ford seemed to have been in tune with the changing times. American involvement in World War II had dissipated isolationist sentiment in the nation's heartland. The internationalist Willkie had done well in Michigan as early as 1940, and Sen. Arthur Vandenberg of Michigan, the senior Republican on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, had dramatically shifted from an isolationist to an internationalist position during the war.

Vandenberg was a political opponent of Jonkman, the senior Republican on the House Foreign Affairs Committee, and he encouraged Ford's seemingly hopeless candidacy. Jonkman also was considered by some local Republicans to be spending too little time in his home district. Ford waged a vigorous handshaking campaign, aided by members of the reform group he sided with before the war. He had the support of the largest daily newspaper in the district, the pro-Vandenberg and anti-isolationist Grand Rapids Press.

In the September primary, Ford defeated Jonkman, 23,632 votes to 14,341. He won the general election with more than 60 percent of the votes, a feat he repeated in each of the following 12 elections.

Ford had proposed marriage on February 1948, to Elizabeth Bloomer Warren, a dancer and former model, and she had accepted. But the couple kept their plans secret out of concern that her background as a dancer and a divorced woman would have an adverse effect in the Republican primary among Dutch Calvinist voters in the district.

They were married Oct. 15, 1948, in Grace Episcopal Church, which Ford attended. They had four children, Michael Gerald Ford, John Gardner Ford, Steven Meigs Ford and Susan Ford Vance.

In Washington, Ford occupied an office in what is now the Cannon House Office Building. Next door was a Democrat from Massachusetts named John F. Kennedy. Ford also formed a friendship with Richard Nixon, then a second-term House member from California.

Ford quickly established himself as a district-service congressman who answered every letter and made himself available to visitors from his state. He staffed a trailer with aides who traveled from town to town in his district. He won political points by taking stands that struck responsive chords among his constituents, such as a 1953 appeal that the United States admit 50,000 Dutch immigrants after disastrous floods in the Netherlands.

Constituent service also was the watchword of Sen. Vandenberg, whom Ford admired almost reverentially and who, in turn, considered the new House member something of a protege. When Vandenberg died in 1952, Ford briefly considered running for his seat but decided to stay in the House.

Ford became as popular among his House colleagues as he had been in Grand Rapids. He found time to golf, swim and ski, and he was accepted into the Chowder and Marching Society, a group of House members that has always welcomed former athletes.

The new congressman was named to the assignment of his choice, the politically helpful House Public Works Committee, in his first term. In only his second term, in 1951, he was appointed to the influential House Appropriations Committee.

On foreign policy, Ford remained true to the issues he had espoused in his first campaign. He supported Truman's "Point Four" program for aiding underdeveloped countries, and he consistently favored foreign military aid. His internationalism displayed itself again in candidate preferences, and he supported the nomination of Dwight D. Eisenhower at a time when Sen. Robert Taft of Ohio was favored by most Midwestern Republicans in Congress.

On domestic issues, Ford was an orthodox Republican. He voted against public housing, against the minimum wage and against repeal of the "right-to-work law" provision of the Taft-Hartley Act.

On civil rights issues, he was considered a Republican moderate during most of his career. He voted against the poll tax, a device to keep the poor -- especially blacks -- from voting, when it was an inflammatory issue, and he voted for the 1964 Civil Rights Act and the 1965 Voting Rights Act. But he also opposed school busing to achieve racial integration, a position that disappointed members of the Congressional Black Caucus, all of them Democrats estranged from the policies of the Nixon administration. Only one member of the caucus, Rep. Andrew J. Young of Georgia, voted to confirm Ford as vice president, and Young admitted to having "grave doubts."

Republican colleagues in the House considered him progressive on making the House a more responsive institution.

DOJ_NMG_0109370

His first vote in Congress was in favor of changing House rules to make it easier to bring a bill up on the floor without clearance from the House Rules Committee. When he became House Republican leader, he promoted a series of task forces aimed at giving younger members an opportunity at leadership.

During the two Eisenhower administrations, when Democrats held a congressional majority for all except the 1952-1954 term, Ford gradually advanced toward House leadership. He held a senior position on the Appropriations Committee and played a growing role in GOP strategy councils. In 1960, a poll of Washington correspondents undertaken by Newsweek rated him second among the ablest members of Congress.

Ford's breakthrough into a major position of leadership occurred in 1963, when he was the candidate of a group of younger Republicans, slightly to their party's left of center, to challenge 67-year-old Charles B. Hoeven of Iowa for chairmanship of the House Republican Conference.

Ford defeated Hoeven by an 86-to-78 vote, which he jokingly used to refer to as "a landslide." He went from there, in January 1965, to oust Charles A. Halleck of Indiana from the House minority leader post he had held for six years in a 73-to-67 secret ballot.

One of the public highlights of the Ford minority leadership was a weekly news conference with Sen. Everett M. Dirksen (R-Ill.), which quickly became know as the "Ev and Jerry Show." Ford lacked Dirksen's oratorical talents, and he sometimes found himself on the losing end of exchanges with the Illinois senator.

It was at this period of his career that Ford was on the receiving end of two well-publicized gibes of President Johnson. The president once suggested that Ford couldn't "chew gum and walk at the same time" and also commented that "there's nothing wrong with Gerald Ford except he played football too long without a helmet."

Ford incorporated this last remark into some of his own speeches, correctly giving the original authorship to former Detroit Mayor Gerald Cavanaugh.

However, House colleagues on both sides of the aisle disputed the idea that Ford was less than bright. They pointed to his shrewd, effective leadership in the House and his mastery of such complexities as the defense budget.

What Ford lacked, according to one of the influential Republicans who knew him best, was a capacity for inspirational expression.

"I'd like to see him give more of a look of leadership than his pedestrian quality, but that's Jerry," this colleague said five months after the beginning of the Ford presidency. "He didn't make inspirational speeches as minority leader and he doesn't make them as president of the United States."

Ford's accomplishments as a House leader were based not upon his public pronouncements but upon a talent for friendly persuasion attested to by many Republicans and Democrats.

"It's the damnedest thing," said Rep. Joe Waggonner (D-La.). "Jerry just puts his arm around a colleague or looks him in the eye, says, 'I need your vote,' and gets it."

Most of Ford's public declarations in the mid-1960s were orthodox, oppositionist rhetoric, peppered with football expressions of "end runs" and "team play." He said the Johnson administration was taking the country into "frustration and failure, bafflement and boredom." Once he said, "If Lincoln were alive today, he'd be spinning in his grave."

Occasionally, however, Ford was capable of defining his own political moderation in words that set him apart from the Nixon administration, which he was soon to defend.

In a speech at Southern Methodist University on Nov. 8, 1968, he said: "The higher ground of moderation with unselfish unity is not only common horse sense for a political party, it is also representative of the people and in keeping with the underlying genius of the American political system."

In 1970, Ford was accused of abandoning the high ground of American politics when he launched an effort to impeach William O. Douglas, the liberal associate justice of the U.S. Supreme Court. In the course of the incident, he offered a definition -- much quoted during the Clinton years -- of what constitutes an impeachable offense.

Ostensibly, it was Ford's idea to impeach Douglas because of the appearance of excerpts of a book by the jurist in the Evergreen Review alongside material that Ford said was pornographic. However, after he became president, Ford admitted he had been helped by John N. Mitchell, the attorney general in the first Nixon administration, who was angry about Senate rejection of two of Nixon's Supreme Court nominees.

The charges presented by Ford were primarily political and made numerous references to Douglas's alleged "liberal" or "leftist" beliefs. Ford described Douglas's book, "Points of Rebellion," as "a fuzzy harangue." Responding to congressional critics who said that these charges had nothing whatever to do with judicial misconduct, Ford said on April 15, 1970:

"What, then, is an impeachable offense? The only honest answer is that an impeachable offense is whatever a majority of the House of Representatives considers it to be at a given moment in history."

The impeachment resolution was shunted to a House Judiciary subcommittee, which found no grounds for taking action.

DOJ_NMG_0109371

Ford's severest intra-party critic on this issue was Rep. Paul N. McCloskey Jr., a maverick Republican from California, who considered the impeachment effort an attack on judicial independence. It was reflective of Ford's personal stature in the House and of his desire to preserve a wide range of views within the Republican Party that he and McCloskey remained good friends.

Ford's consistent advocacy of military preparedness and his internationalism made him an early supporter of the Vietnam war. When Johnson sent a half million troops to Vietnam in 1965, Ford emerged as a partisan critic who said that the United States should take sterner measures, such as the bombing of North Vietnam and a naval blockade, in an effort to end the conflict.

"It is President Johnson's war, because the president plays everything close to the vest,' Ford said on June 18, 1966. "He has an unhealthy passion for secrecy."

The use of the phrase "Johnson's war" brought Ford a rebuke from some Republicans, among them, Sen. Dirksen.

Ford served as permanent chairman of the 1968 Republican Convention, which nominated Nixon for president. In his speech to that convention, Ford emphasized failures of U.S. policy in Vietnam and military preparedness.

"Our military strength has dangerously declined compared to that of the communist world," Ford said. "We should rebuild our military power to the point where no aggressor would dare attack us."

When Nixon became president, Ford loyally supported his Vietnam policy, including the incursions into Laos and Cambodia and the bombing of North Vietnam. He later gave Nixon full credit for withdrawing U.S. troops from the war.

The new Nixon administration changed Ford's role from leader of the usually loyal opposition to outspoken advocate of the Republican president. Ford supported the president nearly nine of 10 times on legislation and on almost all important issues. Until the last few weeks of the Watergate crisis he steadfastly refused to believe that Nixon himself might be seriously implicated.

Ford's loyalty was rewarded after Agnew's resignation when Nixon nominated him for the vice presidency. Ford was the second choice after former secretary of the treasury John B. Connally, but Nixon was persuaded by various Republicans that Congress would not confirm Connally, a former Democrat.

Ford's nomination was the first made under the 25th Amendment and it touched off a detailed inquiry into his background and financial affairs by the two congressional judiciary committees.

One of the charges investigated was leveled in a 1972 book by former Washington lobbyist Robert N. Winter-Berger, a self-styled influence peddler who said that he had lent Ford $15,000 that was never repaid.

Winter-Berger was unable to produce any documentation and he contradicted himself frequently in testimony, once saying that he had written with "literary license."

His colleagues absolved Ford and he was subsequently confirmed 92 to 3 in the Senate and 387 to 35 vote in the House, despite opposition from the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (now known simply as the NAACP) and Americans for Democratic Action.

The action of both groups was based largely on Ford's civil rights record as they perceived it. Joseph L. Rauh Jr., the national vice chairman of the ADA, said Ford had been "a divisive influence on civil rights legislation at every turn."

Ford spent the better part of the next 10 months trying to defend Nixon on the Watergate issue, while at the same time condemning the practices of political espionage, lying and obstruction of justice uncovered in the Watergate scandal.

While he never criticized Nixon personally, he tried on several occasions to distance himself from the Nixon White House, most noticeably on March 31, 1974, when he told a Midwestern Republican conference in Chicago that the party must "learn the lessons of Watergate."

But it was not until the weekend before Nixon's resignation that Ford stopped proclaiming belief in Nixon's personal innocence. And it was not until the day before Nixon bid farewell to his high office in a nationally televised speech that Ford actually assembled a transition team.

In the aftermath of the Nixon pardon, Ford's political vulnerability was evident in his efforts to deal with Vietnam and its legacy.

He surprised many Americans by unveiling, in a speech to a Veterans of Foreign Wars convention, a conditional-amnesty plan for Vietnam-era draft evaders and deserters. The proposal drew a swarm of critics. Veterans groups opposed any amnesty program while organizations such as the American Civil Liberties Union called for unconditional amnesty. Of the estimated 100,000 draft evaders, only about 20,000 took advantage of the program. Ford said in his memoirs that he was inspired by President Abraham Lincoln's offer of amnesty to Civil War deserters who swore allegiance to the union.

Although U.S. combat troops had been withdrawn by the time Ford took office, Washington was still committed to supporting the non-communist government in Saigon. With conservative backing, the president proposed an increase in aid for the South Vietnamese government to help it resist what was expected to be a major effort by the North Vietnamese communists to drive it out of the country.

There was little support for this in the new Congress. Early in 1975, it rejected Ford's proposals, turning a deaf ear to arguments that Washington had to stand by its beleaguered ally to maintain its credibility in world affairs.

The communist offensive began in April, 1975, and Ford ordered the small remaining contingent of U.S. embassy and security personnel to leave. The final evacuation produced painful pictures of Americans in retreat -- officials scrambling to get aboard helicopters while Marines held back crowds of Vietnamese who had loyally supported the United States.

On April 23, 1975, in a speech at Tulane University, Ford announced that the war in Vietnam was "finished as far as America is concerned."

A week later, Saigon fell to the communists and the long war was over.

On May 12, communist Khmer Rouge forces seized the Mayaguez, a U.S. merchant ship, in the Gulf of Thailand off the coast of Cambodia and took the 30-member crew hostage.

In the wake of the withdrawal from Vietnam, the Ford administration felt compelled to demonstrate decisively that it would protect U.S. citizens. A second reason was the president's determination to avoid a reprise of the USS Pueblo incident in 1968, in which a Navy spy ship had been captured by North Korea and its crew held under harsh conditions for a year.

The president ordered U.S. planes to bomb Cambodia. Marines invaded Koh Tang island, where the 30-member crew had initially been taken. But U.S. intelligence had lost track of the prisoners. By the time the Marines landed, the captives had been taken to the mainland and released. The Marines fought a daylong battle against a powerful Khmer Rouge force and were withdrawn from the beach by helicopter. More Americans were killed in the operation than were freed.

In retrospect, Ford came to the view that U.S. policy in Vietnam was mistaken. He blamed this on an unthinking inheritance of French colonial policy. "The French had the wrong policy, and we inherited it, and our State Department was not smart enough to realize that we should have been more objective about our policy in Vietnam," Ford said in the 2004 interview with The Post. Asked if the United States should have withdrawn sooner than it did, he said: "Absolutely, in retrospect. Now I wasn't strong enough to make that decision while I was in the White House but in reflection, there is no question."

Elsewhere in foreign affairs, Ford tried to play a mediator's role in fighting between Greeks and Turks on Cyprus. He was unsuccessful in preventing Congress from cutting off military aid to Turkey.

In the Middle East, he continued the Nixon policy of using Kissinger as a mediator between Israel and the Arab states in the Middle East. An agreement signed in September 1975 halted fighting between Israel and Egypt.

In the previous month, Ford had traveled to Helsinki to sign an accord that recognized the existing frontiers between states, including the border between East and West Germany. This implicitly recognized Soviet domination of Eastern Europe. In return, Moscow agreed to respect basic human rights and to ease restrictions on the free exchange of information and on emigration and travel within the Soviet Union.

Ford was criticized for signing the Helsinki Accords at a time when the news media were reporting numerous human rights violations in the Soviet Union, including the refusal to allow Soviet Jews to emigrate to Israel. But the president said in his autobiography, "A Time to Heal" (1979), he regarded the agreement as "a real victory for our foreign policy" because the Soviets had conceded that national borders could be changed by peaceful means.

The president also traveled to Vladivostok to negotiate a tentative new missile limitation agreement with the Soviet Union, a mission that was successful although critics of the agreement said the limits were too high.

But it was the domestic economy that proved the touchstone of Ford's presidency. The problems included inflation, rising unemployment -- it passed 9 percent, the highest level since the Great Depression -- and skyrocketing energy costs.

Soon after taking office, Ford said inflation was "public enemy No. 1." To fight it, he vetoed more than 50 spending bills. He also announced a 32-point program for fighting it, which he called "WIN," an acronym for "Whip Inflation Now."

Congress declined to enact most of Ford's anti-inflation proposals, however, and the WIN program was overtaken by the events of deepening recession. In January 1975, the president all but declared a cease-fire in his war on inflation and turned his attention to growing unemployment and sinking productivity.

In one of the most candid State of the Union messages ever presented to Congress, Ford in 1975 said:

"I must say to you that the State of the Union is not good. Millions of Americans are out of work. Recession and inflation are eroding the money of millions more. Prices are too high and sales are too slow."

Ford followed this message with a budget proposal that predicted long-term unemployment and massive deficits. His essential answer to what he conceived as the twin problems of the economy and the energy crisis was a quick tax rebate to stimulate the economy and oil tariff increases to lessen American dependence on foreign oil.

In 1976, Congress passed a tax reform act. It included tax cuts larger than those Ford had proposed, but he signed the bill into law. He resisted plans for public works projects to create jobs.

DOJ_NMG_0109373

Despite the seriousness and the variety of the problems that confronted him, Ford maintained his even-tempered composure and his optimism. He met frequently with a wide range of legislators, businessmen, labor officials, heads of state, reporters and other visitors.

He knew that his chances of winning a full term in 1976 were not good, but he approached it in the spirit of Truman, whose bust he placed next to his desk in the Oval Office.

Truman, Ford used to say, "had guts, he was plain-talking, he had no illusions about being a great intellectual, but he seemed to make the right decisions."

Many would say the same of Gerald Rudolph Ford.

J.Y. Smith wrote obituaries for The Washington Post until his death in January, 2006.

Gerald Ford Dies At 93 (LAT)

By Robert L. Jackson

The Los Angeles Times, December 27, 2006

Gerald R. Ford, who as the 38th president of the United States helped restore the nation's political stability after the trauma of the Watergate scandal, has died, his widow, Betty, announced Tuesday night.

"My family joins me in sharing the difficult news that Gerald Ford, our beloved husband, father, grandfather and great-grandfather, has passed away at 93 years of age," the former first lady said in a brief statement issued from her husband's office in Rancho Mirage. "His life was filled with love of God, his family and his country."

He died at 6:45 p.m. Tuesday at his home in Rancho Mirage. No cause of death was released.

Ford had been in declining health for several years. In August he had a cardiac pacemaker implanted during a stay at the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn. A few days later, he underwent a second heart procedure when stents were placed into two of his coronary arteries to increase blood flow.

With Ford's death, George H.W. Bush, 82, becomes the oldest living former president. He and President Carter were both born in 1924, but Bush was born in June and Carter in October.

President George W. Bush's chief of staff, Joshua B. Bolten, told Bush of Ford's death just before 8 p.m. PST, Deputy White House Press Secretary Scott Stanzel said. Bush, at his ranch near Crawford, Texas, called Betty Ford about an hour later "to express his personal condolences," Stanzel said.

In a prepared statement released by the White House, said Bush and First Lady Laura Bush were "greatly saddened" by Ford's death. "The American people will always admire Gerald Ford's devotion to duty, his personal character, and the honorable conduct of his administration," the statement said. "We mourn the loss of such a leader, and our 38th president will always have a special place in our nation's memory. On behalf of all Americans, Laura and I offer our deepest sympathies to Betty Ford and all of President Ford's family. Our thoughts and prayers will be with them in the hours and days ahead."

Ford, a Republican, served first as vice president and then as president without benefit of election. He was House minority leader in 1973 when he was chosen by President Nixon to serve as vice president after Spiro T. Agnew was forced to resign because of financial irregularities. Less than a year later, Ford was thrust into the Oval Office when Nixon resigned because of Watergate.

Ford took the presidential oath at 12:03 p.m. on Friday, Aug. 9, 1974, in a nationally televised ceremony in the East Room of the White House. Once sworn in, he stepped to a microphone to address the cameras and hundreds of tearful staffers who had just waved goodbye to Nixon's helicopter as it rose from the White House lawn.

"Our long national nightmare is over," Ford said. "Our Constitution works; our great republic is a government of laws and not of men."

Untainted himself by Watergate, Ford was left the task of restoring public confidence in an institution badly damaged by the corrosive constitutional crisis that, until Nixon's resignation, was spiraling toward the president's impeachment and conviction in the Senate.

But, after serving barely a month as president, Ford made the controversial decision to grant Nixon a blanket pardon for any crimes he may have committed while in office. Many thought Ford's move fueled national cynicism about government and the officials who ran it. Others thought it was the correct decision to move the country past Watergate.

Ford defended his actions by saying he had hoped to end the bitter debate over whether to prosecute Nixon, which had become a serious distraction for the White House. He conceded after his narrow defeat by Carter in 1976, however, that the pardon had had "an adverse impact" on his popular support, although he maintained that he had made the "right decision."

Ford took over a disoriented and virtually immobilized administration at a time of mounting problems. Abroad, the long, costly U.S. military presence in Southeast Asia was nearing an end. At home, an economy warped by inflation and energy shortages was sliding into a recession.

The new president sought to distinguish his habits from the perception that his predecessor ran an imperial presidency. Ford replaced Nixon's aides, and White House officials became more accessible than they had been in years. Trust and civility began to reappear in White House relations with Congress and the public.

One morning, he invited the White House press corps to chat with him while he ate a typical breakfast. As photographers snapped away, Ford sliced and buttered his own English muffins in the manner of the Upper Midwesterner he was.

Although Ford defended the American commitment in Southeast Asia after most U.S. officeholders had written it off as political poison, he showed early sensitivity as president to the domestic divisions left by the unpopular conflict.

To promote "the rebuilding of peace among ourselves," he initiated a conditional clemency plan that he said would give draft dodgers and deserters a chance to "work their way back" to full citizenship.

Supporters praised Ford for integrity, openness and stubborn determination. His detractors called him unimaginative and outdated, an accidental president unqualified for the White House. A public perception of Ford as a fumbler took shape after a series of minor accidents was exploited in derisive commentary and cartoons.

He survived two attempts on his life. Both occurred in California in the same month — September 1975.

On the morning of Sept. 5, a young woman named Lynette "Squeaky" Fromme, a member of the Charles Manson family who had not been involved in Manson-related murders, aimed a borrowed .45-caliber pistol at Ford as he crossed a park near the state Capitol in Sacramento. The gun misfired as a Secret Service agent grabbed her arm.

Less than three weeks later, on Sept. 22, Sara Jane Moore, later diagnosed as psychologically disturbed, fired a shot at Ford from across the street as he emerged from the St. Francis Hotel in San Francisco. A retired Marine who saw Moore raise the gun struck her arm and deflected the shot. Again, Ford was not injured.

Both women were convicted for the attempted assassinations and were sentenced to life imprisonment.

But more fundamental problems confronted Ford's administration and, indirectly, his candidacy for an elected presidential term of his own.

Although the end of the Vietnam War in May 1975 meant that the nation was technically at peace for the first time in 11 years, international tensions continued. The administration was in a drawn-out confrontation with Congress on military posture, foreign policy and controls over covert intelligence operations.

On the foreign policy front, Ford — with help from holdover Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger — played a leading role in the Helsinki Accords, in which the Soviet Union in 1975 agreed to basic freedoms of religion and conscience for all peoples. Although some dismissed the accords as worthless, some historians now believe they paved the way for later democratic reforms among the Soviet people.

Domestically, Ford sought to slay the twin beasts of a deepening recession and ballooning inflation with an economic program that was largely ineffective. He dubbed it "Whip Inflation Now," using the acronym WIN. Unemployment in 1975 had reached 9.2%, a 34-year high, and inflation was at 11%.

Ford offered everyone in the nation a WIN button to encourage support for his campaign for such voluntary measures as cost-cutting by businesses and compliance with a 55-mph speed limit to reduce reliance on foreign oil. Soon there were WIN parades, WIN work projects and WIN flags.

But high unemployment continued into the 1976 election year. And, although the pall of Watergate was largely lifted, basic policy directions were little changed from the Nixon era.

Ford was born July 14, 1913, in Omaha, the only child of Leslie and Dorothy Gardner King. They christened him Leslie Lynch King. After a divorce in 1915, Dorothy King took the boy to live with her parents in Grand Rapids, Mich., and later married a young paint salesman, Gerald R. Ford, who adopted the child and changed his name to Gerald R. Ford Jr. In time, there were three half-brothers. The elder Ford formed his own paint company and nursed the family through the Great Depression.

Young Gerald starred at center on the 1930 championship football team at South High School, then won a football scholarship to the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor, where he earned his keep as a fraternity house dishwasher and had a B average when he graduated in 1935.

Ford turned down two offers to play professional football to take a job as assistant football and boxing coach at Yale, which financed his attendance at Yale Law School. He was in the top third of his class when he received his degree in 1941.

He launched a law practice in Grand Rapids, but a few months after the Japanese attacked Pearl Harbor on Dec. 7, 1941, he joined the Navy. Assigned in 1943 to the new light aircraft carrier Monterey, he had earned 10 battle stars in the South Pacific and was a lieutenant commander when he returned to Grand Rapids in 1945.

Ford signed on with a local law firm, then soon found himself vice president of a group of former servicemen campaigning for action on veterans' housing. It was this entree to local politics that led Ford in 1948 to successfully challenge U.S. Rep. Bartel J. Jonkman, an isolationist Republican representing the 5th District, for the GOP nomination.

Ford's election that fall with 61% of the vote was routine in the 5th District, which had last sent a Democrat to Congress in 1910.

A well-kept secret during the primary campaign was Ford's engagement to Elizabeth Anne Bloomer, a trained dancer and former model. They were married a month before the 1948 general election.

It was a close, enduring match. Gerald and Betty Ford lived for a time in apartments around Washington, then moved into a comfortably unassuming house in Alexandria, Va., where they raised their four children: Michael Gerald, John "Jack" Gardner, Steven Meigs and Susan.

Freshman congressman Ford soon achieved a place on the Appropriations Committee, the starting point for all money bills. Assigned to the subcommittee on defense, he became a specialist in Pentagon budgeting and acquired a belief in military strength that he carried with him to the White House.

Ford began to emerge from the GOP rank and file in February 1952 when he joined 17 other House Republicans in a letter urging Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower to run for president. The 1952 election put Eisenhower in the White House and gave the vice presidency to Nixon, then a U.S. senator from California and a friend of Ford from when they served together in the House.

The new vice president was Ford's well-placed link with the Eisenhower administration. And it worked two ways: When a GOP moderate faction tried to force Nixon off the 1956 GOP ticket, Ford helped douse the revolt. Nixon remembered the service and brought Ford into his circle of advisors when he waged his losing presidential campaign against Sen. John F. Kennedy in 1960.

A week after the assassination of President Kennedy on Nov. 22, 1963, President Lyndon B. Johnson named Ford to the seven-member commission headed by Chief Justice Earl Warren that investigated the killing. After a 10-month inquiry, the commission found unanimously that the murder was the work of a lone gunman, Lee Harvey Oswald.

Ford, who was the last surviving member of the Warren Commission, co-wrote a book with John R. Stiles on the findings of the panel, "Portrait of the Assassin."

In January 1965, Ford became House minority leader, but the Republicans were so few at the time that he was in no position to block or amend Johnson's Great Society programs.

Ford did serve notice on the Johnson White House not to expect GOP support in the House for the escalating war in Vietnam unless Republicans were consulted on policy. A hawk on Vietnam, Ford branded the administration's limited-war policies a failure and called for vigorous action against communist supply lines.

Johnson, however, ignored Ford's criticisms and dealt with the GOP congressional leadership primarily through the late Sen. Everett M. Dirksen (R-Ill.), an old colleague who supported him on Vietnam. Privately, Johnson dropped widely repeated gibes that Ford "played football too long without a helmet."

The close election that put Nixon in the White House left House Republicans 26 votes short of controlling the House. But as minority leader, Ford provided crucial support for President Nixon. He backed Nixon's policies on waging the war in Southeast Asia and in withdrawing from it. And despite his two decades as a cold warrior, he supported Nixon's moves toward detente with Moscow and endorsed Nixon's visit to mainland China.

Despite Nixon's reelection in 1972, Republicans failed to capture the House, and Ford knew he probably would never achieve his ambition of becoming speaker of the House. He talked of serving out his last term and retiring on his generous congressional pension and maybe practice a little law.

No one, least of all Ford, foresaw the combination of scandal and political accident that within two years would dispel this dream of honorable retirement. When Agnew resigned office in disgrace after pleading no contest to financial corruption charges, Nixon was empowered by the 25th Amendment to appoint a new vice president. He selected Ford. And when Watergate engulfed Nixon soon after, Ford found himself in the Oval Office.

The Watergate scandal involved the June 1972 burglary of Democratic Party headquarters at the Watergate office complex in Washington. The break-in and efforts to cover up the crime reached all the way to the Oval Office. A number of administration officials resigned; some were later convicted of offenses connected with efforts to cover up the affair. The House Judiciary Committee ultimately recommended three articles of impeachment against Nixon. Rather than face a trial in the Senate, Nixon announced on Aug. 8, 1974, that he would resign the next day.

The healing process Ford envisioned for his presidency was severely jolted at an early stage by his abrupt televised announcement on Sept. 8, 1974, of an unconditional pardon of Nixon for any crimes he might have committed as president. No charges were pending against Nixon, but multiple breaches of trust and law were indicated by the record of a House impeachment inquiry.

Ford said he believed that a Nixon trial would fuel "ugly passions" and that "Richard Nixon and his family have suffered enough."

DOJ_NMG_0109376

Public reaction was negative, and some suspected that the pardon was part of a deal that had been arranged to get Nixon to resign.

Ford denied this and took full responsibility for the decision.

He added: "I do believe the buck stops here, and I cannot rely on public opinion polls to tell me what is right."

Until he became vice president and then president, Ford was barely known outside Washington. Many Americans drew their first impression of the 38th president from the televised image of a friendly, big-boned man who looked a bit ill at ease amid the improvised inaugural solemnities.

Ford was 61 at the time but looked younger. Smiles came easily to his square-jawed face. He wore his thinning hair short, with sideburns to mid-ear. It had been 40 years since he had starred at football for the University of Michigan, but he still had an athlete's bearing.

In formal speeches, Ford was more earnest than eloquent, and he said himself that he was "no orator." His delivery of prepared texts was wooden and his impromptu comments from the platform and in his numerous news conferences were in workaday political prose. On informal occasions, he was approachable and unpretentious. At ease in the Oval Office puffing on one of his many pipes, he was a good listener and a persuasive negotiator.

Ford nominated former New York Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller to fill the vice presidency, and Congress confirmed the choice. It was an overture to the Republican center that galled conservatives, who had never accepted the moderate New Yorker. Rockefeller, considered a liability to Ford's bid for the 1976 nomination, withdrew himself from consideration as a vice presidential candidate in November 1975.

Ford began his tenure with a Cabinet inherited from Nixon, but eight of the 11 faces changed in his administration's first 18 months. Though he retained Kissinger, despite the secretary of State's many critics, he fired Secretary of Defense James R. Schlesinger, a brainy, blunt advocate of military power and an open critic of Kissinger's handling of detente with the Soviet Union. Also dismissed, then invited to stay on until his successor was in place, was William E. Colby, who had headed the CIA during 16 bleak months of Watergate-related investigations.

To succeed Schlesinger — who soon reappeared in government, as Carter's Energy secretary — Ford picked Donald H. Rumsfeld, until then the chief of the White House staff. And to succeed Rumsfeld, Ford elevated a lower-level presidential aide then known as Richard B. Cheney, now Vice President Dick Cheney. For the CIA post, Ford nominated George H.W. Bush, a former Texas congressman and onetime GOP national chairman who then headed the U.S. mission in Beijing. Ford enjoyed the presidency and worked hard at it, but his style was unexciting. Little innovation came out of the Ford White House. Such surprises as there were — notably the Nixon pardon and the Cabinet shake-up — generated more criticism than praise. Ford's business-oriented economic views alienated labor leaders, while his striving for improved relations with the communist powers brought him under right-wing fire.

In dealing with the Democratic-run Congress, Ford alternated between stubbornness and conciliation. He used his veto power liberally and set a modern record by rejecting 46 bills in his first 18 months as president, but he was overridden eight times. The effect of many of the vetoes was to put pressure on Congress to scale down costly programs.

Yet throughout Ford's presidency, policy differences with Congress seemed never to erase his old ties with Capitol Hill, where he had served 25 years in the House, nine of them as minority leader. He had friends in both parties and was esteemed as a hard-working square shooter.

Ford kept himself open to advice from many quarters. Indeed, some critics complained that he listened too much and initiated too little, that he vacillated and failed to show affirmative leadership. For example, he denounced the idea of a federal "bailout" to save New York City from bankruptcy — prompting the New York Daily News' famed "Ford to City: Drop Dead" headline — but then supported a $2.3-billion short-term loan program to tide the city over.

On other occasions he took firm stands and stayed with them despite the consequences, as when he advocated higher fuel prices to force conservation, handing Democrats a powerful campaign issue.

By April 1975, Ford's Gallup Poll rating had slid to 39%. The downward trend was halted by Ford's vigorous response to the seizure of an unarmed American container ship, the Mayaguez, by a Cambodian gunboat.

The Mayaguez and its 39-man crew were released May 14, 1975, hours after Ford had ordered a military operation that threw 210 Marines, three warships and 300 aircraft into action. Fifteen servicemen died and 50 were wounded in the assault. Although his resort to arms drew some criticism, his firm decision to draw the line at what he called "an act of piracy" acted as a tonic to a public demoralized by the communist victory in Southeast Asia.

On the domestic front, Ford took steps to eliminate abuses by the CIA and related agencies. There was abundant evidence when he took office that the intelligence agencies had been misused for illicit snooping on strictly domestic groups — and not only by the Nixon administration.

DOJ_NMG_0109377

Ford promised in his first speech to Congress that there would be "no illegal tappings, eavesdroppings, buggings or break-ins by my administration." He appointed Rockefeller to head a commission to investigate the matter, which several months later found that though most CIA activities were within the agency's charter, some had been "plainly unlawful and constituted improper invasions of the rights of Americans."

Ford later directed all agencies in the foreign intelligence field not to spy on Americans electronically, not to intercept their mail and not to infiltrate domestic organizations.

He was naturally positioned to run for the GOP nomination in 1976, but he withheld his decision on whether to run until it was clear that his wife, Betty, had fully recovered from a mastectomy she underwent in September 1974. The public disclosure of her illness — a taboo subject at the time — sparked an outpouring of support, and many women credited her with encouraging early checkups that may have saved their own lives.

"Her honesty has always been one of the qualities about her that I love," President Ford said.

(The first lady became even more celebrated after leaving the White House when in 1978 she disclosed her dependence on alcohol and prescription drugs. In 1982, she founded the Betty Ford Center in Rancho Mirage, where tens of thousands of patients have sought rehabilitation from drug and alcohol addictions.)

Ford was the first president in the 185-year history of the office to lack the mandate of victory in a national election, and many saw him as a GOP workhorse, more dogged than talented, a caretaker predestined to be replaced in the 1976 election. A swarm of Democrats judged that he was beatable. He also faced serious competition from within his own party.

Undeterred, Ford announced in July 1975 that he would run for a full term in 1976. The early declaration failed to head off a strong challenge in the GOP primaries from former California Gov. Ronald Reagan.

After a long, hard and sometimes bitter struggle, Ford won his party's nomination at the Kansas City convention. He chose Kansas Sen. Robert J. Dole as his running mate.

Ford's acceptance speech, considered the best of his career, challenged Carter to meet him "face to face" in a televised series of campaign debates, the first of their kind since 1960. Carter accepted, and in the first debate, Ford did well.

Forward motion faltered, however, after Ford declared in the second debate that "there's no Soviet domination of Eastern Europe." Ford first tried to explain that he had meant the United States did not acquiesce in Soviet domination, then admitted after six days that he had simply made a mistake.

That blooper in early October coincided with other troubles. Most seriously, he was forced by public protests to accept the resignation of Earl L. Butz, the Agriculture secretary he had inherited from Nixon, after published reports of an obscene gibe Butz had made about blacks. Ford's low-key reaction to the Butz gaffe did nothing to mend fences with African American voters, who backed Carter 9 to 1 on Election Day. When all election returns were in on Nov. 2, Carter had won, 51% to 48%.

As his brief term ended, Ford won praise from many quarters for his ability to bolster the public's shaken confidence in government. At the January 1977 inaugural, he seemed near tears when his Democratic successor, Carter, turned to him and extended public thanks to the retiring president "for all he has done to heal our land."

Ford seemed at peace with himself as he left Washington late on Inauguration Day for Palm Springs, where he and his wife lived temporarily. They moved in March 1978 into a new home in Rancho Mirage, close to the desert golf courses he loved.

For a time, he held open the possibility he might run against Carter in 1980, but he abandoned the idea. He did, however, make frequent appearances at GOP fundraising events. He also collected substantial fees for speeches before business groups, served on several corporate boards and raised money for favorite charities. His activities slowed only after two total knee replacements.

The Fords usually spent winters at his California home and office, and summers at their home in Beaver Creek, Colo. The Gerald R. Ford Library was established on the University of Michigan campus in Ann Arbor. A separate Gerald R. Ford Museum was opened in Grand Rapids.

In recent years, however, Ford had struggled with health problems. The former president suffered two small strokes in 2000 and was hospitalized briefly in 2003 when he became dizzy on the golf course near his home in Rancho Mirage. He and his family did not go to the Ford home in Vail, Colo., for the Christmas 2004 holiday because his doctors did not want him to travel. Ford was also unable to accompany President Bush and former Presidents Bush and Clinton to the funeral of Pope John Paul II last year.

In January, he was admitted to the Eisenhower Medical Center in Rancho Mirage and stayed 12 days after experiencing what was described as pneumonia. Seven months later came the stay at the Mayo Clinic to have a cardiac pacemaker implanted.

Throughout retirement, Ford maintained a healthy sense of humor about one characteristic of his presidency — his portrayal as a stumbling chief executive who often fell on ski slopes and bumped his head on helicopter doors. "I've always been secure," he explained.

DOJ_NMG_0109378

He even helped host two national seminars on "Humor and the Presidency." At one, comedian Chevy Chase paid him a tongue-in-cheek tribute by remarking that "while he was healing the country, he was usually hurting himself."

Ford's presidency may have been lackluster by many standards, yet his legacy was generally considered positive.

"Having inherited a nation preoccupied with Vietnam and Watergate — and in many respects both frustrated and disillusioned — Ford succeeded in refocusing the nation's energies on the future," said presidential scholar Roger B. Porter.

It is how the president himself had hoped to be judged — as a healer.

"I hope I am remembered as a president who took over in very tough, difficult times — the time of Watergate and Vietnam, when there was an awful lot of distrust for government in our country," Ford once said. "In two years I was able to heal most of the wounds — of the scandals and war — and restore public confidence in the presidency."

In addition to his wife and four children, Ford is survived by seven grandchildren, four great-grandchildren and a brother, Richard, of Grand Rapids.

Funeral services are planned for Washington, D.C., and Grand Rapids, along with public viewings in those cities and in Palm Desert. Details are to be announced today in Palm Desert.

Gerald R. Ford, 38th U.S. President, Dies (NYT)

By James M. Naughton And Adam Clymer

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

Former President Gerald R. Ford, who was thrust into the presidency in 1974 in the wake of the Watergate scandal but who lost his own bid for election after pardoning President Richard M. Nixon, has died, according to a statement issued late last night by his wife, Betty Ford.

He was 93, making him the longest living former president, surpassing Ronald Reagan, who died in 2004, by just over a month.

The statement did not give a cause, place or time of death, but Mr. Ford, the 38th president, had been in and out of the hospital since January 2006 when he suffered pneumonia, most recently in October at the Eisenhower Medical Center in Rancho Mirage, Calif., for medical tests. He returned to his home in Rancho Mirage after five days of hospitalization.

“My family joins me in sharing the difficult news that Gerald Ford, our beloved husband, father, grandfather and great grandfather has passed away at 93 years of age,” Mrs. Ford said in a statement issued from her husband’s office in Rancho Mirage, also the location of the Betty Ford Center. “His life was filled with love of God, his family and his country.”

President Bush praised Mr. Ford for his contributions to the nation “in an hour of national turmoil and division,” in a statement released early today from his ranch in Texas.

“With his quiet integrity, common sense, and kind instincts, President Ford helped heal our land and restore public confidence in the presidency,” Mr. Bush said. “The American people will always admire Gerald Ford’s devotion to duty, his personal character, and the honorable conduct of his administration.”

Mr. Ford, who was the only person to lead the country without having been elected as president or vice president, occupied the White House for just 896 days — starting from a hastily arranged ceremony on Aug. 9, 1974, and ending after his defeat by Jimmy Carter in the 1976 election. But they were pivotal days of national introspection, involving America’s first definitive failure in a war and the first resignation of a president.

After a decade of division over Vietnam and two years of trauma over the Watergate scandals, Jerry Ford, as he called himself, radiated a soothing familiarity. He might have been the nice guy down the street suddenly put in charge of the nation, and if he seemed a bit predictable, he was also safe, reliable and reassuring. He placed no intolerable intellectual or psychological burdens on a weary land, and he lived out a modest philosophy. “The harder you work, the luckier you are,” he said once in summarizing his career. “I worked like hell.”

Gerald Rudolph Ford was born on July 14, 1913, in Omaha to Leslie Lynch King and Dorothy Ayer King. He rose to House minority leader in 1963 and served in the House until 1973, when Vice President Spiro T. Agnew resigned, and President Nixon appointed Mr. Ford to succeed Mr. Agnew.

When Mr. Ford took the oath of president in 1974, the economy was in disarray, an energy shortage was worsening, allies were wondering how steadfast the United States might be as a partner and Mr. Nixon, having resigned rather than face impeachment for taking part in the Watergate cover-up, was flying to seclusion in San Clemente, Calif.

There was a collective sense of relief as Mr. Ford, in the most memorable line of his most noteworthy speech, declared that day, “Our long national nightmare is over.”

DOJ_NMG_0109379

Two years later, as he accepted the Republican presidential nomination and began a campaign that would end in his first failure in an election, Mr. Ford scarcely seemed to be indulging in hyperbole as he recalled what it had been like to take office as Mr. Nixon's heir.

"It was an hour in our history that troubled our minds and tore at our hearts," he said. "Anger and hatred had risen to dangerous levels, dividing friends and families. The polarization of our political order had aroused unworthy passions of reprisal and revenge. Our governmental system was closer to stalemate than at any time since Abraham Lincoln took that same oath of office."

The pardon, intensely unpopular at the time, came to be generally viewed as correct. In May 2001, Mr. Ford was honored with a "Profile in Courage" Award at the John F. Kennedy Library in Boston. Senator Edward M. Kennedy spoke and said he had originally opposed the pardon. "But time has a way of clarifying past events," he said, "and now we see that President Ford was right."

Mr. Ford's decision to back the 1975 Helsinki Accords was furiously criticized in 1976 by both Jimmy Carter and Ronald Reagan. They complained that it had legitimized the post-World War II borders in Europe. But in his book "The Cold War: A New History" (Penguin, 2005), John Lewis Gaddis of Yale wrote that the pact's commitment to "human rights and fundamental freedoms" became a trap for the Soviet Union, which was facing ever-bolder condemnations by dissidents.

"Thousands of people who lacked the prominence of Solzhenitsyn and Sakharov began to stand with them in holding the U.S.S.R. and its satellites accountable for human rights," Mr. Gaddis wrote. The Helsinki process, he added, became "the basis for legitimizing opposition to Soviet rule."

Mr. Ford also advanced negotiations for a new treaty to turn over control of the Panama Canal to Panama, though he slowed the process during the 1976 campaign and left it to Mr. Carter, his victorious Democratic opponent, to complete.

Both inflation and unemployment fell while he was in office. And he vigorously tried to control federal spending with vetoes of spending bills, starting his first week in office. In a matter of months, however, after the Democratic landslide in the 1974 elections, Congress began overriding his vetoes.

But that did not stop him from threatening to veto a measure, sought by Mayor Abraham D. Beame and Gov. Hugh Carey, offering a 90-day $1 billion line of credit to nearly bankrupt New York City in October 1975. "Ford to City: Drop Dead" was the front-page headline in The Daily News. The next month, the New York leaders went to Washington with a new plan with new controls on the city budget, and they got the short-term loans they needed.

Mr. Ford brought to his duties an indomitable self-assurance.

"I can recall no incident, either in the Congress, vice presidency or presidency, where I didn't feel that I was prepared," he said in retirement. "I felt more secure, more certain of myself in the presidency than at any other time."

His steadiness showed through as a timely presidential attribute, but it was always that way with Gerald Rudolph Ford Jr. He was a man more fundamental than flashy, more immutable than immodest. He served undefeated through 13 elections to the House of Representatives and rose to be its Republican leader, yet in 25 years in Congress he did not write a major piece of legislation. He was overwhelmingly confirmed as vice president, the first to be appointed under the 25th Amendment, yet he owed his selection by Mr. Nixon to the likelihood that he would prove inoffensive in the job.

As president, he was quick to assert to Congress, in a play on words that nobody misunderstood, "I am a Ford, not a Lincoln." If it was true, as was often said, that the Oval Office shaped the occupant, Mr. Ford resisted the temptation of the imperial. On an early trip as president to South Korea, he called American enlisted men "sir." His prose was so pedestrian and his tongue so unreliable — he referred on one public occasion to the noble American "work ethnic" and on another to the disease of "sickle-cell Armenia" — that he became a favorite target of comedians.

Acts of Forgiveness

"I think it's progress that the presidency has been humanized," Mr. Ford remarked a few days before he left the White House. It might easily have been an epitaph.

He had sought to bind up the nation's wounds as much by instinct as by design. One of his earliest acts, combining courage with forgiveness, was to announce before a convention of the Veterans of Foreign Wars that he favored leniency for Vietnam-era draft resisters.

When Congressional Democrats suggested that he had obtained Mr. Nixon's resignation by promising to pardon him, Mr. Ford did something presidents do not do: he went to Capitol Hill and testified, telling a House subcommittee, "There was no deal, period, under no circumstances."

He invited to the White House individuals who had been excluded as political "enemies" in the lists kept by the Nixon administration. When Mr. Ford heard, as a Republican in Congress, that Mr. Nixon kept such a list, he said to an aide, "Anybody who can't keep his enemies in his head has too many enemies."

DOJ_NMG_0109380

His decision to grant a full and absolute pardon to his predecessor stunned the nation. After going to church the morning of Sept. 8, 1974, Mr. Ford went on national television to announce that there would be no formal judicial retribution against Mr. Nixon. Then, apparently untroubled by his decision, he played golf.

"I felt then, and I feel now, if I was going to do it, it had to be clean, sudden," Mr. Ford said months after he had left office. "It was a part of the healing process." He paused a moment, smiled, and added, "It didn't turn out to be quite as much of a healing at the time."

Revulsion and disillusion exploded in editorial comments and angry telegrams to the White House. Mr. Ford's biographer and friend, J. F. terHorst, resigned as White House press secretary rather than defend the pardon. For the rest of his term, Mr. Ford had to do the defending.

Those who were critical of the pardon, he said, "haven't thought through what would have happened over the next 18 months, 24 months, 36 months; that whole episode would have been on the front page."

He had expected some public criticism, he said, but it proved "far worse than I anticipated." He insisted, however, in his 1979 autobiography, "A Time to Heal" (Harper and Row), and in conversations in retirement, that had Mr. Nixon been required to face indictment and trial over the many months of the Ford presidency, "all of the healing process that I thought was so essential would have been much more difficult to achieve."

Hard Work, Honesty, Punctuality

Mr. Ford's early circumstances made him an unlikely future president. He was born July 14, 1913, in Omaha to Leslie Lynch King and Dorothy Ayer King. Not for 17 years was he to learn that he had been christened Leslie Lynch King Jr.

When he was 2 years old, his mother divorced Mr. King and moved to Grand Rapids, Mich. She remarried, and her husband, Gerald Rudolph Ford, a paint salesman with an eighth-grade education, gave the boy his name in formally adopting him.

Gerald considered his mother "a human dynamo in a womanly way" and said she "probably had more friends than any woman I ever knew." He revered his stepfather. Later in life, even in the White House, he would confront difficulty by wondering, "Now, how would he have done this?" It was perhaps the ultimate symptom of Mr. Ford's uncommon commonness that he would try to approach the presidency after the fashion of a Grand Rapids merchant. What he respected in his stepfather's manner was common sense.

His closeness to his stepfather was deepened, if anything, by the discovery that he was adopted and in particular by a brief encounter with his father.

It occurred at the age of 17, when he was a star on the state champion South High School Trojans football team, a 6-foot, blue-eyed blond with a husky voice and an infectious laugh. His mother and stepfather had told Mr. Ford that he was the product of a broken home, and the information did not appear to disturb him unduly. Mr. Ford went on with his schooling and, because the Ford Paint and Varnish Company was struggling to survive the Depression, with a job waiting on tables at Bill Skougis's Restaurant. One day a patron in the restaurant stared at him and then told him, "Leslie, I'm your father."

He was stunned.

Nearly half a century later, recalling the episode in an interview, Mr. Ford's words remained drenched in bitterness: "It was shocking, in that he would intrude on a happy family life after he had neglected my mother and me by his refusal to pay what the court ordered him to pay as child support."

In his 1994 biography of Mr. Ford, "Time and Chance" (HarperCollins), James Cannon wrote that Mr. King never paid the monthly child support ordered by an Omaha court after it found that he had beaten his wife, but that Mr. King's father did pay the money his son owed. Those payments stopped when the elder Mr. King died, Mr. Ford wrote in his autobiography.

His father, Mr. Ford said in the interview, had "abandoned me for 6, 8, 10 years — I have forgotten how long; then he would seek to intrude on my family life, which was a happy one with my stepfather."

"I really never forgave my father in a sense of totally forgiving," Mr. Ford said.

Traditional Values

The home in which the future president was brought up, along with his three stepbrothers, was imbued with the values of family loyalty, thrift and patriotism.

On May Day one year, Mr. Ford and other students at South High saw another group of youths painting anti-American slogans on the steps leading to the school building. The group Mr. Ford was in, mostly football players, dashed over, grabbed the paint cans and, by one account, splashed the paint on the others.

Mr. Ford ran for president of the senior class in 1931 on, as he later used to recall with a laugh, the Progressive ticket. He lost, but he was never to lose another election until he sought a different presidency 45 years later as more of a conservative.

His basic philosophy involved fiscal prudence, strong national defense, suspicion of alien lands and a belief that citizens should earn a living rather than be given one. This, he said, was a legacy "from both my stepfather and my mother — hard-working, typical Middle Western individuals who had themselves been brought up in families that had comparable philosophical views."

"It was that environment plus, I think, my own instincts, which go back, I believe, to the fact that I always felt you had to work like hell," he continued. "I did. Whether I worked in the restaurant, whether I worked in scouting or whether I worked in school, I was always very conscientious."

He did well enough to win a scholarship to the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor. He applied himself with equal diligence to his studies and to football, and he worked as a dishwasher at the Delta Kappa Epsilon fraternity to help pay his room and board.

To Law School, Then to War

In those days, both his professional and athletic ambitions were mixed. He said decades later that "one of my great ambitions was to be captain of the Michigan football team," the Wolverines, in his senior year. But someone else was chosen as captain. Mr. Ford, a center, was instead selected by his teammates as the most valuable player; he was gratified, though he often joked of having been named most valuable member of a losing team.

After he graduated in 1935 from the University of Michigan, he had offers to play professional football for either the Detroit Lions or the Green Bay Packers (at $110 per game). Mr. Ford remained fascinated with sports, but he chose the law, a subject that had appealed to him since high school. He enrolled at Yale Law School.

Political opponents would ultimately fasten on Mr. Ford's sports background as a source of ridicule. President Lyndon B. Johnson, angered at a legislative development inspired by Representative Ford, cracked once that he had played football too long without a helmet. And despite his real skill at skiing and golf, a tumble on the slopes or a tee shot drive into a golf gallery would be seized on by the comedy show "Saturday Night Live" as a metaphor for a clumsy presidency.

If Mr. Ford's mental cast was more often instinctive than imaginative and his approach to issues more tactical than conceptual, he was no intellectual slouch. At Yale, Prof. Myres MacDougal wrote in interview notes on the young student: "Very mature, wise person of good judgment. Informational background not the best but interesting, mature and serious of purpose."

Initially, because he needed the income he earned as an assistant football coach and as a head boxing coach, Mr. Ford was so busy that he was not allowed to take law classes full time. He kept insisting he was capable of the dual schedule and was so persistent that he was allowed to become student and coach simultaneously in 1938. He finished in the top third of the class of 1941, with a B average.

He returned to Grand Rapids, and with a friend, Philip W. Buchen, who would later become his White House legal counsel, he set about establishing a practice specializing in labor-management matters. Shortly after the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, he joined the Navy as an ensign.

The war, more than anything else, was responsible for altering his outlook and inspiring him to pursue a career in public life.

At first, the Navy assigned him as a physical training officer to work with recruits on the grounds of the University of North Carolina. Mr. Ford kept applying for a transfer to a combat zone and kept being refused. Ever persistent, he applied anew and after a year of rejection was sent to the Pacific as a physical education officer on the U.S.S. Monterey, a light aircraft carrier.

By war's end he had risen to lieutenant commander and won 10 battle stars for participating in engagements at places including Okinawa, Wake, Taiwan, the Philippines and the Gilbert Islands. Just before Christmas in 1944, he nearly lost his life when a typhoon struck the Third Fleet and, topside on the carrier, he came within inches of being swept off the deck.

An Internationalist Takes Office

Mr. Ford never adopted the domestic liberalism of a Roosevelt or, later, a Johnson. But the war experience broadened his view, changing him "from a passive isolationist to an ardent internationalist," as he put it.

Having re-established himself in a comfortable law practice in Grand Rapids, Mr. Ford had a limited ambition at first. "I was 33, single, working and having a great time, playing lots of golf," he said later. "All I was interested in was enjoying life and getting on with my law practice."

But he kept reading a new magazine, World Report, to which he was a charter subscriber, and became an ever firmer advocate of the Marshall Plan of postwar assistance to Europe and an internationalist in a community of Dutch-origin conservative isolationists. He came to the attention of two forces: Republican reformers bent on taking control of the local party, and internationalists allied with Senator Arthur H. Vandenberg, the Republican leader, who was also from Grand Rapids.

The incumbent representative from the Fifth District of Michigan was Bartel J. Jonkman, who seemed tailored to the district — of Dutch descent, Republican, conservative, isolationist.

"I knew I was meeting a formidable incumbent," Mr. Ford later recalled, "who for many reasons should have won. And I shouldn't have expected to win." Typically, Mr. Ford did expect to win, though, and with but a smidgen of apprehension that the challenge might be taken up, he dared Mr. Jonkman to debate. "Fortunately, he did not," Mr. Ford said.

DOJ_NMG_0109382

Aided by President Harry S. Truman's disputes with Congress, which kept Mr. Jonkman in Washington, Mr. Ford worked tirelessly and won the Republican primary in 1948 by nearly 10,000 votes. Then he easily won his first term in the House. He never received less than 60 percent of the vote during a quarter-century as the Representative from Michigan's Fifth District.

A Candid Helpmate

Shortly before the 1948 election, Mr. Ford paused from his campaigning to march down the aisle of Grace Episcopal Church in Grand Rapids — by local legend, wearing one black shoe and one brown shoe — with Elizabeth Bloomer Warren, who had been divorced and was generally regarded as the most attractive single woman in the city.

Betty Ford had been a model and a fashion coordinator. For two years, in New York City, she had danced in Martha Graham's troupe. She was, and remained throughout Mr. Ford's public career, a remarkably open and candid woman, given to strong opinions on abortion, feminism and other issues and willing to talk about the radical mastectomy she underwent while in the White House. She encouraged the same outspokenness in the four Ford children: Michael Gerald, John Gardner, Steven Meigs and Susan Elizabeth.

Mrs. Ford also battled drug dependency, which began in the 1960s with prescriptions for pills to relieve pain from a neck injury, and alcoholism, which grew with her loneliness during Mr. Ford's increasingly heavy travel schedule. In 1978, her family confronted her about her addictions, and, after initial denials, she finally admitted herself for treatment. Four years later, she helped dedicate the Betty Ford Center for Drug and Alcohol Rehabilitation in Rancho Mirage, Calif., on the campus of Eisenhower Medical Center.

While Mrs. Ford reared their children, Mr. Ford rose doggedly from the obscurity of the House to the leadership of its minority. In his second term he won assignment to the Appropriations Committee, where he and other fiscal conservatives worked to curb government spending. By 1953 he was on such influential subcommittees as those dealing with funds for foreign aid and national defense; throughout the Korean and Vietnam Wars he was a stalwart supporter of American military intervention in Asia.

In the House

Bud Vestal, a reporter for The Grand Rapids Press, distressed Mr. Ford by noting in a biography that Mr. Ford "never authored a major program of legislation on his own."

Mr. Ford's explanation was that as a member of the Appropriations Committee, he "was pretty preoccupied with very important matters" and "didn't have time, just as a pragmatic thing, to get involved in all the other pieces of legislation that others were writing or sponsoring or working for."

His legislative activity more often than not involved fealty to Republican Presidents Eisenhower and Nixon or obstruction of the liberal New Frontier and Great Society proposals of Democratic Presidents Kennedy and Johnson. For instance, Mr. Ford voted against a major housing assistance act in 1961 and fostered opposition to the Medicare program in 1965.

In a Congress that often seemed akin to a fraternity, he was nearly everyone's friend. He was thus an ideal prospect for minority leadership. When younger Republicans were casting about in 1963 for a point man in their rebellion against their aging leaders, they settled on Jerry Ford.

The group installed Mr. Ford as chairman of the House Republican Conference, the third-ranking post in the minority hierarchy. His name came to more prominent attention later that year when President Johnson appointed Mr. Ford to the Warren Commission to investigate the assassination of President John F. Kennedy. In 1965, after the huge loss that came with Senator Barry Goldwater's landslide defeat for the presidency the year before, the younger Republicans deposed Charles A. Halleck of Indiana as their House leader, supplanting him with Mr. Ford.

'I Need Your Vote'

With the exception of an ill-conceived effort in 1970 to impeach Associate Justice William O. Douglas, a liberal member of the Supreme Court, after Senate Democrats had twice rejected President Nixon's nominations of Southern conservatives to the court, Mr. Ford generally enlarged his circle of friends by establishing an amicable style of leadership.

When one or another Republican voted against the leadership's wishes, some party stalwarts sought to persuade Mr. Ford to discipline the offender. There were methods that might have been used: transfer to a minor committee, elimination of funds for overseas travel, loss of campaign money. Mr. Ford said no.

"That's counterproductive," he insisted. "That person knows that he disappointed you. To rub it in makes it, the next time, literally impossible to get his cooperation. You can lose one battle, but the most important thing is to win the war."

A leading House Democrat of the era, Representative Joe D. Waggoner Jr. of Louisiana, confirmed the technique's success. "It's the damnedest thing," Mr. Waggoner said. "Jerry just puts his arm around a colleague or looks him in the eyes and says, 'I need your vote,' and gets it."

An Elusive Dream

DOJ_NMG_0109383

Visionary or not, Mr. Ford, as Republican House leader, worked to enlarge the minority, always pursuing the elusive dream of a Republican majority and, with it, the realization of his greatest political ambition, to be speaker of the House.

Asked in his retirement why he had coveted the speaker's post, he replied:

"I thought, as a member of Congress, that would be the ultimate achievement. To sit up there and be the head honcho of 434 other people and have the responsibility, aside from the achievement, of trying to run the greatest legislative body in the history of mankind, I think, in an efficient and effective way, to tend to the people's business, both domestic and foreign, to make sure, whatever legislation was required, to see that it was done. I think I got that ambition within a year or two after I was in the House of Representatives."

For a decade he crisscrossed the country, downing chicken dinners in 200 or so cities each year, extolling this or that prospect for a House seat and trying diligently to build a majority. But the closest the Republicans came in his years as leader was the 192 seats they held after the 1968 elections. That was still 16 short of the majority that would have made him speaker.

Apparently destined to be the perennial leader of a minority, Mr. Ford promised his wife in 1973 that he would make one more effort, however forlorn, in 1974 at winning a majority and would then retire from politics in 1976.

"I don't want to be a minority leader in perpetuity," he told friends.

'A Nice Conclusion'

On the night of Oct. 10, 1973, a few hours after Vice President Spiro T. Agnew rose in a federal courtroom in Baltimore to plead no contest to a charge of federal income tax evasion and simultaneously resigned the vice presidency, Mr. Ford was at his home in Alexandria, Va., trying to relax. The telephone rang; it was his old House ally Melvin Laird, now a White House counselor. Would Mr. Ford be interested in the vice presidency if it could be arranged, Mr. Laird asked.

"I suspect if I was asked, I would accept it," Mr. Ford replied.

He turned from the phone, he later recalled, and told Mrs. Ford that "well, that would be a nice conclusion" for his career.

The next night President Nixon was the one who telephoned Mr. Ford's home. He offered the vice presidency.

It was the first time that anyone had been nominated for the office under the terms of the 25th Amendment, which made the appointment subject to confirmation by both the Senate and the House. Much as Republicans had fixed on Mr. Ford as leader in 1965 because of his general acceptability, so Mr. Nixon chose him in 1973 to be vice president.

At the time, in late 1973, Mr. Nixon was locked in a legal duel with the Watergate special prosecutor and the Senate Watergate committee, refusing to yield documents and tape recordings that had been subpoenaed. Indeed, a few days after Mr. Ford was nominated for the vice presidency, Mr. Nixon dismissed Archibald Cox, the first special prosecutor, for insisting on pursuing legal remedies to gain access to the White House evidence, and accepted the resignation of Attorney General Elliot L. Richardson, who declined to carry out the order to dismiss the prosecutor.

'I Believed What I Was Told'

There were Nixon allies who thought Mr. Ford might, as vice president, serve as a buffer against the efforts to impeach Mr. Nixon that were precipitated by the events of that "Saturday night massacre" in October 1973. Mr. Nixon remarked once to former Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller of New York, "Can you see Gerald Ford sitting in this chair?"

Mr. Ford accepted the nomination. "I thought," he later reminisced, "well, if I could be helpful, I knew I could be confirmed. And it was a nice way to end a career. I wasn't going to be speaker."

He took it on faith, because he had been told privately by Mr. Nixon and others that the president was innocent of any involvement in the burglary at the Democratic Party offices in the Watergate complex on June 17, 1972, or of complicity in the attempt to cover up the extent of the conspiracy.

Three days after the break-in, Mr. Ford had asked John N. Mitchell, the former attorney general and the 1972 Nixon campaign chairman, if the break-in had been authorized. As Mr. Ford recalled it, Mr. Mitchell "looked me right in the eye and said neither he nor the White House was involved."

"I believed what I was told," Mr. Ford once said, referring to the belief that Mr. Nixon was not involved in Watergate wrongdoing, "so my whole conduct as vice president was predicated on that personal trust."

Because it was the first such occasion, Mr. Ford's vice-presidential nomination prompted an extensive investigation of his background by as many as 400 agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. His nomination was confirmed, 92 to 3 in the Senate and 387 to 35 in the House. At dusk on Dec. 6, 1973, to the thunderous applause of those with whom he had served in Congress, he strode down the center aisle in the House of Representatives to stand at the lectern, not as speaker but as vice president.

Mr. Ford took it upon himself as the heir apparent to try, initially, to make certain that Mr. Nixon would remain in office. In the eight months of his vice presidency he traveled more than 130,000 miles to speak up for Mr. Nixon.

DOJ_NMG_0109384

As the House Judiciary Committee painstakingly assembled evidence on which its members would ultimately recommend three articles of impeachment, Mr. Ford proclaimed confidence in Mr. Nixon's blamelessness, but privately he grew increasingly uncertain.

Growing Skepticism

The doubt was slow to take hold. In January 1974 Mr. Ford told an audience in Atlantic City that the impeachment movement was the work of "extreme partisans" who were trying to "crush the president" and in the process increase the Democratic majority in the Congress.

Alarmed, Mr. Buchen, Mr. Ford's old friend from Michigan, and Senator Robert P. Griffin, another longtime Michigan ally, privately counseled Mr. Ford to be careful lest his faith be unrewarded and his loyalty further divide the country.

Thereafter, Mr. Ford loyally defended the president, but in his own words. The Nixon staff kept sending proposed texts to Mr. Ford's office, but Mr. Ford's aides toned them down.

Instinctively, too, Mr. Ford continuously and openly urged the president to demonstrate his innocence by yielding to Congress and the courts the Watergate tape recordings and documents that were being sought. When Mr. Nixon continued to "stonewall," as the resistance came to be known, "it certainly began to raise some reservations" in Mr. Ford's mind, he said, although he kept them to himself.

Gradually, even Mr. Ford's defense of Mr. Nixon began to take a skeptical tone. At a Republican Party conference in Chicago, Mr. Ford explicitly attacked for the first time the attitude of the 1972 Nixon campaign organization, saying it had been led by "an arrogant, elite guard of political adolescents."

'A Good Night's Sleep'

At the end of July 1974, Gen. Alexander M. Haig Jr., then the White House chief of staff, made an urgent call to the vice president. General Haig advised him that a tape recording under subpoena by the special prosecutor — one of several that the Supreme Court had ruled could not be withheld by Mr. Nixon — would show conclusively that Mr. Nixon had tried to curb the Watergate investigation as early as June 23, 1972, six days after the break-in.

"That was the first concrete evidence that I had contrary to the assurances I'd had before," Mr. Ford remembered.

For three days, as Mr. Nixon's aides sought to persuade the president to make public the transcript of the June 23 tape, Mr. Ford continued to travel, saying nothing of the evidence.

The president did publish it. Although Mr. Ford was unaware that Mr. Buchen and others had begun making secret preparations for a Ford presidential transition, he began to wonder in the first days of August 1974 how soon he might be president.

On Aug. 6, Mr. Nixon assembled his Cabinet at the White House and declared that he would not resign. Mr. Ford, seated opposite the president across the massive Cabinet table, told Mr. Nixon, "I no longer can publicly defend you." It was, for Mr. Ford, the loyal friend of the president, one of the most difficult things he had ever done, but, he told an interviewer, "with the development of the evidence, I had no other choice."

Two nights later Mr. Nixon announced on national television that he would resign the presidency at noon on Aug. 9.

Mr. Ford and his wife watched the Nixon statement on the television set in the family room of their home in Alexandria. Then, despite the looming accumulation of pressures, Mr. Ford went to sleep.

That he could do so, with no particular difficulty, on the eve of the nation's most unusual presidential transition, was illustrative. "My feeling is you might as well get to sleep" whatever the circumstances, Mr. Ford had said. "You'll feel better the next day. If you've got a problem, you are better prepared to deal with it tomorrow. You sure can't do much about it that night. It's a blessing, really."

The nation's torment was on his mind as he spoke that next day, Aug. 9, 1974, of the import of his sudden inauguration as the 38th president of the United States, the first person never elected president or vice president to become president.

"I am acutely aware that you have not elected me as your president by your ballots," he said to the dignitaries in the East Room of the White House and to the millions of Americans watching on television. "I have not sought this enormous responsibility, but I will not shirk it."

With an empathy that came as a relief after months of White House aloofness, the new president said: "This is an hour of history that troubles our minds and hurts our hearts. Therefore, I feel it my first duty to make an unprecedented compact with my countrymen. Not an inaugural address. Not a fireside chat. Not a campaign speech. Just a little straight talk among friends."

He urged his countrymen to help him "bind up the internal wounds of Watergate" and then added:

"My fellow Americans, our long national nightmare is over. Our Constitution works. Our great republic is a government of laws and not of men. Here, the people rule."

The Man in the White House

DOJ_NMG_0109385

Mr. Ford's presidency was an extension of his own political personality: reactive rather than activist, instinctive instead of intellectual, humanistic but within the fiscal limits of conservative dogma.

Mr. terHorst, the biographer, puzzled over the seeming contradiction between the president's personal and professional philosophies: "The problem with him — he doesn't like to be kidded about it — but the fact is, this guy would, if he saw a schoolkid in front of the White House who needed clothing, if he was the right size, he'd give him the shirt off his back, literally. Then he'd go right in the White House and veto the school lunch bill."

John Hersey, after spending a week in close observation of the president, wrote in The New York Times Magazine of April 20, 1975: "What is it in him?"

"Is it an inability to extend compassion far beyond the faces directly in view?" Mr. Hersey wrote. "Is it a failure of imagination? Is it something obdurate he was born with, alongside the energy and serenity?"

The answer seemed to be a belief — one Mr. Ford was schooled in if not born with — in the essential dignity of human struggle. "Everything didn't turn to gold just because I did it," he remarked. "I had this foundation, and I had been brought up with the training that — and this is an oversimplification, but I think it's indicative — the harder you work, the luckier you are. And whether it was in such things as the Boy Scouts or athletics or academics, I worked like hell."

There were those who contended, as did Richard Reeves, the author of a critical biography, that Mr. Ford had a "tragic gap" in his understanding of such crucial matters as the Vietnam War and the Watergate scandal. More common was the assessment of Mr. Ford as "innately decent."

Executive Decisions

Mr. Ford disputed the notion that it required forceful, even harsh, character to meet the tests of the White House. He was asked once if a nice guy should be president, and answered: "Those who allege that you've got to be a mean, sinister, devious person to be president are just dead wrong. I don't see how a president in his conscience could be that."

He, too, could be forceful. He resented the accident of fate that had made him president as the nation watched South Vietnam and Cambodia — where so much of America's human and economic treasure had been spent by three predecessors — fall to the Communists in 1975. Rebuffed by Congress when he sought a last-minute $972 million in aid to Saigon, Mr. Ford made it possible for 130,000 or more refugees to come to the United States.

When the Cambodian Communists seized the American merchant ship Mayaqüez in May 1975, Mr. Ford reacted with uncharacteristic emotion, sending United States military forces to recapture the ship.

The order was motivated in part by concern for national image. "We had just pulled out of Vietnam, out of Cambodia," Mr. Ford said later, "and here the United States was being challenged by a group of leaders who were bandits and outlaws, in my opinion, and I think their subsequent record has pretty well proved it. And it was an emotional decision to tell the Defense Department we had to go in there and do something."

Mr. Ford's economic policies were traditional for Republican conservatives. He proclaimed, amid considerable White House ballyhoo, a campaign to "Whip Inflation Now," complete with "WIN" buttons. Scarcely had it begun than mounting joblessness and the worst recession since the 1930s caused Mr. Ford to abandon the anti-inflation program and propose tax cuts to stimulate the economy instead of tax increases to dampen it.

Congress, meanwhile, reflected its dominance by the Democratic Party in a steadily increasing number of spending programs and expansion of the federal deficit.

Difficult Dismissals

In what may have been his most difficult personal decision — because it went against the grain of his personality — the genial man from Michigan also acted forcefully in his dismissal of Secretary of Defense James R. Schlesinger.

There were no known policy differences of consequence between Mr. Ford and Mr. Schlesinger. But their styles and characters never quite proved compatible, and the defense secretary, a bookish and occasionally dogmatic intellectual who later became secretary of energy to President Jimmy Carter, got on the president's nerves.

"There was a tension," Mr. Ford acknowledged later. "There was a personality problem." Mr. Schlesinger, he emphasized, "is an honorable, decent person, but our chemistry doesn't fit." He did not need to add but did, "I'm not one that likes to fire people."

Nonetheless, Mr. Ford did make another central personnel decision that troubled him: jettisoning Vice President Rockefeller from his 1976 campaign ticket. Mr. Ford did so even though he had declared, in nominating the former New York governor to be his vice president, that there was no one else in the country so well equipped to stand next in the line of presidential succession.

Mr. Ford eventually decided to seek a full term as president, something he had intimated in his testimony to Congress as nominee for vice president that he would be loath to do. He decided that a lame-duck president could not be effective in a political role. Besides, although he did not like to admit it, Mr. Ford and his wife, Betty, had grown to like the perquisites of the White House.

As a candidate to succeed himself — and, he hoped, thus legitimize his accidental presidency — Mr. Ford grew politically timid. It was apparent that he would be challenged for the Republican nomination by Mr. Reagan, the former governor of California and a politician far more conservative than Mr. Ford.

On the Campaign Trail Again

Mr. Ford responded by becoming ever more conservative in his political statements and by undertaking the same sort of aggressive, energetic campaigning as an incumbent that had marked his campaigns as a member of the House of Representatives. From early 1975 until the summer of 1976, Mr. Ford traveled from one corner of the country to another. Even two attempts on his life by unbalanced women in California in 1975 did not deter him.

On one of those trips, to Sacramento on Sept. 5, he narrowly escaped an assassination attempt by Lynette (Squeaky) Fromme, who had been a follower of the convicted killer Charles Manson. Mr. Ford was moving through a crowd in Capitol Park, shaking hands and waving, when a Secret Service agent saw Ms. Fromme's arm and the pistol. She was subdued, and it turned out that while the gun was loaded there was no bullet in the chamber. She was convicted of attempted murder and sentenced to life in prison.

The other attempt, by Sara Jane Moore, took place in San Francisco. A former Marine, Oliver W. Sipple, knocked a pistol out of Ms. Moore's hand as she fired.

By the time Mr. Ford narrowly won the Republican nomination in Kansas City, Mo., in August 1976, he seemed to many of his political advisers to have diminished the value of his incumbency by traveling so extensively as to seem only another candidate. He was more than 25 percentage points behind the Democratic nominee, Mr. Carter, in the opinion polls. The economy was improving but not good. The Republicans' identification with Mr. Nixon remained.

Mr. Ford reassessed the situation with his advisers. Together they altered his political strategy and style. He spent most of the campaign period hunched over his desk or greeting guests in the Rose Garden of the White House, trying to reinforce the image of incumbency and to stress his claims to having achieved "peace, prosperity and trust."

Strides, Then a Stumble

In one of the most remarkable political comebacks in presidential campaign history, Mr. Ford nearly overcame adversity and odds. One late stumble, insisting in a debate that "there is no Soviet domination of Eastern Europe" and that Poland was not "dominated by the Soviet Union," halted the Ford surge.

In the end, his loss to Mr. Carter, the former Georgia governor, was narrow, by only 1,682,970 votes. Mr. Ford had 48 percent and Mr. Carter 50.1 percent.

But neither Poland nor a last-minute bit of bad economic news was central to his defeat. The Nixon pardon was.

Stuart Spencer, his campaign manager, said that polling data about the pardon had made it clear that "it cost him the election." He said 7 percent of Republicans had either voted for Mr. Carter or stayed home because of the pardon, and it hurt with Democrats and independents, too.

Robert S. Strauss, who was Democratic National Chairman in 1976, agreed. He said Mr. Ford "was never forgiven for it."

"People always assumed there was a deal, even though there was no evidence of one," Mr. Strauss said.

Even so, Mr. Ford's political recovery, although incomplete, reflected a positive aspect of his brief presidency. It indicated the extent to which he seemed to have re-established a sense of trustworthiness in the nation's most visible and symbolic office.

One political aide said of those who voted for Mr. Ford, "They're voting for something solid — a simple, honest, decent man."

After the White House

In the years after he left the White House, Mr. Ford took on two new roles, senior statesman and newly arrived millionaire, with his characteristic easygoing manner and energy. He had become something of a one-man academic, political and business enterprise, and by 1983 his income was estimated to be more than $1 million a year.

Mr. Ford frequently criticized President Carter on economic and defense matters, but the attacks on his successor never grew bitter or personal. On some foreign policy issues, like the Panama Canal treaties, which his own administration had quietly sought, he supported his successor.

For three years Mr. Ford contemplated another race for the presidency. In 1975, he had told aides in the White House that "Reagan would be a disaster" as president. After Mr. Reagan won the 1980 New Hampshire primary, Mr. Ford told The New York Times that it would be "impossible" for Mr. Reagan to win a general election, and he cautiously invited Republicans to ask him to run again.

But the draft he invited never came, and Mr. Reagan cruised to the nomination. When the Republicans gathered in Detroit in 1980 to nominate Mr. Reagan, he asked Mr. Ford to be his running mate.

DOJ_NMG_0109387

For hours, representatives of the two men, with former Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger acting for Mr. Ford, negotiated the outlines of a possible Reagan-Ford Administration, in which Mr. Ford would have been given extensive authority in making appointments and managing the executive branch. But the negotiators were unable to reach a formula that satisfied Mr. Ford's desire to be more than a traditional vice president while also giving Mr. Reagan a free hand to govern as chief executive.

Mr. Ford nevertheless worked on the 1980 campaign trail for Mr. Reagan and his running mate, George Bush. Two months after the inauguration, Mr. Reagan sent Mr. Ford as his representative to China to reassure leaders there that Washington wished to continue improving relations.

The next October, after President Anwar el-Sadat of Egypt was assassinated, Mr. Ford represented the United States at the funeral along with the two other living former presidents, Mr. Carter and Mr. Nixon.

For many years after he left office, Mr. Ford campaigned for Republican candidates. In the first few years, those appearances had to be accompanied by hefty charitable donations to his library and museum. He also continued to warn, "If we get way over on the hard right of the political spectrum, we will not elect a Republican President," as he put it in a Times interview in 1998. He singled out the abortion issue, saying he was disappointed that his own "strongly pro-choice" views no longer seemed welcome in his party.

In August 2000, Mr. Ford appeared at the Republican convention in Philadelphia but was hospitalized for a week after a stroke.

As a result of Mr. Ford's new income, the Fords enjoyed a way of life that contrasted with their modest existence when he was a congressman, establishing homes in Rancho Mirage, in the California desert, and at Vail, in the Colorado mountains.

In addition to attending fund-raising functions, teaching at the University of Michigan and giving 30 paid speeches a year, Mr. Ford bought interests in two Colorado radio stations and served on the boards of at least eight corporations.

He also supervised and participated in sporting events, mostly golf, including an invitational golf tournament bearing his name in Vail; promoted a Southern California real estate development; and helped advertise a commercially minted coin set commemorating the presidency. He even made his acting debut at the age of 70, portraying himself on an episode of the nighttime television soap opera "Dynasty."

Asked in a 1978 interview about his life in retirement, Mr. Ford said that he was having trouble with chipping and putting in his golf game, but otherwise, "everything is wonderful."

Ford Dies At 93 (USAT)

By Bill Nichols And Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, December 27, 2006

Former president Gerald R. Ford, who inherited the daunting task of calming a divided nation when he assumed the presidency at the height of the Watergate scandal, died Tuesday at the age of 93.

"My family joins me in sharing the difficult news that Gerald Ford, our beloved husband, father, grandfather and great grandfather has passed away at 93 years of age," said his wife, Betty, in a brief statement issued from her husband's office in Rancho Mirage, Calif.

"His life was filled with love of God, his family and his country."

He was the longest-living president, followed by Ronald Reagan, who also died at 93. Ford had been living at his desert home in Rancho Mirage, east of Los Angeles.

The statement did not say where Ford died or the cause of death. Ford had battled pneumonia in January 2006 and underwent two heart treatments — including an angioplasty — in August at the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn.

A 13-term congressman from Michigan who rose to the post of House minority leader, Ford was vice president when Richard Nixon resigned the presidency in 1974 because of the Watergate controversy.

President Bush issued a statement early today saying he and Laura "are greatly saddened" by Ford's death.

"He assumed the presidency in an hour of national turmoil and division," Bush said. "With his quiet integrity, common sense and kind instincts, President Ford helped heal our land and restore public confidence in the presidency."

As the 38th president, Ford, who enjoyed a reputation for integrity on both sides of the political aisle, immediately tried to soothe the wounded nation. "The long national nightmare is over," he said as he was sworn in on Aug. 9, 1974. "Our Constitution works."

Although Ford's approval ratings initially soared, he would lose the 1976 presidential contest to former Georgia governor Jimmy Carter — largely, in the view of historians and his biographers, because he pardoned Nixon just months after being sworn in to office.

The pardon ignited a political firestorm and prompted Democrats to question whether Nixon had made a deal with Ford to protect him from prosecution. Ford resolutely denied that there was any quid pro quo.

DOJ_NMG_0109388

Ford's pardon "weakened his political capital and made Democrats more willing to resist him," says Yanek Mieczkowski, a Ford biographer who teaches history at Dowling College. He says the pardon was like a "ghost that hung over Ford and his party for the rest of the decade."

Ford remains the only unelected U.S. president. He said he did not regret his decision to pardon Nixon.

"There was such venom toward Nixon for Watergate that the public just didn't understand there was something (to be considered) over and above Nixon's personal problems," Ford said in 2003. "My problem was trying to restore public confidence across the board."

In 1999, Ford was awarded the Presidential Medal of Freedom by President Clinton, who said of him: "The respect he commands has grown in the years since he left office. … President Ford represents what is best in public service and what is best about America."

An endearing bumbler

Ford's public persona during his presidency was as a mangler of the English language who had a tendency toward verbal and physical stumbles. Comedian Chevy Chase, in Saturday Night Live's early years, made a name for himself mocking Ford's ineloquence, such as when he declared in a 1976 debate with Carter that: "There is no Soviet dominance of Eastern Europe."

His friends, family and staffers, however, contended that this former star football player and son of Michigan possessed the right blend of heartland decency and reverence for his country to be able to steady the nation after the morass of Watergate and the reverberations of the Vietnam War.

To his family, colleagues and historians, his presidency — even his pardon of Nixon — illustrated his central traits: decisiveness, decency and concern for country first.

"People are coming around to the idea that his pardon of Nixon was the right thing to do for the country," daughter Susan Ford said. "He knew it then. Leadership and decency are the things that stand out in my mind when I think of my dad."

Ron Nessen, Ford's press secretary, says that Ford, the only Eagle Scout ever to become president, was the right man at the right time for America.

"The nation was so torn apart by Watergate," Nessen says. "People had lost faith in the presidency. Ford just started knitting things back together. Plus, he seemed like the guy next door because that's what he was. He wasn't Richard Nixon."

An American life

Ford was born Leslie Lynch King Jr. on July 14, 1913, in Omaha. His father, an alcoholic, threatened his mother with a knife just after his birth, and she moved her 2-week-old son to Grand Rapids, Mich., to live with her parents.

Three years later, she married Gerald Ford, a paint salesman. The Fords called their son Gerald, and in 1935, Leslie King changed his name to Gerald Ford.

"He was not raised with a silver spoon in his mouth by any means," Susan Ford said. "There's something to be said for growing up that way. I wouldn't call him frugal, but he'll pay in cash or he won't buy it."

During summers, he filled paint cans at his father's store. And in his college years at the University of Michigan, Ford held a variety of jobs, including summer stints as a park ranger at Yellowstone National Park and as a model. Ford and his then-girlfriend, Phyllis Brown, appeared on the cover of Cosmopolitan magazine in 1942.

Chase and other comedians in the 1970s parodied Ford as clumsy. His legendarily wayward drives on the golf course prompted Bob Hope to wisecrack: "It's not hard to find Jerry Ford on a golf course — you just follow the wounded."

But the jokes belied elite athletic ability. Ford played football and basketball and ran track in high school, earning all-city and all-state honors as a star center in football. He went on to star on national championship football teams at the University of Michigan in 1932 and '33. He received offers to play professionally from the Green Bay Packers and Detroit Lions.

He turned down those offers to coach boxing and football and study law at Yale University. Among those under his football tutelage: future senators Robert Taft Jr. of Ohio and William Proxmire of Wisconsin.

"He probably had the most athletic background of any president," says presidential historian Fred Greenstein of Princeton University.

The Washington years

A year after earning his law degree from Yale in 1941, Ford joined the Navy and served aboard the USS Monterey in the South Pacific, including the allied assaults on Wake Island and Okinawa. He was discharged as a lieutenant commander in 1946 and later said that his experience in the war prompted him to become an internationalist rather than adopting the pre-war tendency of Republicans to support keeping the United States in isolation from the rest of the world.

Ford returned to Grand Rapids and joined a law firm. In 1948, he challenged the isolationist congressman in his home district, won the Republican nomination and got 61% in the general election.

During the campaign, he married Elizabeth Bloomer Warren. She was divorced, a dancer and a fashion consultant for a department store.

DOJ_NMG_0109389

Ford represented the Grand Rapids area in Congress from 1949 to 1973. He described himself as a "moderate in domestic affairs, an internationalist in foreign affairs and a conservative in fiscal policy," according to his official biography.

He rose through the ranks to become House minority leader in 1965, leading GOP opposition to President Lyndon Johnson's social programs and urging Johnson to escalate the bombing in Vietnam. Johnson said Ford was a "nice guy, but he played too much football with his helmet off."

In 1963, Johnson appointed Ford to the Warren Commission, which had been charged with investigating President Kennedy's assassination. It found that Lee Harvey Oswald had acted alone and not as part of a conspiracy.

Throughout his career, Ford was widely seen as a decent, honorable man. "He was someone who was regarded as wholesome, unpretentious," Greenstein says. "He had a long, responsible public career."

The accidental president

A friend of Nixon, Ford backed his successful presidential campaigns in 1968 and 1972. In 1973, Nixon chose him to replace Vice President Spiro Agnew, who had resigned after pleading no contest to charges of tax evasion.

By then the Watergate scandal had erupted. It began with men working for Nixon's re-election campaign attempting to plant wiretaps at Democratic National Committee campaign headquarters in the Watergate hotel and office complex in Washington. The attempted coverup culminated in impeachment proceedings against Nixon and his resignation on Aug. 9, 1974. That same day, Ford became the 38th president.

Thirty days later, on Sept. 8, Ford announced his decision to pardon Nixon after attending historic St. John's Episcopal Church by himself that morning. Of the Nixons, Ford told the country: "Theirs is an American tragedy in which we have all played a part. It could go on and on and on, or someone must write the end to it. I have concluded that only I can do that, and if I can, I must."

Ford acknowledged that he badly misjudged the public outcry over his decision, and fallout continued through his two years in office. His first press secretary, Jerald terHorst, resigned. Speculation grew so rampant of a deal between Nixon and Ford that Ford took the unprecedented step of testifying under oath on the matter to the House Judiciary Committee in October 1974.

He never really outran the shadow of Watergate, but Ford moved on to concentrate on the faltering economy, which was in recession and plagued by the 1973 Arab oil embargo. Ford negotiated bills with the Democratic Congress to cut taxes and deregulate some industries, but he was also remembered for vetoing more bills — 66 — than all but three other presidents.

"Ford was very proud of the veto strategy," says Mieczkowski, the biographer. "Democrats thought it was government by impasse, but Ford viewed it as one of the great accomplishments of his entire presidency."

In foreign policy, Ford continued the diplomatic policy of detente with the Soviet Union. In 1975, the war in Vietnam ended with the fall of the South Vietnamese government.

Ford also displayed an eye for talent. He chose Dick Cheney as his chief of staff, Donald Rumsfeld as his Defense secretary and Alan Greenspan as chairman of his council of economic advisers. All would go on to serve in subsequent administrations.

"It was a White House that was an incubator for later presidencies," Princeton's Greenstein says.

Inside the White House, Ford's family made news. In 1974, Betty Ford was diagnosed with breast cancer. She acknowledged it publicly, which was rare at the time.

Later, she would admit to alcoholism and prescription-pill addiction. The Betty Ford Center in Rancho Mirage, Calif., was established to treat those with drug and alcohol addictions.

Ford faced other crises. On two trips to California in September 1975, he was the target of assassination attempts. Lynette "Squeaky" Fromme and Sara Jane Moore went to prison for the assaults. Ford was not struck either time.

The pressure and trappings of the office didn't change Ford as a man, says Nessen, Ford's press secretary.

"If you spend 20 years of your life running for president, it changes your personality," Nessen says. "His personality did not have those distortions built into it. He never expected to be president, he didn't want to be. He's a very down-to-earth guy."

By 1976, Ford had a tough primary race for his party's nomination. He beat Ronald Reagan and chose Kansas Sen. Bob Dole as his running mate.

But a tougher test awaited in Carter. Watergate and the Nixon pardon shadowed Ford's campaign, as did his debate stumble about Eastern Europe in a key debate with Carter. "His staff let him down," Nessen says. "We should have acknowledged the mistake. It did, I think, contribute to an unfair image of him not being very bright."

Even so, Nessen says an increase in unemployment before the election probably was a greater factor in Ford's loss to Carter.

Ford left office in January 1977.

In retirement, Ford lectured and hosted public policy conferences. Until recently, he attended annual reunions of Ford administration alumni in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0109390

From Carter to President Bush, occupants of the Oval Office have hailed his counsel and good judgment. After Carter's loss to Ronald Reagan in 1980, he and Ford took to the speaking circuit together and became what Ford described in a 2001 speech to Congress as "very warm and dear friends."

The Ford Presidency (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 27, 2006

GERALD R. FORD WAS the regular-guy president. Friendly and unassuming, Ford, whose death at 93 was announced Tuesday, came into office after the Watergate affair forced out Richard Nixon. Ford's openness and humanity was a refreshing contrast to the icy awkwardness and extensive covering up of his predecessor.

"Our long national nightmare is over," Ford proclaimed memorably on the day he assumed office. He and his wife Betty immediately telegraphed a more affable mood in Washington. Ford engendered a more candid relationship with reporters and a less combative stance toward Congress, where he had served for 25 years in the House representing Grand Rapids, Mich., including eight years as minority leader.

Two accidents of history propelled Ford to the presidency. After Vice President Spiro Agnew resigned in 1973, Nixon wanted a loyal No. 2, someone who could win easy approval in Congress and, some historians suggest, a man whose lack of presidential bearing might blunt the efforts that were brewing to remove Nixon. Ten months later, Nixon was out, and for the first time in U.S. history, a man who had never run for president or vice president became commander in chief.

In his two-plus years as president, Ford faced a tortuous gamut of foreign and domestic challenges, including the communist takeover of Vietnam, disarmament talks with the Soviet Union and raging inflation domestically. In day-to-day governing, his heavy reliance on the presidential veto opened him to criticism that he was less of a leader and more of a reactor. After all the controversies that have dogged presidents since, however, the Ford presidency looks relatively calm.

Ford will be remembered most for one act: his pardon of Nixon, just one month after the resignation. Ford wanted to govern as the president who led his nation out of the long shadow of Watergate. Yet his ill-timed and ill-considered pardon actually drew the shadow of Watergate over Ford's own presidency, destroying the Republican Party's chances in midterm elections that year and perhaps contributing to Ford's reelection loss to Jimmy Carter in 1976.

The pardon was a mistake, inconsistent with the fundamental principle that everyone, including the president, is equal before the law. Nixon tried hard to defy that principle and, coming so soon after his resignation, the pardon did the same. Some of those who once criticized Ford's pardon have softened their views over time, arguing that we needed healing and forgiveness. In 1974, however, after so much Nixonian stonewalling and evasiveness, our system of government would have been better served by letting the legal process take its course, no matter how uncertain.

History shows that Ford's top advisors were baffled by his determination to forgive Nixon right away. Ford's intention, some believe, was to prove that he could act as his own man and follow his own conscience. Others suggest he was influenced by the ghost of his own father, an abusive man who was devastated when Ford's mother divorced him and who died before the son had a chance to forgive him. Ford himself wrote in his memoirs that he knew the pardon was the right move and that he did not anticipate the virulence of the reaction against it. He may have been too nice a guy.

Retailer Settles Dispute With D.C. (WP)

By Annys Shin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

USA Discounters Agrees to Cap Charges for Credit Customers

USA Discounters, a Virginia Beach retailer, has agreed to limit what it charges District customers paying with credit and to pay $50,000 into a consumer-protection fund to settle allegations that it imposed finance charges that weren't properly disclosed.

The company sells furniture, electronics, computers and other items, largely to customers with poor credit and with a special focus on members of the military. In addition to locations in the District and Lanham, it has eight other stores near Fort Belvoir, the Norfolk naval installation, Fort Bragg and Camp Lejeune in North Carolina, Fort Benning in Georgia, and Fort Hood in Texas.

The company denies any wrongdoing, said Timothy W. Dorsey, USA Discounters' vice president and general counsel.

The voluntary agreement, reached Thursday with the D.C. attorney general's office, stemmed from agency concerns that the majority of the company's customers, who buy merchandise using the chain's in-house financing program, routinely paid substantially higher markups than did customers using cash.

Customers buying on credit typically pay in installments over a limited period. For example, at the USA Discounters in Northeast Washington yesterday, a recliner upholstered with the Redskins logo was on sale for twice-monthly installments of $36 for 24 months -- for a total of $1,728. A coffee table was being offered for twice-monthly payments of $19 for 24 months, or a total of $912.

Customers can try to negotiate for a reduced price, Dorsey said. Those armed with cash can often get better deals.

But because credit customers regularly paid substantially more, the D.C. attorney general's office alleged that USA Discounters was making customers pay finance charges without telling them. Under the federal Truth in Lending Act, costs imposed on credit customers and not on cash customers are considered finance charges and must be disclosed, the agency said.

Those charges also must be used to calculate the annual interest rate credit customers pay. By the agency's calculations, USA Discounters charged interest rates greater than 24 percent, a violation of D.C. consumer-protection laws.

"Prices for customers who buy on credit cannot be artificially inflated to hide the true cost of credit," said Eugene Adams, interim attorney general

Dorsey denied that the company hid finance charges from credit customers and that its annual interest rates exceeded 24 percent. He said that as with car buying, customers end up paying different prices because of a variety of factors, including the negotiating skill of the buyers.

"There is absolutely nothing wrong with permitting persons to negotiate prices. The Attorney General's unfortunately presumed that the difference in price was because some customers paid by credit," Dorsey said in an e-mail.

By signing the agreement, the company did not admit to breaking any laws. USA Discounters said it would ensure that on some items, the negotiated sales price wouldn't exceed a certain level. In rare cases, that could mean as much as a 21 percent savings to a customer, Dorsey said.

The company also plans to track how much cash customers pay compared with credit customers, to make sure they don't diverge substantially.

The five-year agreement applies only to the retailer's D.C. store.

Strategy, Not Drama, In 'I Intend To Run In '08' (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 25 — On Thursday, John Edwards is planning to announce what has been clear to much of the world since the end of the last presidential election: He is running for president in 2008. A similar declaration is expected shortly from Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, followed, in all probability, by Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton, Barack Obama and John McCain.

For all the very orchestrated hoopla about to be heaped on American voters over the next few weeks, presidential announcements have become, more often than not, vestigial remnants of the way presidential politics were once conducted (or at least the way they are remembered).

Rather than being big moments in which candidates lay down ideological markers and discuss what they would do as president, announcements are more of a pro forma exercise of the obvious. Campaigns grab at a political opportunity for attention with events that, ultimately, are of relatively small consequence.

For Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Romney, Mr. Edwards and Mr. McCain, it would be noteworthy, after all they have done, if they were to announce that they were not running. Mr. Edwards's 2008 campaign arguably began on Election Day 2004, when he lost as his party's vice-presidential candidate.

But if formal announcements hold little drama, they are hardly meaningless. Their timing and staging reflect how presidential politics are changing in the United States in 2008, and offer a glimpse at problems each candidate faces one year before the Iowa caucus. The announcements are an insight into how campaigns are adapting to the pressures of the Internet, the demands of fund-raising, the broad range of avenues for reaching voters and mobilizing supporters, and the particular dynamics of the '08 campaign, crowded with candidates, many of them celebrities.

Most strikingly, the announcements are being made extraordinarily early. In the 1992 cycle, Bill Clinton did not formally announce his candidacy until October 1991, three months before the Iowa caucus. When Mr. Edwards announces, with a round of morning talk show interviews and a press conference in the Lower Ninth Ward in New Orleans, he will become the third Democrat to enter the race formally.

As of now, about a half-dozen candidates have formed presidential exploratory committees, a preliminary step that allows them to raise money as they take soundings about a race. And Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., Democrat of Delaware, told reporters Tuesday that he planned to set up his exploratory committee next month.

In this crowded field, few candidates in either the Democratic or Republican Party can afford to wait and risk watching a rival pick off big-name elected officials, campaign consultants and contributors. And since aides to many of the candidates say they are likely to bow out of the public campaign finance system and raise money on their own, there is pressure to start raising money now.

"Timing is becoming much more of an issue," said Joe Trippi, who managed the 2004 presidential campaign of Howard Dean. "You're seeing it now in the urgency of these people to get out and announce. I'm worried that we're going to see people announce four years ahead of time next time the way this thing is moving."

Understandably, candidates are going to do what it takes to get publicity. Mr. Edwards's aides said they chose this slow-news time of year, and the backdrop of New Orleans neighborhoods ravaged by Hurricane Katrina, in part to command the maximum amount of attention. Camera crews will be permitted to film Mr. Edwards as he helps with the cleanup efforts.

But there are less obvious advantages as well. Mr. Trippi said that when Mr. Dean declared for president in June 2004, they timed his announcement for a week before the deadline for the release of campaign finance reports. The idea was that the excitement built by the announcement in Vermont would result in a surge of contributions that would allow Mr. Dean to surprise the political world with a display of his grass-roots financial support. Mr. Dean's big fund-raising report that month proved to be one of the biggest boosts of his campaign.

Mr. Edwards, who is arguably the most Web-savvy candidate in the '08 race to date, is using Thursday's event to try to gin up his supporters via the Internet. He sent out an e-mail message earlier this week, saying he was on the verge of making a decision that his aides say has, in fact, already been made.

"If you want to take this effort to the next level, send me an e-mail and let me know: JohnEdwards@readytochangeamerica.com," he wrote.

The decision of how to time the announcements also reflects the particular needs of the candidates.

For Mr. Edwards, there is clearly interest in trying to win attention after two months in which Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama dominated the coverage of the Democratic contest. The decision by Senator Evan Bayh of Indiana not to run has left a clear opportunity for Mr. Edwards to position himself as the alternative to the other two senators.

For Mr. Romney, it is a chance to try to reset his bearings after a month in which he has struggled to reconcile his effort to be the most socially conservative candidate in the race with a more liberal record, as Massachusetts governor, on such issues as abortion and gay rights.

The motivation for the announcement of Gov. Tom Vilsack, the Democratic governor of Iowa, was in many ways more typical: a fairly unknown politician trying to get his name on the board with a thematic speech delivered in early primary states.

There may still be a few stop-the-presses surprises lurking out there. There is still a smidgen of doubt about the candidacy of Mr. Obama, who is spending this week in Hawaii with his family discussing his future, and even a smaller smidgen of doubt about Mrs. Clinton.

Although Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts has said he is likely to make a second effort at running, some Democrats say they would not be shocked to see him bow out. And it will be interesting to see if Al Gore succumbs to pleading by Democrats to run.

Mr. Edwards has been preparing for this moment since the second in 2004 when he knew he and Mr. Kerry had been defeated. His relatively high standing in some early polls in Iowa is testimony, in part, to how much time he has spent there in the last two years. Mr. Edwards has also offered a spray of speeches, op-ed essays and interviews on the subject of poverty in the United States, so even the themes he unveils to begin his campaign are likely to be familiar.

Mr. Romney's intentions are also no mystery: he spent 212 days out of state last year, The Boston Globe reported last week, and has methodically moved over the past year to the right side of the Republican ocean.

And if Mrs. Clinton or Mr. McCain end up not running, that will come as sobering news to the stable of high-powered political talent they have recruited in recent months. Both even have putative campaign managers in place: Terry Nelson for Mr. McCain and Patti Solis Doyle for Mrs. Clinton.

Schwarzenegger's Leg Is Repaired In Surgery (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

SANTA MONICA, Calif., Dec. 26 (AP) — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's broken leg was put back together with wires and screws on Tuesday, and he should make a full recovery, though he will probably be on crutches during his inauguration next week, officials said.

Mr. Schwarzenegger broke his right thigh bone over the weekend while skiing with his family in Sun Valley, Idaho. He underwent a 90-minute operation.

"Following the surgery, the governor was awake, alert and talking," said Dr. Kevin Ehrhart, who performed the operation at St. John's Health Center. "He is now fully coherent, and I have cleared him to resume his duties as governor."

DOJ_NMG_0109393

Mr. Schwarzenegger will remain hospitalized for three days, and his full recovery will take about eight weeks, Dr. Ehrhart said.

The fracture is the governor's third medical problem in just over a year. In January, he needed 15 stitches to repair a cut lip after colliding with a car while riding his motorcycle in Los Angeles. He also spent several hours at a hospital last December with a rapid heartbeat.

Accident Is A Bad Break For Gov.'s Privacy (LAT)

By Peter Nicholas

The Los Angeles Times, December 27, 2006

Three days after he tripped and fell on an Idaho ski slope, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger underwent surgery Tuesday morning for a broken leg — a 90-minute procedure that his doctors termed successful.

While the governor was under anesthesia, he relinquished the powers of office to Lt. Gov. Cruz Bustamante. Schwarzenegger resumed his duties about 10:45 a.m. when his doctors pronounced him fit.

Schwarzenegger was expected to make a full recovery. He will remain hospitalized for three days; afterward, he will walk on crutches without a cast.

Dr. Kevin Ehrhart, Schwarzenegger's orthopedic surgeon, said recovery will take about eight weeks. The surgery proceeded "without complication," Ehrhart said in a statement, and "the post-operation X-rays looked great."

Schwarzenegger fractured his femur Saturday while skiing on Bald Mountain in Sun Valley, Idaho — one of many out-of-state trips the governor has made without public notice. The episode focused renewed attention on Schwarzenegger's continuing quest to keep his private life out of the public eye — standard procedure for a movie star but unusual for a sitting governor.

A friend who spoke to Schwarzenegger after the accident said the governor was "aggravated" about what happened, describing the accident as a "slow fall" on an icy surface.

Schwarzenegger's press office would not release any details about the accident. But Adi Erber, a ski instructor who was with him at the time, said Schwarzenegger was standing still before the accident, preparing for the final 200 yards of the Lower Warm Springs run.

The governor's ski pole became caught in one of his skis, causing him to trip and fall, Erber said, describing it as a "freak accident."

He said the governor was in pain and that a rescue team took him down the hill on a toboggan.

The governor is being treated at St. John's Health Center in Santa Monica, according to people familiar with his medical care. Schwarzenegger's office would not disclose the hospital, citing security reasons.

In a prepared statement, First Lady Maria Shriver said: "When we checked Arnold into the hospital on Christmas night, he was looking forward to his surgery. He had been in good spirits. He asked when he could get back to work and he's looking forward to his inauguration next week. Our children and I are grateful for everyone's support and prayers."

Schwarzenegger loves to have fun on his own terms, even if there is an element of danger — a dimension of his personality that is seldom on public display.

He relishes long rides on his motorcycle. He goes on rafting trips. And he skis.

Pat O'Brien, a television personality and longtime friend of Schwarzenegger and Shriver, said Tuesday that the governor "lives his life to the fullest, and with that comes risks — whether it be on the slopes or on a motorcycle."

In January, Schwarzenegger was riding his Harley-Davidson with his son Patrick in a sidecar when he got into a crash. The accident occurred when the driver of a Volvo SUV pulled out of a driveway on Mandeville Canyon Road in Brentwood. Schwarzenegger received 15 stitches on his lip. His son was not injured.

Schwarzenegger conceded that he had been driving for years without a proper motorcycle license; he has since gotten one.

In December 2001, Schwarzenegger broke six ribs when he fell off his motorcycle. He was hospitalized for four days at St. John's.

Few Californians would have known their governor spent hours skiing near his Idaho vacation home this weekend if Schwarzenegger had not broken his leg.

Following its standard practice, the governor's press office on Friday revealed only that Schwarzenegger had left the state. The press release said that Schwarzenegger would have no public activities from Dec. 23 to 25. But in a private letter to Bustamante's office, the governor's staff said that he would be out of state from Dec. 22 to Jan 1.

Cloaking the governor's itinerary ensures at least some measure of privacy when Schwarzenegger is taking a break, aides contend.

DOJ_NMG_0109394

"The governor is an international celebrity who values his privacy when he's with his family," said Adam Mendelsohn, the governor's communications director.

But secrecy carries an added advantage: minimizing the chance of an unflattering photograph or a spontaneous quote from a vacationing Schwarzenegger that veers off message.

Early in his term, Schwarzenegger revealed his out-of-state whereabouts. That ended after a trip to Hawaii in April 2004.

The Times found the governor at the Four Seasons Resort in Maui and in an interview, Schwarzenegger said he wanted to see the Legislature reduced to part-time status. He never pursued that option.

Schwarzenegger frequently travels outside California — either on business or for pleasure.

He has been out of state for 204 of the 1,136 days he has been in office — or 1 of every 5.6 days, according to records kept by Bustamante's office.

In contrast, former Gov. Gray Davis was out of state for 113 of 1,779 days in office — or 1 of every 15.7 days.

Though Schwarzenegger has often been away as part of his job, he has also gone to Nevada and Ohio for bodybuilding competitions that had no connection to state business.

Locating the governor can be a game of cat and mouse. In 2004, Schwarzenegger addressed the Republican National Convention in New York. Aides said he was returning afterward to California. Instead, he veered off to Sun Valley. No one from his staff announced that his itinerary had changed.

In August 2005, he made a trip to the Bahamas that was never announced.

A survey of some western governors Tuesday showed practices vary when it comes to fully disclosing private out-of-state travel.

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson reveals his whereabouts on private trips on a case-by-case basis, according to his office. Nevada Gov. Kenny C. Guinn's office said he might not necessarily issue a news release if he is on a family vacation. Washington Gov. Chris Gregoire's office said she does not reveal her destination when she takes personal trips out of state.

When Schwarzenegger leaves California, Bustamante becomes acting governor.

Bustamante has taken little dramatic action in the time Schwarzenegger has been away. One exception came in December 2003. Schwarzenegger had gone with his family to Sun Valley for the holidays.

While he was away, Bustamante declared a state of emergency in Santa Barbara County in response to an earthquake.

A spokesman for Bustamante said that California, a state prone to natural disasters, is at greater risk when the governor is gone as much as Schwarzenegger.

"You need someone on the ground who can take action immediately when it's needed — activating the National Guard or getting fire crews where they need to go," said Bustamante aide Stephen Green. "When you're gone one day out of five, a lot of things just don't get done."

Bustamante gave his office the day off Tuesday and exercised no powers in the hours Schwarzenegger was under anesthesia.

"I wanted him to appoint me to the Supreme Court, but he wouldn't," Green said.

Schwarzenegger Cleared To Resume Duties After Surgery (CHIT)

By Peter Nicholas

Chicago Tribune, December 27, 2006

SACRAMENTO -- Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's broken right femur was repaired today and he was cleared to resume his official duties, the governor's office announced.

The surgery to fix his thigh bone, which the governor broke Saturday while skiing in Sun Valley Idaho, lasted an hour and a half. Schwarzenegger was cleared to resume his duties at approximately 10:45 a.m., according to the news release.

In the prepared statement, orthopedic surgeon Dr. Kevin Ehrhart said the surgery "involved using cables and screws to wire the two main fragments of the governor's broken femur bone back together. It lasted approximately an hour an a half, was without complication, and the post-operation x-rays look great.

"Following the surgery, the governor was awake, alert and talking in the recovery room. He is now fully coherent and I have cleared him to resume his duties as governor," Ehrhart said.

Schwarzenegger will remain in the hospital for three days and will take approximately eight weeks to heal, said Ehrhart, who predicted a full recovery. The governor is not in a cast and will use crutches to walk while his leg heals, he said.

Aides said that preparations are being made for the governor to work from the hospital on his inauguration next month, the state of the State address and the 2006-07 budget proposal.

Adi Erber, a ski instructor who was with the governor at the time of the accident, said that Schwarzenegger was standing still, preparing for the final 200 yards of the run on Bald Mountain in Sun Valley, Idaho. The governor's ski pole got caught in one of his skis, causing him to trip and fall.

Erber described it as a "freak accident."

He said the governor was in pain, and that a rescue team took him down the hill on a toboggan. Schwarzenegger was then taken to the hospital for X-rays.

The two men, accompanied by security guards, had been skiing for about two hours prior to the accident, Erber said.

"It was the last run down," Erber said. "He was trying to take off again and he tripped."

Erber, a fellow Austrian, said that skiing is one of Schwarzenegger's favorite sports, and predicted that once the governor's leg heals he would be back at it.

"I've skied with him for 18 years," he said. "He's an expert skier."

He added that the governor "will be back in shape in no time. And I'm sure he will ski again."

While Schwarzenegger was on the surgery table, Lt. Governor Cruz Bustamante was in charge. He was notified this morning that Schwarzenegger had been cleared, according to a prepared statement by Andrea Hoch, his legal affairs secretary.

Selling Couples On Marriage (WT)

By Jon Ward [part Two Of Four]

The Washington Times, December 27, 2006

Second of four parts.

The lesson would be how to keep "the fire burning," Nisa Muhammad told nine couples at her Tuesday night marriage class in the District.

"I need this session," said Rossalyn Parks, whose boyfriend had yet to arrive or call with an explanation. She was on fire, all right.

All nine couples were black, and most live in low-income neighborhoods in the District or Prince George's County.

Mrs. Muhammad's "Wedded Bliss" program, which will receive $1.3 million in federal money over the next four years, is aimed at helping black couples.

"We've kind of bought into the hype that marriage doesn't matter ... in the culture, the music, the movie, on TV," said Mrs. Muhammad, a 49-year-old mother of five who was divorced after 12 years and remarried last year.

Mrs. Muhammad said that TV provides an unrealistic portrayal of single parents and that life is "very different if you're ... Tamika in Southeast D.C."

In this series, The Washington Times examines the changing views of marriage and what institutions -- such as religious groups, government and businesses -- are doing to preserve it.

Mrs. Muhammad's program is one of many that churches and religious groups are using to strengthen marriages and foster new ones. Wedded Bliss is an eight-week class that encourages couples to marry by helping them build intimacy and teaching communication skills.

Airing grievances

At the Tuesday night meeting, Mrs. Muhammad -- who converted to Islam in 1980 and writes for the Nation of Islam's national newspaper, the "Final Call" -- gave a short talk to the couples.

She then asked each woman to share her "vision" of their husband or boyfriend.

Ms. Parks' cousin, Deidra Arnold, a 40-year-old divorced U.S. postal worker, said her boyfriend, Donald Aikens, a 45-year-old construction worker and lifelong bachelor, loves to serve others.

"We can go to the store, Home Depot or whatever, and he helps everybody," said Ms. Arnold, who got married when she was 21 and has a 21-year-old daughter.

The atmosphere in the room softened. The other couples, seated at tables arranged in a horseshoe, thought about what they would say.

"Great," said Mrs. Muhammad, wearing a dark green suit and a matching head scarf. "Rossalyn?"

Ms. Parks, 40, hesitated. She and William Thompson, 40, also a postal worker, began dating in August.

"I'm going to be honest with y'all. I am kind of angry with William, so I don't even have a vision," she said.

Jamil Muhammad, a national spokesman for the Nation of Islam who helps Mrs. Muhammad facilitate the class, jumped in.

"You're angry on the basis of sight," he told Ms. Parks. "You've got to look into the future on the basis of vision."

Ms. Parks sighed.

"It's kind of hard to say," she said before opening up about Mr. Thompson's work ethic.

DOJ_NMG_0109396

"He wants to be at work every day. He'll probably have 1,500 hours of sick leave, ready to sell some vacation time," Ms. Parks said, pausing for several moments. "But I don't see him committing to a marriage by then."

"Ooh," whispered Mr. Muhammad, as if he'd been stung by a bee.

Mrs. Muhammad didn't blink.

"OK, well, we've got some work to do," she said. "Thank you, Rossalyn."

Then she was on to the next couple.

Later, Mrs. Muhammad said she has seen growth in Ms. Parks and Mr. Thompson, who arrived at her class "with no sense of vision."

"We're trying to change the hearts and minds of people who look at marriage in a negative way and say, 'You know, we have something to celebrate,' " she said.

Remembering religion

Churches and religious groups have always played a crucial role in sanctioning marriages, encouraging them and providing couples counseling. Marriage is an essential part of the three Abrahamic faiths -- Judaism, Christianity and Islam.

But modern culture continues to question the definition and validity of marriage.

"Increasingly, it is not obvious to our young people, the singles, the twentysomethings, why they should go ahead and get married," said Michael Lawrence, associate pastor at Capitol Hill Baptist Church in the District. "That case has to be made."

Peter Murphy, family life director for the Archdiocese of Washington, agreed.

"The images of marriage are very negative," he said. "Couples think it's going to restrict their freedom. ... There is fear of commitment to something long term in a culture that is so short term and noncommittal."

In response, some churches are teaching more often and more robustly about marriage and challenging teens and singles on their attitudes about marriage.

"We try to show that marriage is actually freeing and will bring life," Mr. Murphy said.

Churches also are creating small groups for newly married couples, led by older couples, and adapting counseling to meet challenges unique to second marriages.

Marriage, Christians believe, is primarily a way to imitate the Triune God. Husbands are to love and lead their wives sacrificially, in the same way that Jesus Christ died to save His church. Wives, equal in value but with different roles, are to support their husbands.

"Marriage is a picture of the Gospel," Mr. Lawrence said. "Marriage was created by God to help us understand that he loves us in Jesus Christ."

Marriage is also a "crucible" in which each person's weakness and sinfulness is exposed, leading to repentance and change by God's power.

"God puts us with another person that is sometimes very different because it forces us to put aside selfishness and pride," said Pastor Paul Petry, who oversees family ministries at Mars Hill Church in Seattle. "If we fix our eyes on Christ and make it a goal to love that other person in a sacrificial way, there is something mysterious that happens, and that marriage becomes a wonderful thing."

Judaism views marriage as "a relationship that is set apart from all others," said Rabbi Jack Moline of the Agudas Achim Congregation in Alexandria.

"It is uniquely intimate and exclusive, and as such, it is a reflection of the nature of the relationship between the Jewish people and God," he said.

For Mr. Moline and other rabbis, a Jewish wedding can be performed only if the bride and groom are Jewish.

"All of the things that define marriage are matters of Jewish law, and Jewish law posits that it applies only to Jews, and not to non-Jews," he said.

Many Christian pastors counsel against marrying non-Christians as well.

Muslims also see marriage as a fundamental part of practicing their faith.

"Marriage is the most important aspect of a Muslim life," said Imam Mohamed Magid of the All Dulles Area Muslim Society, one of the largest mosques in the area.

"The whole Koran talks a lot about marriage and the relationship between husband and wife and the family," he said. "There is so much emphasis in the Koran on teaching about this issue."

Mr. Magid said he began offering six-session, premarital-counseling courses to couples a few years ago, when he saw a study showing that 33 percent of Muslim marriages ended in divorce. But, he said, there are few mosques in the United States that offer such counseling.

DOJ_NMG_0109397

"The extended family in the countries of the immigrant [Muslims] creates a very strong support network for young couples," Mr. Magid said. "Here in America, there is no extended family. The wisdom has to come through a structured counseling that tells them about communication, conflict resolution, decision-making ... and also to talk about the issue of intimacy."

Saving marriage

Michael J. McManus thinks churches are not only doing too little for marriages, but in many cases, they are part of the divorce problem.

"Most churches are wedding factories today," said Mr. McManus, who created a Marriage Savers program in 1986. "They have good intentions, but their marriage preparation is not that helpful."

About 10,000 pastors and rabbis in 215 cities across the country have signed an agreement to uphold higher standards for premarital counseling. Marriage Savers focuses on marriage preparation, enrichment, restoration, reconciliation of separated couples and counseling for stepfamilies.

Mr. McManus said his program has proven results. In cities where religious leaders have signed "community marriage policies," divorce rates and cohabitation rates are decreasing and marriage rates are increasing, he said.

"The churches need to do this work, but we need to do a better job," said Mr. McManus, a nationally syndicated ethics and religion columnist who attends Fourth Presbyterian Church in Bethesda. "The disintegration of marriage is the most important domestic problem of our time. It lies behind so many other problems."

Ted and Peg Kupelian of Rockville have mentored 20 couples through the Marriage Savers program.

"I saw a lot of divorces at work," said Mr. Kupelian, 60, a public-affairs specialist in the federal government. "This was one thing we could do together to really make a difference."

Tim and Kristen Bibo of Baltimore had never met the Kupelians but traveled to their home for eight weeks before getting married Oct. 28.

"When you have people you're friends with ... there are certain barriers," said Mr. Bibo, 28, an analyst with the state government. "Meeting new people that you develop a new relationship with, and you start it off with this openness, is something you really can't do with people that you know."

Mr. Bibo said the Kupelians, who have been married 26 years, "really challenged [us] about things that are going to be challenges."

The Kupelians took the Bibos through a 156-question inventory, going over the answers to questions about all aspects of their life.

"We're trying to open their eyes so they know exactly what to expect, to minimize surprises once they get married," said Mrs. Kupelian, who stayed at home with the couple's two daughters and now volunteers at Bible studies and in Montgomery County public schools.

The couples talked about how the Bibos would handle the demands of extended family during the holidays and helped them work on a budget.

"We want the trouble in our kitchen rather than in their bedroom or their kitchen," Mrs. Kupelian said. "We don't want people to be afraid to have conflict."

Mr. McManus said most marriages fall apart because people "don't know how to argue." Mrs. Kupelian said they teach young couples to "attack the problem, not each other."

Mrs. Bibo, 31, who works in philanthropy, said she appreciated the structure.

"It's a lot about being really intentional and having the space to do it," she said. "I loved the space of talking about marriage in its seriousness and its difficulty. That gives you a sense of security, that it's OK if you are fighting."

Out of the 20 couples mentored by the Kupelians, one has divorced, and one is struggling. Three of the couples they mentored decided not to get married.

"I don't see that as failure," Mr. Kupelian said. "I see that as one less divorce."

Meeting in the middle

Ms. Parks married at 24. She and her high-school sweetheart divorced after 12 years, and she now has a 12-year old daughter.

Mr. Thompson has never married.

Despite her pessimistic comments at Mrs. Muhammad's meeting, days later Ms. Parks said the program had "enhanced" her relationship with Mr. Thompson and she is hopeful about the relationship.

Specifically, she said, the class helped Ms. Parks and her daughter, Angel, to adapt to Mr. Thompson's three nieces and nephews, ages 20, 18 and 2, who live with him and are often visiting.

"My daughter was used to going in the refrigerator, getting what she wants, doing her laundry when she wants to," Ms. Park said. "They were teaching us that we now are sharing our lives with others, and we can't be selfish."

DOJ_NMG_0109398

Ms. Parks took notes during the eight-week class in a journal given to her by Mrs. Muhammad. Mr. Thompson could not read it until the end of the class.

The journal -- and the conversations between her and Mr. Thompson during the classes -- helped them grow much closer, she said.

"Now we're better equipped to communicate," Ms. Parks said. "I don't just stay angry. We talk about it and we get through it. It's also good to know that people are going through the same problems."

Ms. Parks estimates her chances of marrying Mr. Thompson are about 70 percent.

"I'm not saying we have to get married tomorrow, but you have to be open to that idea," she said. "I don't feel like I'm running out of time, but I don't feel like I have time to be wasting on a relationship that's not going anywhere."

"I don't see him wasting my time, and I don't see him hurting me," Ms. Parks said. "I do think he'll commit. My problem is, when?"

U.S. out of love with marriage?

Of Public Debt And Private Wealth (WP)

By Steven Pearlstein

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

With Democrats about to take charge on Capitol Hill, we're going to be hearing a lot about the widening income gap between rich and poor.

There are a variety of different measures for inequality and lots of factors that drive the data, ranging from winner-take-all labor market competition and the weakness of unions to the pace of immigration and the tendency of high-income people to marry each other.

Furthermore, during different periods, this widening of the gap has been most apparent at various rungs of the income ladder -- between the poor and the middle class in the '80s, between the middle class and the upper class in the early '90s, and, most recently, between the very rich and just about everyone else.

All of this is about to become grist for a great national debate on inequality, with everyone picking the income measures, gaps and causes that best support their economic views or their preferred solutions. As it plays out, it's important to remember that there isn't one correct analysis or any silver-bullet solution.

In that spirit, I'd like to toss out an idea borrowed from a reader in Canada with no particular training in economics but an intuitive sense about the connection between trade flows and income inequality. The idea goes something like this:

In terms of the global economy, the elephant in the room for much of the last 25 years has been the large and persistent U.S. current account deficit (loosely, the trade deficit), which this year is likely to exceed $800 billion. Roughly speaking, the richest country in the world spends 106 percent of its income.

If the United States were almost any other country, we wouldn't be able to sustain this huge imbalance for very long because the rest of the world would be unwilling to finance it. But, as it happens, developing nations suddenly have more savings than they know what to do with, much of it denominated in dollars as a result of selling us inexpensive clothing and electronics and very expensive oil.

These countries know that if they were to try to exchange all those dollars for their own currencies, it would drive down the value of the dollar -- and with it, demand by American consumers for all the things they sell. Rather than accept slower growth and higher unemployment, they have decided to keep their currencies loosely pegged to the dollar by investing those trade-surplus dollars in U.S. assets.

One obvious effect of this decision is to drive up demand for U.S. stocks, bonds and real estate, which foreigners have purchased either directly or through such intermediaries as hedge and private-equity funds. Their money was a significant factor in the tech and telecom bubbles of the 1990s, the current bubble in corporate takeovers and commercial real estate, and the just-ended bubble in residential real estate. Indirectly, it also helps explain why stock prices are at or near all-time records.

Moreover, because so much of the trade deficit is reinvested in debt instruments such as Treasury bonds, it has had the effect of lowering interest rates below where they would otherwise be. Low interest rates, in turn, encourage both foreign and American investors to use more borrowed money in their investment strategies, allowing them to buy more assets with the same amount of their own money.

So what does this have to do with income inequality? Quite a bit, actually.

We've known for a long time that increased trade with low-wage countries depresses wages of workers who produce goods and services now imported. A trade deficit equal to 7 percent of economic output obviously magnifies that effect.

DOJ_NMG_0109399

But as the trade deficit is depressing wages at the bottom, it is now boosting incomes at the top by significantly inflating the value of stocks, bonds and real estate -- assets whose ownership is concentrated heavily in the hands of high-income people. By buying and selling these assets, and borrowing against them, these people have been transforming their paper wealth into spendable (and measurable) income at a record pace.

Finally, let's remember that all this buying, selling and monetizing of assets has created lots of fat fees for handling these transactions or serving as financial intermediaries. Those fees, in turn, translate into eye-popping bonuses for Wall Street investment bankers, hedge fund managers and partners in private-equity firms.

It would be an exaggeration, of course, to argue that our large and persistent trade deficit is the major factor in rising inequality. After all, inequality also is rising in countries with trade surpluses.

But I think the deficit does help explain why so much of the country's income gains have gone into the pockets of investment bankers, money managers, real estate developers, wealthy families and corporate executives loaded up with stock options. I'm sure these folks believe they are pulling away from the pack because they work harder and create more economic value than the rest of us. But in the coming debate, we need to remember that they are also the lucky beneficiaries of a runaway trade deficit and the bubble-prone economy it has created.

Myths And The Middle Class (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

Almost all Americans see themselves as "middle class." To declare yourself middle class is to say you've succeeded without openly bragging that you're superior -- a no-no in a democratic culture. You're like everyone else, only a little more or less so.

Not surprisingly, a recent poll done for the Economic Policy Institute, a liberal think tank, finds that only 2 percent of Americans put themselves in the "upper class" and a mere 8 percent consider themselves "lower class." The large majority classify themselves as "upper-middle class" (17 percent) or "middle class" (45 percent). The rest (27 percent) see themselves as "working class," a stepping stone to the middle class.

Because the "middle class" isn't really the middle -- it's a huge blob -- describing how "it" feels and thinks is usually an act of simplification, exaggeration or invention. Yet that's routine because politicians and commentators want to show that they grasp the hopes and fears of everyday Americans.

The middle class today is said to be angry and anxious. It's worried about jobs, health insurance and retirement income. The EPI poll explores these discontents. Up to a point, it confirms conventional wisdom. One question asked respondents to agree with one of the following statements:

Most people today face increasing uncertainty about employment, with stagnant incomes, paying more for health care, taxes, and retirement, while those at the top have booming incomes and lower taxes.

Or:

Our economy faces ups and downs, but most people can expect to better themselves, see rising incomes, find good jobs and provide economic security for their families.

By an overwhelming 61 to 34 percent, respondents preferred the first statement. They didn't like oil companies (66 to 13 percent), drug companies (49 to 25 percent) and corporate CEOs (35 to 18 percent). One interesting exception to the anti-big-business sentiment was Wal-Mart, whose favorable rating (45 to 29 percent) almost equaled Social Security's (48 to 24 percent). Globalization wasn't especially popular either; by 59 to 32 percent, respondents favored more limits on imports.

So the middle class is furious, as portrayed. Well, not exactly. What's striking is the huge gap between people's views about "the economy" -- an abstraction -- and their own personal situations:

? Although only 32 percent rate the overall economy as "excellent" or "good," 52 percent judge their personal situation as excellent or good (35 percent said "fair" and 13 percent "poor").

? Most Americans (60 to 37 percent) think their own living standards are rising; parents of children under 18 overwhelmingly (54 to 24 percent) think the same will be true for their children.

? Almost 70 percent of Americans say they've attained or will attain the "American Dream," as they define it. More than half say success comes from a good education and hard work, not from connections (18 percent) or being born wealthy (13 percent).

Just as Americans often criticize public education but like their local school (or hate Congress while supporting the local congressman), they rationalize personal economic success with national economic shortcomings.

Both "conservative and liberal elites" are out of touch with typical Americans, say the pollsters who conducted the survey. Conservatives' focus on overall economic performance (say, gross domestic product) minimizes individuals' "hard work" to improve "their living standards against the odds." But liberals underestimate Americans' "emphasis on personal responsibility and overestimate the degree to which [people] see themselves as victims."

Maybe. But there's a simpler explanation for the confusion: Americans' optimism and perfectionism are constantly mugged by reality. Consider why this will continue.

People value stability and security. They also want higher incomes. Unfortunately, the two sometimes collide. In a recent book, "Economic Turbulence," three economists show that the constant turnover of companies and business locations ("establishments") improves economic growth -- but creates disruption and stress. In the five industries studied (trucking, computer chips, financial services, software and food stores), the productivity of the best establishments is often double that of the worst. Replacing the less efficient with the more efficient ultimately lowers costs and raises living standards.

Compounding the stress, the price of entry into the middle class is always rising. The more we can have, the more we must have. Keeping up with the Joneses is the curse of our advances and ambitions. Thirty years ago a middle-class existence didn't include central air-conditioning, computers, cellphones or cable television. It will soon include flat-panel TVs. Similarly, new drugs and surgeries raise the cost of health insurance, reducing coverage and take-home pay. From 1991 to 2005 the cost of fringe benefits (mainly health insurance) rose nearly twice as fast as wages.

Americans cannot escape these realities. The economy will remain precarious if it remains productive. The new technologies and products we celebrate inflict anxiety by redefining middle-class society. The causes of our success are also the sources of our stress. Of course, many of today's complaints (growing inequality, eroding health insurance) are legitimate and, to some extent, might be corrected. But the remedies -- assuming they didn't make matters worse -- would succeed only temporarily, because they would not erase the basic dilemma.

The middle-class "squeeze" never vanishes. Sometimes the economy so outperforms expectations (say, after World War II or during the late 1990s) that it creates a lull. But that merely elevates expectations to more unrealistic levels and ensures later disappointment. The economy pleases most people most of the time -- but can never please everyone all of the time.

Bumping In Schools (NYT)

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

The United States has a long and shameful history of dumping its least effective, least qualified teachers into the schools that serve the neediest children. The No Child Left Behind Act requires the states to end this practice. But the states are unlikely to truly improve teacher quality — or spread qualified teachers more equitably throughout the schools — until they pay more attention to how teachers are trained, hired, evaluated and assigned.

To get control of the assignment process, districts will need to abandon union rules that basically guarantee senior teachers the right to change schools whenever they want — even if the principal of the receiving school does not want them — by bumping a less senior teacher out of his or her job.

Obviously, not every teacher who moves to a new school is a bad egg. But principals who wish to shed ineffective teachers often induce them to transfer by threatening negative evaluations, turning the transferring teacher into the receiving school's problem. A study by a nonpartisan New York research group, the New Teacher Project, found that the transfer dance goes on well into the summer, creating a logistical train wreck in staffing. Unable to determine their hiring needs in a timely fashion, school administrators delay making decisions — thus losing better-qualified applicants who grow frustrated and take jobs elsewhere.

Talented novices, with no seniority rights to protect them, often quit the field after being shunted from one place to another. Others give up on the urban school systems where the bumping process is most prevalent and high-tail it to the suburbs. Meanwhile, back in the city, schools are still cobbling together their staffs after the school year has begun. The revolving door turns, instructional time is lost and children suffer.

States and localities are beginning to recognize the problems with this system. New York City, for example, eliminated the forced transfer right in contract negotiations. In California, the State Legislature has passed a law giving principals at low-performing schools the power to veto forced transfers. The law also requires that seniority-based transfers be completed for all schools by April 15 for the following school year.

Urban systems all over the country need to move toward reform. A senior teacher who has been forced out elsewhere or who simply wishes to move elsewhere should be guaranteed an interview at the preferred school, but not a job. School managers, who are increasingly being held accountable for student performance, need to be able to hire the candidate best suited for the position.

Somalian Troops Advance Toward Capital (AP)

By Mohamed Olad Hassan

AP, December 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0109401

Somalia government soldiers, joined by troops from neighboring Ethiopia, advanced toward Somalia's capital Tuesday as Islamic fighters dug in and promised a "new phase" in the war — a chilling pronouncement from a movement that has threatened suicide attacks.

Somalia called on the Council of Islamic Courts militias, bloodied by a week of artillery and mortar attacks, to surrender and promised amnesty if they lay down their weapons, government spokesman Abdirahman Dinari said.

A U.N. official, meanwhile, said Tuesday that Ethiopian-backed government troops were advancing on Mogadishu, the capital, from two directions and facing stiff resistance.

Francois Lonseny Fall, the top U.N. envoy to Somalia, also said 35,000 Somalis had crossed into neighboring Kenya to escape the fighting, which forced the U.N. to suspend aid delivery to two million Somalis.

As many as 1,000 people may have been killed and 3,000 wounded in the fighting, many of them foreign radicals, Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi said.

Meles said about 3,000 to 4,000 Ethiopian forces, which entered Somalia on Saturday, may soon wrap up their offensive against the Islamic militias that until recent days controlled most of southern part of the country.

"As soon as we have accomplished our mission — and about half of our mission is done, and the rest shouldn't take long — we'll be out," Meles told reporters in the Ethiopian capital, Addis Ababa.

The U.N. envoy, Fall, called the fighting "disastrous" for the Somalian people and asked the Security Council to call for an immediate cease-fire.

The council took no immediate action on a draft presidential statement circulated by Qatar calling for a cease-fire and withdrawal of foreign forces, specifying Ethiopian troops. The United States and several other nations objected to singling out Ethiopia and the call for a truce, saying talks and a political agreement are needed for stability before foreign forces can leave. The council agreed to continue discussions Wednesday.

A U.S. State Department spokesman in Washington appeared to endorse Ethiopia's military action, saying it had "genuine security concerns" about the growth of powerful Islamic militias next door.

The spokesman, Gonzalo Gallegos, said he had no information on whether the U.S., which is concerned about the militia's ties to foreign Islamic militants, was aiding the Ethiopian military with supplies.

Ethiopia sent fighter jets streaking deep into militia-held areas Sunday to help Somalia's U.N.-recognized government push back the Islamic militias. Ethiopia bombed the country's two main airports and helped government forces capture several villages.

Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed, a top leader of the Islamic group, accused Ethiopian troops of massacring 50 civilians in the central town of Cadado. Ethiopian officials were not immediately available to respond.

Ahmed said his fighters are in tactical retreat in the face of superior Ethiopian firepower. But the military struggle has just begun, he added.

"The war is entering a new phase," Ahmed said from Mogadishu, the capital. "We will fight Ethiopia for a long, long time and we expect the war to go everyplace."

Ahmed declined to elaborate, but some Islamic leaders have threatened a guerrilla war to include suicide bombings in Addis Ababa.

Ismael Mohamoud Hurreh, Somalia's foreign minister, said Tuesday that the government's small military force has been training for this offensive for five months.

"We will hold our line very, very well, don't worry about that," Hurreh told reporters in Nairobi, Kenya.

Experts fear the conflict in Somalia could engulf the region. Islamic courts leaders have repeatedly said they want to incorporate ethnic Somalis living in eastern Ethiopia, northeastern Kenya and Djibouti into a Greater Somalia.

For months, foreign Islamic radicals — including Pakistanis, Arabs and Chechens — have been trickling into Somalia to fight on behalf of the Islamic movement. According to a U.N. report in October, Eritrea — Ethiopia's neighbor and longtime adversary — has dispatched 2,000 soldiers to Somalia to fight against the Ethiopian-backed central government.

Ethiopia's Meles said his goal is not to defeat the militias but severely damage their military power — and allow both sides to return to peace talks on an even footing.

"The rank and file of the Islamic Courts militia is not a threat to Ethiopia," he said Tuesday. "Once they return to their bases, we will leave them alone."

Ethiopian troops will not enter Mogadishu, he said. Instead, he said, Somali forces would encircle the city to contain the militias that control it.

Any effort by the Somali government or Ethiopia to take the capital risks a disaster similar to the U.S. intervention in Somalia in 1992.

DOJ_NMG_0109402

That U.N.-sponsored mission ended in 1993, after Somali militiamen shot down a U.S. Army Black Hawk helicopter. Eighteen American servicemen were killed in the crash and vicious street fighting that preceded and followed, made famous in the book and movie "Black Hawk Down."

Somalia has not had an effective government since warlords overthrew longtime dictator Mohamed Siad Barre in 1991, pushing the country into anarchy.

Two years ago, the United Nations helped set up a central government for the arid, impoverished nation on the Horn of Africa. But until the past week, it had little influence outside of its seat in the city of Baidoa, about 140 northwest of Mogadishu.

The country was largely under the control of warlords until this past summer, when the Islamic militia movement pushed them aside.

One critical issue is whether the central government can win the support of Somalis. Many resent Ethiopia's intervention because the countries have fought two wars over their disputed border in the past 45 years.

Hurreh, the Somali foreign minister, said Somalis will embrace the fall of the Islamic militias. Their severe interpretation of Islam is reminiscent, to some, of Afghanistan's Taliban regime — ousted by a U.S.-led campaign in 2001 for harboring Osama bin Laden.

"A lot of people in Mogadishu will be very happy to chew some qat and have the Islamic courts out of their way," Hurreh said, referring to the narcotic leaf banned by many of the Islamic courts.

U.S. Signals Backing For Ethiopian Incursion Into Somalia (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 26 — The United States on Tuesday signaled its support for the Ethiopian offensive in Somalia, calling it a response to “aggression” by Islamists who have since the summer been consolidating power in the country.

A spokeswoman for the State Department, Janelle Hironimus, said Ethiopia was trying to stem the flow of outside arms shipments to the Islamists. Ms. Hironimus added that Washington was concerned about reports that the Islamists were using child soldiers and abusing Ethiopian prisoners of war.

The statement was the most detailed by the United States since last week, when the long-simmering tension between Ethiopia and Somalia boiled over.

Ethiopia has long been a strong ally of Washington in the Horn of Africa. The American military has for years trained Ethiopian troops at bases in the eastern region. The training is part of a Pentagon effort to build the Ethiopian military into a bulwark against regional terrorist networks.

Maj. Marie Boughen of the Army, a spokeswoman for the United States Central Command, which has military responsibility for the horn, said no American troops were participating in the Ethiopian offensive or working as advisers for it.

The Ethiopian military presence in Somalia, while tacitly blessed by Washington, has nonetheless been awkward for American officials. They have publicly urged a return to peace talks by warring Somali factions, but some officials have also said an Ethiopian invasion could be the only factor to prevent the Islamists’ complete takeover of Somalia.

On Tuesday, a day after an Ethiopian jet strafed the airport in Mogadishu, the capital, the State Department issued internal guidance to staff members, instructing officials to play down the invasion in public statements.

“Should the press focus on the role of Ethiopia inside Somalia,” read a copy of the guidelines that was given to The New York Times by an American official here, “emphasize that this is a distraction from the issue of dialogue between the T.F.I.’s and Islamic courts and shift the focus back to the need for dialogue.”

T.F.I. is an abbreviation for the weak transitional government in Somalia.

“The press must not be allowed to make this about Ethiopia, or Ethiopia violating the territorial integrity of Somalia,” the guidance said.

The Bush administration is using American ambassadors throughout the region in an effort to have African nations press the Islamists to return to the negotiating table.

Senior leaders of the Islamist coalition, the Islamic Courts Union, have issued a global call to jihad for Muslims to travel to Somalia to fight troops from Ethiopia.

American intelligence officials said they did not believe that foreign fighters had traveled to Somalia in great numbers and that mostly Somalis made up the force fighting the Ethiopians.

American intelligence officials theorize that the Islamists, who wrested control of Mogadishu in June from a coalition of warlords supported by the Central Intelligence Agency, have ties to a Qaeda cell based in East Africa that is responsible for the bombings of the American Embassies in Kenya and Tanzania in 1998.

DOJ_NMG_0109403

This year, the C.I.A. began a covert operation to arm and finance the warlords, who had united under the banner of the Alliance for the Restoration of Peace and Counterterrorism. Operated from the intelligence agency's station in Nairobi, Kenya, the effort involved frequent trips to Mogadishu by case officers from the agency and paying hundreds of thousands of dollars to the warlords.

The operation backfired. When the payments to the warlords shifted the military balance of the country in their favor, the Islamists started a strike against the American-backed coalition and ran it out of Mogadishu.

Since June, the State Department has reasserted its control of Somalia policy, trying to build support for a plan to bolster the transitional government with peacekeeping troops from other African nations.

Ethiopia Forces Somali Islamist Retreat (FT)

By Andrew England

Financial Times, December 27, 2006

Islamist forces withdrew from frontline positions in central Somalia on Tuesday after days of bombardment by Ethiopian fighter jets and artillery that marked a dramatic escalation of the conflict in the Horn of Africa nation.

Ethiopia, which backs the weak Somali government, launched air strikes in Somalia on Sunday, following several days of fighting between the Islamists and the transitional administration's troops around the town of Baidoa, the government's seat.

Meles Zenawi, Ethiopia's prime minister, on Tuesday said between 3,000 and 4,000 Ethiopian troops had "broken the back" of the Islamist forces and that up to 1,000 Islamic fighters had been killed. "We have already completed half our mission, and as soon as we finish the second half, our troops will leave," he said.

The Somali parties have been at loggerheads since June after the Islamists seized the capital Mogadishu from a group of US-backed warlords. The Islamic Courts Union, an alliance of militias, then extended its area of control throughout much of southern Somalia, while the government, which is divided, unpopular in many areas and includes some of the country's notorious warlords, exerted little influence outside Baidoa.

However, the administration, formed two years ago at a UN-backed conference, is recognised by the international community. Addis Ababa repeatedly warned it would protect the government and its borders against any threat from the Islamists, but only acknowledged its direct military involvement in the conflict on Sunday with Mr Meles saying it had been "forced to enter a war".

Ethiopia is a key regional ally of the US and has a long history of Christian rule, but it also has a large Muslim population.

The air strikes were seen as an attempt to weaken and divide the Islamic alliance - which includes both conservatives and militant hardliners - and it was unclear how far Ethiopian troops would go inside Somalia, analysts said. The danger Addis Ababa faces is being dragged into a protracted guerrilla war it is unlikely to win if its forces move deeper into Somalia or attempt to enter Mogadishu. It could also increase support for the Islamists through its actions.

There have also been mounting concerns that an escalation could attract foreign Muslim militants and suck in neighbouring countries – both Ethiopia and Eritrea are accused of using Somalia as a proxy for their own border dispute.

"They [Ethiopia] could get bogged down and there would be no way out, like the Americans in Iraq," said Yemane Kidane, a former senior Ethiopian government official and analyst. "I don't think there will be a military solution but the Islamic courts have to calm down and realise they cannot do everything by force."

Mr Yemane and others said Eritrea's response to the escalation would be crucial as it backs the Islamists, a move thought to be motivated solely to counter Addis Ababa.

Sheikh Sharif Ahmed, a senior leader with the Islamists, said the war was "entering a new phase," and indicated the Islamists were preparing for guerrilla fighting. "We will fight Ethiopia for a long, long time and we expect the war to go every place," he said.

Analysts say that while the Islamists, which have no air power, had suffered losses, their withdrawal from positions around Baidoa appeared coordinated, suggesting it was not a spontaneous retreat.

The African Union, which is based in Addis Ababa, said it would meet today with the Arab League, which has mediated talks in Khartoum, and the Intergovernmental Authority on Development, a regional eastern African body, to see how a faltering peace process could be revived.

However, there appeared to be divisions within the AU, with Patrick Mazimhaka, the deputy AU commission chairman, saying Ethiopia had the right to defend itself.

"We think the situation was definitely getting out of hand because the Islamic courts took it upon themselves to threaten all the neighbours with war, including Ethiopia, and we say if Ethiopia found itself vulnerable they have the right to defend themselves," he told the FT. "What we are saying is the international community as a whole, the UN, the AU, we do support the transitional government of Somalia which took so much to put in place."

DOJ_NMG_0109404

But Alpha Omar Konare, the commission's chairman, was later quoted in a statement saying he deeply regretted the escalation, calling for an end to the fighting and the resumption of dialogue.

Analysts, however, said Ethiopia's actions could embolden the Somali government and make it less willing to negotiate. Mr Meles has justified Ethiopia's action by saying it was forced to take "defensive measures," which would be "limited and proportional to the attacks launched against us and the dangers facing our country."

Both Addis Ababa and Washington accuse the Islamists of including and sheltering al-Qaida suspects, charges repeatedly denied by the courts' alliance. Somalia, a Muslim nation, has been without an effective government since 1991, and has been ruled by clan-based factions.

Many Somalis, while concerned about the extreme nature of some of the courts' leaders, had welcomed the Islamists for bringing a semblance of order to many areas for the first time in 15 years and filling the vacuum created in the absence of a state.

Ethiopians Closing In On Capital Of Somalia (WP)

By Stephanie McCrummen

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

LONDON, Dec. 26 -- Ethiopian troops fought their way closer to the Somali capital of Mogadishu on Tuesday, pushing back militias loyal to the Islamic Courts movement that has until now controlled much of the country and vowed to wage a guerrilla war against Ethiopia lasting "years and years and years."

Aid workers said the number of injured had surpassed 800, as thousands of civilians battered by drought, floods and now rockets and mortars continued to flee villages in droves.

U.N. officials warned of a humanitarian crisis in Somalia, while fears remained high that Ethiopia's aggressive military campaign could have disastrous consequences not only for Somalia but across the Horn of Africa.

"I find it perplexing what the Ethiopians are up to," said David Shinn, a former U.S. ambassador to that country. "Over the long term, I don't see where this gets them. And one wonders how long they can hang on in this situation, because eventually it's going to turn into a nasty guerrilla war, and I don't think the Ethiopians have the stomach to carry on with that kind of campaign."

It was unclear Tuesday whether Ethiopian troops were preparing to invade Mogadishu or merely surround it.

But Shinn and others noted that a force of 15,000 troops had failed to subdue the capital in 1993, when 18 U.S. troops were killed in an incident depicted in the book and film "Black Hawk Down."

At a news conference in Addis Ababa, Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi said that he had no plans to push into Mogadishu but that the campaign was only half-completed. The only option now, he added, was to win.

He said that he was pleased at how swiftly the campaign had gone and that 3,000 to 4,000 Ethiopian troops had "broken the back" of the Islamic Courts movement, which he has repeatedly accused of supporting secessionist groups in Ethiopia.

As Ethiopian troops pushed ahead, however, the Islamic Courts militias appeared to withdraw almost simultaneously from their front line positions, suggesting a coordinated strategy rather than a chaotic retreat, analysts said.

It was unclear where the Islamic fighters went. Some were spotted with their battle gear around Mogadishu; analysts said it was likely that most headed into the bush to prepare for a war on their own terms.

"The Islamic Courts know they can't confront Ethiopian tanks and airplanes" with trucks mounted with machine guns and ground troops, Shinn said. "I think they'd love to suck Ethiopia deep into Somalia and then slowly try to pick them off as they get bogged down."

On Tuesday, Islamic Courts leader Sharif Ahmed again condemned the international community for failing to stop the Ethiopian attack, which is widely perceived to have U.S. support, and he said the war had "entered a new phase."

As the fighting continued, members of the U.N. Security Council called an emergency meeting in New York to discuss the conflict and consider a joint statement put forward by Qatar.

Ambassadors from the 15 countries on the council were briefed first by Secretary General Kofi Annan's special representative for Somalia, Francois Lonseny Fall, and then began debating the text of a statement calling for the withdrawal of Ethiopian forces from Somalia.

But U.S. diplomats said they would seek changes to the draft.

"We don't want to single out Ethiopia in that way and believe they have legitimate security concerns," a U.S diplomat said. "Our position is that we need all parties to return to dialogue."

The diplomat, who agreed to discuss aspects of the U.S. position in exchange for anonymity, said the United States would also push for a condemnation of the Islamic Courts' use of child soldiers in the conflict.

It was unclear whether the Security Council would be able to reach consensus on the statement before Wednesday. Meanwhile, a Somali envoy to Ethiopia said Ethiopian troops could take over Mogadishu in 24 to 48 hours.

DOJ_NMG_0109405

State Department spokesman Gonzo Gallegos reiterated the U.S. position that Ethiopia "has genuine security concerns with regard to developments within Somalia and has provided support at the request of the legitimate governing authority."

President Bush spoke to Ugandan President Yoweri Museveni by telephone about the tension in the region, a White House spokesman said.

This month, faint hopes for a peaceful resolution to the conflict were pinned on a U.S.-sponsored U.N. resolution authorizing deployment of an African Union force, excluding Ethiopia and other neighboring states, to protect Somalia's interim government, which is in quasi-exile in the town of Baidoa, about 70 miles from Mogadishu.

The theory was that the force would remove Ethiopia from the volatile equation. But only Uganda has tentatively agreed to send troops to the African Union force, a commitment more recently in serious doubt. African Union officials have said any deployment could take months. And the Courts movement has said deployment of any such force would be considered an invasion.

Given those circumstances, some diplomats in the region have advanced a logic opposite that of the African Union deployment: to push for the complete withdrawal of all foreign forces.

A U.N. report this year found that at least 10 countries were in some way involved in the conflict in Somalia, a sign of the country's strategic importance in the region. And Monday, witnesses said fighters from Eritrea, a bitter foe of Ethiopia, as well as from Pakistan were among those fighting alongside the Islamic militias.

For his part, Meles has described his own military intervention as self-defense.

Ethiopia and the United States have accused the Courts movement of harboring terrorists, a charge the organization has denied. Opposition groups in Ethiopia have said Meles, who supplies intelligence to the United States on Somalia, has exaggerated the terrorism claim to win U.S. support as his increasingly authoritarian government stands accused of human rights violations.

The United States and Ethiopia have been of one mind that a complete takeover of Somalia by the Islamic Courts is unacceptable, because of fears that the country could become a base for Muslim extremists.

Yet U.S. policy in Somalia has been widely criticized for having the opposite of its intended effect, often encouraging the expansion of the Courts movement.

This year, the United States supported warlords who called themselves an "anti-terrorism" coalition. The warlords generally bribed and terrorized ordinary Somalis, who came to despise them. The Islamic Courts came to power as an alternative to the hated warlords, establishing order based on Islamic law village by village and earning widespread support from beleaguered Somalis tired of 15 years of near-anarchy.

More recently, perceived U.S. support for Ethiopia, and the U.S. sponsorship of the U.N. resolution calling for the African Union deployment, appears to have been used by the Courts movement to rally support.

Islamists Retreat In Somalia (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya, Dec. 26 — The Islamist forces once in control of much of Somalia are crumbling faster than anyone expected and beat a hasty retreat back to their stronghold in Mogadishu, Somalia's battle-scarred capital, on Tuesday.

By dawn, Buurhakaba, a large inland town, had fallen to the Islamists' rivals, along with nearby Dinsoor and Bulo Burti, where just a few weeks ago the clerics in charge were threatening to behead people who did not pray five times a day.

The Islamist fighters, who had seemed invincible after taking Mogadishu from the city's warlords in June, now seem powerless to stop the steady advance of the internationally recognized transitional government and the Ethiopian forces that are backing it.

By nightfall, the transitional government's troops were 50 miles from Mogadishu, calling for the Islamists to surrender. The Islamist leaders refused, saying they would take their fight "everywhere," possibly a threat to unleash guerrilla tactics and suicide bombers, which they have already used.

The fast-moving developments seemed to confirm what United Nations officials and witnesses in Somalia have been saying since the fighting erupted a week ago: that the teenage troops of the Islamists, however religiously inspired, were no match for the better-trained Ethiopian-backed force, with its tanks and fighter jets.

Ethiopia's prime minister, Meles Zenawi, said Tuesday that his soldiers and their Somali allies had "broken the back" of the Islamists and killed more than 1,000 fighters, though United Nations officials have put the toll substantially below that.

DOJ_NMG_0109406

But the conflict is hardly over. Thousands of people continue to march through the streets of Mogadishu, rallying for the Islamists, and analysts are unanimous that an Ethiopian occupation of Mogadishu, a city thick with weapons and xenophobia, could become a bloodbath.

In Baidoa, the seat of the transitional government, leaders said they were planning to take the capital, where they had been afraid to work until now.

"It's just a matter of time," said Hussein Saylan, chief of the transitional cabinet, from a command center where radios crackled in the background. "We're moving swiftly toward Mogadishu, and the Islamists are panicking. We're finishing them off as we go."

Witnesses said Ethiopian fighter jets and helicopter gunships fired missiles at the retreating Islamists in pickup trucks — easy targets in the open desert.

In Mogadishu, the Islamists began fortifying the airport, radio station and other important buildings, preparing for a siege. Shopkeepers emptied their stores. Some families fled their homes and drove off with tents and water jugs in the back of their cars.

Western intelligence officials said soldiers from Eritrea were furiously distributing antiaircraft missiles to the Islamists, and residents in Mogadishu said they had already heard them being test fired. According to United Nations officials, thousands of fighters from Eritrea, Yemen, Syria and Libya have streamed into Somalia to wage a holy war against Ethiopia, a country with a long Christian history that today is about half Muslim.

Ethiopia and Eritrea are bitter enemies, having recently fought a costly border war that is still unresolved.

On Tuesday, Mr. Meles said, "The only forces we are pursuing are Eritreans who are hiding behind the skirts of Somali women."

Though diplomats in Africa have expressed concerns about the conflict in Somalia exploding into a wider regional war, most have been noticeably silent about Ethiopia's aggressive tactics. Ethiopian officials have said they sided with the transitional government because Somalia's Islamist movement was a regional menace.

Patrick Mazimhaka, a high-ranking African Union official, told the BBC that Ethiopia was within its rights to strike.

"It is up to every country to judge the measure of the threat to its own sovereignty," he said.

American officials have given Ethiopia, one its closest allies in Africa, their tacit approval to do what is necessary to neutralize the Islamists, whom American intelligence agents have accused of sheltering terrorists with Al Qaeda. But American officials have asked Ethiopia to avoid strikes that could kill large numbers of civilians, and so far Ethiopia seems to be cooperating.

On Tuesday, analysts in Nairobi said American surveillance planes were funneling battlefield intelligence to Ethiopian forces.

Maj. Kelley Thibodeau, spokeswoman for the task force of American military personnel based in nearby Djibouti, said she was "not at liberty to discuss" the matter.

Though there are more than 100 American soldiers training Ethiopian troops, Major Thibodeau said: "Officially, we haven't put anybody in Somalia. The Americans don't go forward with the Ethiopians. They are training Ethiopians in Ethiopia."

As the Ethiopian-backed forces continued their rout, it seemed that the Islamists might have overplayed their hand. Just a few months ago, the Islamists were the most powerful force in Somalia and popular in many areas for restoring order after 15 years of anarchy. The transitional government, an assortment of clan elders and former warlords, had been marooned in Baidoa, too weak to extend its authority beyond the city limits. Instead, it had been urging the Islamists to return to peace talks to discuss sharing power.

But all that changed last Wednesday at dawn, when the Islamists attacked Baidoa from two directions. Witnesses said waves of young fighters were summarily mowed down by the more experienced Ethiopian-backed troops. Then on Saturday, the Islamists announced that Somalia was open to Muslim fighters across the world who wanted to wage a jihad against Ethiopia.

The next day, Ethiopia struck, its military pushing deep into Somalia to begin wiping out the Islamist forces.

"Our entire defense system was instantly overrun," said Ibrahim Diris, a medic for the Islamist forces who narrowly escaped capture in Buurhakaba. "They attacked us with tanks, planes, helicopters and infantry. Thank God they spared the ambulances."

The question now is whether Ethiopian forces will try to seize Mogadishu.

At the United Nations on Tuesday, the special envoy for Somalia, François Lonseny Fall, urged the Security Council to call for a cease-fire, saying that although the interim government's forces were advancing toward Mogadishu, they were "still facing stiff resistance" in several areas. Speaking at an emergency session, he said he feared that continuing violence could have "serious consequences" for the entire region.

Ethiopia's deputy foreign minister, Tekeda Alemu, said taking Mogadishu was not part of the plan.

"We are a poor country and we know that what we can accomplish is limited," he said. "We don't want to go into Mogadishu. We want the two sides to talk."

But neither side seemed ready to negotiate. "The war is entering a new phase," said Sheik Sharif Ahmed, a top Islamist leader. "We will fight Ethiopia for a long, long time and we expect the war to go everywhere."

The toll is piling up. At Benadir hospital in Mogadishu, a crowd of women pushed at the gates to see wounded sons and husbands. Some women threw stones at the Islamist commanders and shouted, "Fight your own holy war!"

What's Going On In Somalia? (WSJ)

By Jonathan Stevenson

The Wall Street Journal, December 27, 2006

Though 98% Muslim and long without a functioning government, southern Somalia has not, so far, ripened into the fully fledged terrorist threat that many have feared it would. This week, however, as Ethiopia engaged Islamist Somali militiamen, Somalia became the site of a nascent regional war. The primary combatants are Somalia's secular Transitional Federal Government (TFG), which is internationally recognized and politically supported by the U.S., and the Islamist "Islamic Courts Union" that holds sway on the ground. They are backed militarily by two fierce rivals, Ethiopia and Eritrea, respectively. The military balance appears indeterminate. Ethiopia has deployed 15-20,000 troops in Somalia. Eritrea has provided arms to the Islamic Courts militias and sent only about 2,000 troops to support them; but the Islamic Courts hold more territory than the TFG and have greater indigenous assets and popular support. Even if Somalia does not become a terrorist redoubt, it could become a potent fount of regional geopolitical instability and perhaps the next "field of jihad" unless diplomatic attention is rallied to rescue the situation. * * *

Ethiopia has a politically dominant Christian tradition and is vigorously opposed to Islamism. Al-Ittihad al-Islamiah, a Somali Islamist group aligned with the Islamic Courts, has sought to force the secession of Ethiopia's heavily ethnic Somali Ogaden region, and Ethiopian troops were responsible for eliminating several terrorist training camps run by al-Ittihad in the late 1990s. Although about half Muslim and half Christian, Eritrea's support for the Islamic Courts rests on its strategic enmity toward Ethiopia. The Islamic Courts are also politically and financially backed by several Muslim states, including Egypt, Djibouti, Iran, Saudi Arabia, Yemen, Libya and Sudan. Ethiopia's preventive intervention against the Islamic Courts -- tacitly approved by the U.S. -- prompted them to declare jihad against Ethiopia in November. Meanwhile, on Dec. 7 the U.N. Security Council unanimously adopted U.S.-sponsored Resolution 1725, authorizing the deployment of an African force in Somalia to protect the TFG and partially lifting a weapons embargo to Somali factions, which stands to strengthen the TFG and secular militias. The resolution spurred the Islamic Courts to declare jihad against any U.N.-sanctioned force, and the Eritrean government branded it "an attack on the Somali people." Foreign jihadists are reported to be infiltrating Somali territory already.

The volatile situation in Somalia presents the West with a thorny and immediate problem. To quell geopolitical tensions created by Ethiopia and Eritrea's intervention, a U.N.-sanctioned force would have to be led by a major power. Yet even if such a power could afford the troops and materiel, the insertion of a significant number of Western-led foreign troops would run the risk of attracting (as in Iraq) still more foreign jihadists to Somalia and inspiring terrorist attacks worldwide.

The U.N. and the African Union (AU) support the TFG, and the former has authorized peacekeeping troops. In hopes of minimizing regional tensions, the Security Council resolution bars the participation of neighboring nations Kenya and Djibouti as well as Ethiopia in any peacekeeping contingent, and limits the notional outside force to physically protecting the TFG in and near Baidoa, and to training TFG security forces. But there is little manpower available for any serious effort. The resolution also does not deal with foreign forces already in Somalia. While the resolution is nobly intended to promote political negotiations between the TFG and the Islamic Courts Union, coupled with Ethiopia's substantial military commitment to the TFG it may have had the effect of providing the TFG with enough political cover to defer dialogue. Furthermore, only Uganda has offered troops, and has done so ambivalently and against domestic public opinion. In any case, though trained by the French and the British, Ugandan troops would probably be both numerically and professionally inadequate.

Although Washington would probably provide logistical support and some funding for a Uganda-led force, it has essentially charged Uganda and the Intergovernmental Authority on Development (IGAD) -- most of whose members (Djibouti, Eritrea, Sudan and, less rigidly, Kenya) oppose intervention -- with executing Resolution 1725. Accordingly, the military mission, in any case of dubious political value, is unlikely to gather momentum. Meanwhile, rough military parity allows the two Somali factions to procrastinate diplomatically.

While at times disingenuously denying that it has deployed troops in Somalia, Ethiopia has indicated that any troops are intended as a deterrent and that it is not eager to engage in a long war. The Islamic Courts, for their part, have demonstrated a degree of caution. Fatalities still probably number only dozens rather than hundreds. Thus far, the major powers have tacitly allowed Ethiopia and Eritrea to keep assets deployed in Somalia while pressuring both to refrain from escalating to all-out war.

But these weak constraints cannot produce operational equilibrium between the TFG and the Islamic Courts Union for long enough to allow effective major-power attention to gravitate to Somalia before war arises.

Absent an unattainably strong peace-enforcement contingent, the only solution would appear to be robust diplomacy aimed at stabilizing the Somali situation by a power-sharing arrangement between the TFG and the Islamic Courts. Both the U.N. and the AU, as well as the U.S. and key European capitals, however, have their hands full with even more pressing regional matters, such as Darfur. Indeed, all save the AU are overstretched by Iraq, Afghanistan and the campaign against Islamist terrorism. They cannot be expected to devote serious diplomatic attention to Somalia in the short term. While Yemen and the Arab League have made attempts to facilitate dialogue, they are not likely to have the influence to close a sustainable deal.

The EU, however, has shown appreciation for the gravity of the crisis. On Dec. 8, EU development minister Louis Michel held separate talks with the TFG and the Islamic Courts in hopes of lowering tensions, albeit to no clear avail. Kenya, the most effective broker in the region on Somali issues, has sponsored the TFG. But Nairobi -- constrained by a rising cross-border threat from the Islamic Courts and political pressures from its own substantial ethnic Somali population -- has defaulted to a position of "neutrality." Since open conflict could send hundreds of thousands of refugees over its border, however, Nairobi may abandon timidity and push for negotiations. Religious leaders in Kenya have urged as much. With the EU's diplomatic sponsorship and residual U.S. support, such an effort might enforce a pause and bring the four principals -- the TFG, the Islamic Courts, Ethiopia and Eritrea -- to the table. Otherwise, only further escalation is likely to bring decisive major-power attention to the Horn of Africa.

War In Somalia (WP)

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

IN THE PAST week a dangerous round of warfare has erupted in Somalia, a failed state in the Horn of Africa that the United States tried in vain to rebuild in the early 1990s. Troops from neighboring Ethiopia who were defending a U.N.-backed transitional government were attacked by forces of the Islamic Courts movement, which for the past six months has controlled much of the southern part of the country. Ethiopia responded by launching a full-scale offensive against the Islamists; by yesterday its forces had captured several towns and were said to be advancing toward Mogadishu, the capital.

For the Bush administration there was both good and bad news in these developments. The Islamic Courts movement poses a potentially serious security threat to the United States: Its leadership includes a U.S.-designated terrorist, and it is known to be harboring al-Qaeda militants, including several who helped carry out the 1998 bombings of U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania. In recent months it has been inviting radical Muslims to Somalia, and thousands have reportedly arrived from such countries as Syria, Yemen and Libya. In short, the Courts-controlled portion of Somalia has begun to look a lot like Afghanistan under the Taliban before Sept. 11, 2001.

Ethiopia's actions, however, are problematic. The country's autocratic government and a slight majority of its population are Christian; this has fueled resistance to its intervention from Somalis and Muslim governments that might not otherwise support the fundamentalist Courts. According to U.S. and U.N. reports, millions of dollars in funding and arms have flowed to the Islamists from Saudi Arabia, Egypt and other Arab states, while neighboring Eritrea, a bitter adversary of Ethiopia, has deployed its own troops. Some experts warn that the fighting could morph into a regional war; others say Ethiopia could get bogged down in a prolonged guerrilla war with local and foreign Muslim insurgents.

Having floundered through a series of failed Somalia strategies, the administration appears to have a somewhat confused view of the latest fighting. Earlier this month it pushed for a U.N. Security Council resolution that called for an end to foreign intervention, the deployment of a peacekeeping force and negotiations between the rival Somali governments. President Bush spoke yesterday with the president of Uganda, which had offered peacekeepers. Yet even while reiterating its call for negotiations, the administration also appears to be supporting the Ethiopian offensive: The State Department said that Ethiopia had a right to defend itself against the Islamists and that its troops were there at the invitation of a legitimate authority, the transitional government.

Maybe the Ethiopian forces will crush the Islamists and their al-Qaeda allies and thereby rescue the United States from its predicament. More likely, the administration will have to prepare for much more active U.S. engagement in what is emerging as a hot new front in the war on terrorism.

Iran's Parliament Votes To Revise Ties With The U.N. Nuclear Agency (USAT/AP)

USA Today, December 27, 2006

TEHRAN, Iran (AP) — Iran's parliament voted Wednesday to urge the government to "revise" ties with the U.N. nuclear agency in a move seen as likely to reduce the country's cooperation with the international atomic authority.

DOJ_NMG_0109409

The vote came four days after the U.N. Security Council decided to impose limited sanctions on Iran for its refusal to cease enrichment of uranium — a process that produces the material for either nuclear reactors or bombs.

Members of Iran's ruling hierarchy had repeatedly urged the government to cut ties with the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N.'s nuclear watchdog, if the Security Council imposes sanctions.

Wednesday's vote in parliament stopped short of recommending a severance of relations with the IAEA, but it put the Vienna-based agency on notice that business would not be as usual.

The bill said that the government was "obliged to accelerate the country's peaceful nuclear program and revise in its cooperation with the International Atomic Energy Agency based on national interests."

In a session broadcast live on state radio, parliamentary speaker Gholam Ali Haddad Adel said: "Some 161 out of 203 present legislators voted in favor of the bill."

Fifteen legislators voted against the bill, and another 15 abstained.

The government supported the bill. "This is a very helpful proposal," Deputy Foreign Minister Hamid Reza Asefi told the assembly. "I ask legislators to vote for it."

The Guardian Council, a constitutional watchdog controlled by hard-line clerics, approved the bill very quickly — showing how seriously the ruling hierarchy regarded the move.

"I was informed that the Guardian Council also approved the bill, minutes after the parliament," said deputy speaker Mohammad Reza Bahnoar.

Before the vote, speaker Haddad Adel said the bill would not bind the government to a particular course of action.

"The bill gives a free hand to the government to decide on a range of reactions — from leaving the Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty to remaining in the International Atomic Energy Agency and negotiating. We trust the government," Haddad Adel said.

Some legislators pushed for a bill that took a more aggressive line against the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency, which they accused of being dominated by the United States.

"The draft is not appropriate to the United States' animosity to Iran," said legislator Hassan Kamran. "This is a weak draft. It should be stronger."

But other legislators said the bill should be thrown out.

"There is no need for the bill. We should lessen tensions," said legislator Noureddin Pirmoazzen.

The bill will take effect 15 days after it is signed by President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who has ardently championed the nuclear program.

The United States and some allies accuse Iran of using a civilian nuclear program as a cover for developing a nuclear bomb. Iran denies this, saying its program is strictly for generating electricity from nuclear fuel.

Iran Parliament Debates Reply To U.N. Penalties (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

TEHRAN, Dec. 26 — Parliament began debate on Tuesday on how to respond to sanctions imposed by a United Nations Security Council resolution on Saturday, but two high-level officials said they doubted that Iran would bar nuclear inspectors and drop out of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

Before the Security Council vote, hard-line politicians and conservative newspapers in Iran had called for taking those strong actions.

Kazem Jalali, an influential member of Parliament and its foreign policy committee, said it did not appear to be the right time to bar United Nations' inspectors or withdraw from the treaty, although he reserved Iran's right to do so later.

Muhammad Saeedi, the deputy leader of the country's Atomic Energy Organization, doubted a majority in Parliament wanted to pull out.

"They are upset about the resolution, but Parliament will make a reasonable decision," he said.

The Security Council resolution is meant to curb Iran's nuclear program and bans the import and export of materials and technology used in uranium enrichment, reprocessing and ballistic missiles. The resolution, weaker than what the United States proposed, has been debated in the United Nations since Iran ignored Council calls to suspend nuclear activities by Aug. 31.

Iran says its nuclear program is allowed under the treaty and is intended for domestic energy production. The United States and others contend that the program is a cover for a plan to produce nuclear bombs.

The discussions in Parliament were at an early stage on Tuesday, and no consensus was reached about what action should be taken, if any.

Newspapers here have been prohibited from criticizing Iran's nuclear policy, and none have done so.

DOJ_NMG_0109410

But this week, several moderate newspapers indicated in editorials that the sanctions might have a greater economic effect than the government had acknowledged. Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, has vowed that the sanctions will not prevent the country from proceeding with its nuclear program.

An editorial on Tuesday in the daily, Aftab-e-Yazd, said an "unreasonable and emotional" reaction to the sanctions could be very dangerous.

Iran 'revises' Co-operation With IAEA (FT)

By Najmeh Bozorgmehr

Financial Times, December 27, 2006

Iran's parliament on Tuesday considered a plan to "revise" the country's co-operation with the International Atomic Energy Agency in response a vote by the UN Security Council to impose sanctions on Iran's trade in sensitive nuclear materials and technology.

Saturday's UN vote, aimed at dissuading Iran from carrying out uranium enrichment activities that could produce material to be used in a nuclear weapon, was dismissed by President Ahmadi-Nejad on Sunday as "illegal" and "superficial".

Manouchehr Mottaki, Iran's foreign minister, who attended a closed parliamentary session on Tuesday to discuss Iran's response, told reporters that the government fully endorsed parliament's plan, although it was not clear whether the move would be anything other than symbolic.

Iran's policy seems to be neither to accept the UN demand, nor make any immediate threats to withdraw from the Non-Proliferation Treaty or to deliberately upset the oil market.

"MPs reiterated that we should not take any provocative step," Ali Asgari, an MP told reporters after the meeting. "But we should have some surprising moves."

He may have been referring to a statement by Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear official immediately after the UN vote, who said Iran would go ahead with installing 3,000 centrifuges in its pilot plant of Natanz. Mr Mottaki said the centrifuges would start enrichment "soon".

Experts believe that 2,000 centrifuges can produce sufficient highly-enriched uranium for a reactor or a bomb. Iran denies any military purposes for its nuclear programme, which it says it is merely for civilian purposes.

Analysts say Iran's president believes sanctions will not hurt Iran and that the country should not show any sign of retreat. However, the country's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, who is thought to be the key decision maker, has not yet reacted to the UN resolution.

Iran To Hasten Nuclear Work Despite U.N. Vote (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 26, 2006

Iran condemned a U.N. sanctions resolution as "a piece of torn paper" that wouldn't scare Tehran and vowed over the weekend to speed up uranium-enrichment work.

The U.N. Security Council voted unanimously Saturday to impose sanctions on Iran's trade in sensitive nuclear materials and technology, in an attempt to stop uranium-enrichment work that could produce material to be used in bombs. Iranian analysts said it could chase away foreign investment needed to create jobs.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said the U.N. resolution -- drawn up by Britain, France and Germany and supported unanimously by the Security Council -- could change Iran's relationship with the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N.'s nuclear watchdog. Iran has already banned IAEA snap inspections of its nuclear plants in February as a response to the referral of its nuclear case to the Security Council.

Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, said the resolution made his country more "decisive in realizing our nuclear aims." He said it would step up enrichment activities. "From Sunday morning, we will begin activities at Natanz" the site of 3,000 centrifuge machines, Iran's Kayhan newspaper quoted Mr. Larijani as saying. It was unclear whether the work began Sunday.

China urged a resumption of talks to defuse the confrontation, and French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy said on France Inter radio, "I would not want to see Iran fall into a spiral that would be an isolationist spiral."

Iran, which has said it is making uranium for civilian-power purposes, has refused to end its nascent uranium-enrichment work in exchange for economic incentives. The resolution demands Iran end all research on uranium enrichment, which can produce fuel for nuclear power plants as well as for bombs, and halt all research and development on methods of producing or delivering atomic weapons.

The sanctions ban imports and exports of dangerous materials and technology relating to uranium enrichment, reprocessing and heavy-water reactors, as well as ballistic-missile-delivery systems. A ban on Iran's oil exports wasn't considered.

DOJ_NMG_0109411

Russia was successful in scrapping a mandatory travel ban. Instead, the resolution calls on states to notify a Security Council sanctions committee if any of the individuals on the list are in their countries. Russia, which is building an $800-million light-water reactor for Tehran that is exempt from the resolution, has tried to maintain close ties with Iran but is also concerned about any bomb-making intentions Iran may have.

The resolution brought is under a section of the U.N. Charter that makes enforcement mandatory but restricts action to nonmilitary measures. It includes a freeze on financial assets abroad of 12 individuals and 10 organizations from Iran associated with nuclear programs to prevent them from buying dangerous materials. There are numerous qualifications, including exempting contracts made prior to the adoption of the resolution.

Iran Summons UK Ambassador Over Blair Remarks (AFP)

AFP, December 27, 2006

Iran summoned Britain's ambassador in Tehran to its foreign ministry to hear its "strong objections" to British Prime Minister Tony Blair's claim that the Islamic republic poses a threat to the region.

The official IRNA agency said Geoffrey Adams was told by Ibrahim Rahimpour, the foreign ministry's director general for western European affairs, that Iran expects Britain "to stop the tirade of allegations" against it.

"Tony Blair has brought up baseless charges against Iran to cover up his failure in Iraq, Afghanistan and the Middle East, but to no avail," Rahimpour was quoted as telling the ambassador.

Rahimpour also criticised Britain for misrepresenting Iran's civilian nuclear program, after it co-sponsored a UN Security Council resolution last Saturday that imposed sanctions on Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programmes.

"The resolution will not have any impact on the national resolve to produce nuclear energy in line with Non-Proliferation Treaty," he said.

In a speech in Dubai on December 20 during a Middle East tour, Blair accused Iran of being an obstacle to peace and urged moderate countries in the region to form an alliance to oppose Tehran's support for extremism.

"We must recognise the strategic challenge the government of Iran poses, not its people, not possibly all of its ruling elements but those presently in charge of its policy," Blair said.

IRNA reported that Rahimpour recalled to Adams "the well-known strategy of the British colonial 'divide and rule' (policy), and said that Blair resorted to anti-Iran propaganda during his Middle East tour".

On Israel, Rahimpour was quoted as saying that "the occupying regime is passing through critical condition and Blair could do nothing to change the situation in Israel".

"Palestinian and Lebanese people are defending their own rights to the dismay of the occupying regime," Rahimpour said.

IRNA quoted Adams, who has been London's ambassador to Tehran since April 1 this year, saying that he could not interpret Blair's statement, but that he would pass along Iran's protest to his government.

Regarding the "anti-Iran resolution" adopted unanimously by the Security Council, Adams said that Britain was not the only state to vote for it.

Iran Irresolution (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 27, 2006

Among the least surprising news coming out of the holiday weekend is that Iran denounced even the U.N. Security Council's tepid sanctions resolution against its nuclear weapons program. More surprising -- and encouraging -- is that the U.S. State Department also seems unenthusiastic.

"From Sunday morning we will begin activities at Natanz," said Ali Larjani, Iraq's top nuclear negotiator about the site of its 3,000 centrifuge machines for enriching uranium. "And we will drive it with full speed. It will be our immediate response to the resolution."

And why should Iran react with any greater concern, since the language of the U.N. resolution was at most a wrist slap at Tehran for years of violating its promises under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty? Four months after Iran rejected the U.N.'s August 31 deadline for ending its nuclear enrichment plans, the most the Security Council could unite behind was a narrow freeze on the assets of 10 companies and 12 individuals related to the program.

The resolution's order that countries stop supplying material for Iran's nuclear effort carves out a huge loophole for Bushehr, the Russian-supplied light-water reactor. Even a proposed international travel ban on Iranian officials was dropped in the end at Russian insistence. As John McEnroe might describe this resolution: "You cannot be serious!"

The charade was even more than the State Department could bear to endorse wholeheartedly. Nicholas Burns, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's right-hand man, praised the resolution for isolating Iran but added that "We don't think this resolution is enough in itself." And he suggested that the U.S. would now work to form coalitions outside of the U.N. to add pressure on Tehran. It's about time.

The aftermath of the resolution coincided with reports that coalition troops had captured Iranians helping insurgents in Iraq. This ought to underscore to Americans just how much Iran's leaders are trying to damage U.S. interests in the Middle East. These are the same Iranians with whom Jim Baker and Lee Hamilton and most of the U.S. foreign policy establishment want to negotiate; perhaps if the U.S. allows them to become a nuclear power, Iranian leaders will then agree to help kill fewer GIs.

As his Presidency grows shorter, Mr. Bush is going to have to decide how much longer he can afford to let diplomacy dominate his Iran strategy. The mullahs in Tehran have made clear their determination to build a nuclear weapon; the West has yet to show any comparable determination to stop them.

Assad Inspires 'Flip' Theories (WT)

By Iason Athanasiadis

The Washington Times, December 27, 2006

TEHRAN -- Recent visits by Syrian President Bashar Assad to U.S.-allied Yemen and the United Arab Emirates are prompting speculation that Syria is seeking to leave the Iranian orbit and pursue closer ties with the West.

Such a move would fulfill a major recommendation of the Iraq Study Group, headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton, which suggested it might be possible through diplomacy to pry Syria away from Iran.

"Bashar was recently invited to Tehran by [President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad as part of the Iranian effort to demonstrate regional leadership -- but he failed to show up, without even offering a public excuse," said Gary Sick, a U.S. foreign policy analyst who served on the National Security Council under Presidents Ford, Carter and Reagan.

"If you put this together with the 'Obaid initiative' to mobilize Arab action to stop Iran's encroachment in Iraq, it almost has the appearance of a regionally coordinated campaign."

Nawaf Obaid was fired this month as a Saudi foreign policy adviser after publishing an article saying, among other things, that Saudi Arabia could reduce Iran's regional prominence by raising oil production high enough to slash the price by half. Oil revenues are a crucial source of foreign currency for Iran.

Mr. Assad's talks in Yemen 11 days ago reportedly dealt with regional issues, including the infighting in the Palestinian territories, instability in Lebanon, Iran's nuclear program, Iraq and Somalia.

But eyebrows were raised by the timing of the trip, which came just two days after a visit to Yemen by U.S. Assistant Secretary for Near Eastern Affairs David Welch.

"I'll leave it to President [Ali Abdullah] Saleh to convey their views to President Assad," Mr. Welch said of the timing. "They know the views of the United States."

In another apparent overture yesterday, Mr. Assad told visiting Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, that he was willing to host a conference where all the factions of Iraq could seek a consensus on the country's future.

Graham Fuller, former vice chairman of the U.S. National Intelligence Council, expressed skepticism that Mr. Assad's travels represented some kind of back-channel negotiation with Washington.

He said he considered it "much more likely that Gulf leaders are wooing Assad as an intermediary to Iran to transmit their concerns and hopefully to achieve greater Iranian moderation."

Iranian analysts also doubt that Mr. Assad will give up his role as the western anchor of an anti-U.S. axis running from Tehran through Iraq and Syria to Hezbollah-controlled southern Lebanon.

"It would be rather unrealistic to consider that Syria, a poor and isolated country, would distance itself from Iran, a rich and effective actor, which can offer Syria security and financial help in an unfortunate situation," said Kayhan Barzegar, a professor of foreign affairs at Tehran's Islamic Azad University.

"The two have strategic interests to stay together right now."

Hasan Akhtari, Iran's ambassador to Damascus, acknowledged to the London-based pan-Arab newspaper Al-Hayat that "some people" think Syrian-Iranian relations are deteriorating. But, he said, "We aren't worried ... because we know that this isn't happening and will not happen."

Nevertheless, Syria has faced immense pressure since the assassination two years ago of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, for which it has been widely blamed. Lacking a strong army and without substantial oil reserves, it is the weak link -- and the only Sunni member -- in the Iranian Shi'ite-led alliance.

The report of the Iraq Study Group urged the United States to try to "flip" Syria, disrupting the uninterrupted land bridge from Tehran to the Mediterranean and cutting off the arms supply chain to Hezbollah.

"If that's what's going on, the UAE visit after the snub of Iran may be early signs of success," Mr. Sick said.

DOJ_NMG_0109413

Any successful effort to woo Mr. Assad away from Iran would likely involve a deal with Israel for the return to Syria of the Golan Heights, which Israel captured in 1967.

Syria's political class is almost unanimous in the belief that now is the time to negotiate such a deal, while Israel is on the defensive over failing to crush Syrian ally Hezbollah during its August offensive in southern Lebanon. Mr. Assad has made repeated overtures to Israel seeking peace talks.

Former Iranian Deputy Foreign Minister Mahmoud Vaezi indicated last year that Tehran was less than fully confident of Syria's loyalty, saying Mr. Assad "will receive our diplomatic support. More than that depends on what kind of positions Syria will adopt."

Several analysts, however, cautioned against expecting a quick change of direction from the Syrian president.

"The Assads of Syria are currently being wooed by one and all," said Ammar Abdulhamid, a Syrian dissident and fellow of the Saban Center for Middle East Policy at the Brookings Institution. "But soon everybody will be wowed by how little they actually have to offer and by how bent they are on overplaying their hand."

'Syria Is Ready And Willing To Engage' (USAT)

USA Today, December 27, 2006

Imad Moustapha, Ph.D., Ambassador of the Syrian, Arab Republic to the USA - Washington

It is always refreshing to hear moderate, wise voices from the United States calling for what diplomacy is really about: dialogue and engagement ("A two-way street with Syria," The Forum, Dec. 20).

Syria has repeatedly called upon this administration to abandon its policies toward Syria and work together toward a more constructive policy in the Middle East. Former secretaries of State Colin Powell, Madeleine Albright and James Baker — who, unlike Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, had a direct working relationship with Syria — consider their engagement with Syria as one that served U.S. national interests.

Syria is ready and willing to engage, but this needs courage and vision from the other side.

Israel Settlement Breaks Promise To U.S. (AP)

By Ravi Nessman

AP, December 27, 2006

Israel has approved a new settlement in the West Bank to house former Jewish settlers from the Gaza Strip, officials said Tuesday, breaking a promise to the U.S. to halt home construction in the Palestinian territories.

Construction in the northern West Bank town of Maskiot began months ago, but the project only received final approval from the Defense Ministry last week, said Dubi Tal, head of the Jordan Valley regional council.

Saeb Erekat, an aide to Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, condemned the construction and urged the government to revoke its authorization, saying it violated the spirit of cooperation inaugurated by a meeting Saturday between Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

"What message are they trying to send?" Erekat asked.

The settlement will house 23 families who were evacuated when Israel withdrew from the Gaza Strip last year, and will eventually house 100 families, Tal said. "I estimate that within two or three weeks the foundations for temporary housing will begin," he said.

Olmert has signaled in recent weeks that he is ready to make broad territorial concessions to the Palestinians under a final peace settlement, but he has also said he wants Israel to retain large settlement blocs. The Palestinians claim all of the West Bank, captured by Israel in the 1967 Middle East war, as part of a future independent state.

Under the stalled, U.S.-backed "road map" peace plan, Israel pledged to freeze all settlement expansion, while the Palestinians promised to crack down on militants. Neither side has followed through.

DOJ_NMG_0109414

"The U.S. view on settlements remains unchanged," said Geoff Anisman, a spokesman for the U.S. Embassy in Tel Aviv. "The U.S. continues to urge both sides to meet their road map obligations and to avoid taking steps that could be viewed as predetermining the outcome of final status negotiations."

Saturday's Olmert-Abbas summit sought to build on momentum from an Israeli cease-fire with the Palestinians in the Gaza Strip, which took effect last month. Olmert made a series of gestures to the moderate Palestinian leader, offering to lift some West Bank checkpoints and unfreeze hundreds of millions of dollars in withheld tax funds.

On Sunday, Olmert indicated he might release some Palestinian prisoners in the coming days, softening his long-standing opposition to such a move.

Despite the truce, Gaza militants launched seven rockets into Israel on Tuesday, hitting a street in the town of Sderot and seriously wounding two 13-year-old boys, Israeli officials said. The Islamic Jihad militant group claimed responsibility for all the attacks.

Militants have launched about 60 rockets since the truce was declared, and Israeli officials have warned their patience is waning.

"Israel has been displaying restraint, but this restraint will not continue indefinitely while Israelis continue to be attacked," said David Baker, an official in Olmert's office.

Security officials said Defense Minister Amir Peretz urged Olmert late Tuesday to reconsider his policy of restraint in the face of the rocket barrages.

Meanwhile, Israeli troops shot and seriously injured a Palestinian near the fence separating Israel and the Gaza Strip. Palestinian officials said the man was a farmer working near the fence. The army said two Palestinians were attempting to sabotage part of the fence and ignored warning shots before troops opened fire, hitting one in the legs.

In an effort to push forward with peace efforts, Olmert and Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, a key mediator between Israel and the Palestinians, will meet next week in the Red Sea resort of Sharm el-Sheik, an Israeli government official said.

The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the meeting had not been officially announced, did not say what day it would take place.

Egypt has played a major role in mediating between Israel and the Palestinians, and has been trying to negotiate the release of an Israeli soldier captured by militants linked to Hamas, the militant group that controls the Palestinian parliament and Cabinet and is a rival to Abbas' Fatah.

The rivalry between the two Palestinian groups has broken out into open street battles in Gaza in recent weeks.

Jordanian leaders have invited both Abbas and Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas for talks in Amman in an effort to bridge the divide. Negotiations over forming a national unity government broke down last month, and Abbas has threatened to call early elections.

Jordan's Prime Minister Marouf al-Bakhit told reporters Tuesday that his country "has specific ideas to help the two sides to reach a unity government solution." He did not elaborate or say when the meeting would take place.

Haniyeh said Tuesday that he planned to accept the invitation. "We hope this will be a blessed opening for national unity."

Despite Pledge, Israel Approves New Settlement (WP/AP)

Associated Press

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

JERUSALEM, Dec. 26 -- Israel has approved a new settlement in the West Bank to house former Jewish settlers from the Gaza Strip, officials said Tuesday, breaking a promise to the United States to halt home construction in the Palestinian territories.

Saeb Erekat, an aide to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, condemned the construction and urged the government to revoke its authorization, saying it violated the spirit of cooperation inaugurated by a meeting Saturday between Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

Meanwhile, despite a truce, militants in Gaza launched seven rockets into Israel, hitting a street in the town of Sderot and seriously wounding two 13-year-old boys, Israeli officials said. The radical Islamic Jihad group asserted responsibility for the attacks.

Israel Plans First Settlement In 10 Years (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0109415

JERUSALEM, Dec. 26 — Israel announced plans on Tuesday to construct a Jewish settlement in the occupied West Bank for the first time in 10 years, prompting Palestinian anger and American concern.

The announcement, by the Defense Ministry and settler groups, seemed to run counter to the prevailing effort by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who had offered a series of gestures to the Palestinians several days ago, after meeting with the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas.

Even before that meeting, Mr. Abbas was being criticized by his political rivals, Hamas, who preach Israel's destruction, for carrying out what they called an Israeli and American agenda with little to show for it.

One Israeli official hinted that the new settlement might be part of a deal with Jewish settlers to get their tacit acceptance of the removal of illegal settlement outposts from the West Bank.

Another Israeli official, however, insisted that the settlement was not "new," exactly, but a revival of a settlement approved in 1981, which had become a military training site by the mid-1990s.

The defense minister, Amir Peretz, the dovish leader of the Labor Party, gave his approval to a promise made by his predecessor — Shaul Mofaz, the current transport minister — that houses would be built on the site of an army base in the northern Jordan Valley to resettle some Israelis forced to leave settlements in the Gaza Strip in 2005, according to a Defense Ministry official.

Pressed by Washington to help build up Mr. Abbas, Mr. Olmert promised last week to give him $100 million in Palestinian funds withheld by Israel, about 20 percent of the amount being held, but only for humanitarian purposes.

Abbas aides, however, said the money would be used to strengthen his Fatah movement and pay salaries to Fatah loyalists. Mr. Olmert also promised to dismantle 27 of the 400 or so checkpoints in the West Bank, despite criticism by Israel's West Bank commander.

Additionally complicating matters, Islamic Jihad on Tuesday fired seven more Qassam rockets into Israel from Gaza, including one that seriously wounded two teenagers in the border town of Sderot.

The planned new settlement will be called Maskiot, and approval was given for the construction of some 30 houses. The Israeli official insisted that all construction would be privately financed.

The housing will be used by the 20 families of the hawkish Gaza settlement Shirat Hayam, which resisted evacuation. To get them to leave Gaza peacefully, the army promised to keep them together.

The decision, the official said, "sort of went through and now it's done and would be very hard to undo."

Israel essentially decided to stop the building of settlements in 1992 when Yitzhak Rabin became prime minister, although it has allowed existing settlements to grow, even as it has publicly promised to freeze settlement activity under the so-called road map for peace.

Emily Amrusy, a spokeswoman for the settlers' council known as Yesha, said that the families would move into trailers on the site while construction began on more permanent housing.

A spokeswoman for the American consulate in Jerusalem, which deals with the West Bank, said a new settlement would be troubling. "We're looking into it, and if turns out to be a new settlement, we would be very concerned, given Israel's obligations under the road map," said Micaela Schweitzer-Bluhm, the spokeswoman.

The road map calls for a freeze in settlement building in the first phase and a Palestinian push to dismantle terrorist groups. Israel says that the dismantling should come first and that no such action has taken place. But it has separately promised the Bush administration that it would build only within existing settlement structures to account for natural growth, "thickening" the settlements but not expanding them physically.

Israel also promised that it would dismantle more than 20 illegal outposts set up since March 2001, but it has dismantled only one, under an Israeli court order. Peace Now, a leftwing Israeli lobby that opposes the settlements and follows them closely, says that there have been more than 50 outposts established illegally since March 2001, and that there are more than 100 illegal outposts in the West Bank altogether, many of them, like the semi-settlement of Migron, built on private Palestinian land.

Much of the world considers all Israeli settlements in the West Bank to be illegal under international law; the United States, which used to call them illegal, now calls them "obstacles to peace" that prejudge final-status negotiations. The outposts are illegal under Israeli law because the government has not authorized them.

An aide to Mr. Abbas said the announcement ran counter to understandings Mr. Olmert and Mr. Abbas reached at their meeting Saturday night. "We condemn this act and this decision, especially as it comes after the Israeli side committed itself to stop all unilateral actions," the aide, Saeb Erekat, told Agence France-Presse. "This is certain to destroy the atmosphere created after the meeting with Olmert, where they committed to many issues, especially to stop unilateral actions."

The Palestinians want to establish an independent state in the West Bank, Gaza Strip and East Jerusalem and consider any Israeli building there to be an act of thievery. Israel says that it accepts the idea of a Palestinian state but that the exact contours have to be negotiated.

Yariv Oppenheimer, director of Peace Now, criticized the decision on new construction as contrary to the government's stated aims and programs and noted that it had not been approved by Parliament. "This is a veritable scandal, all the more so that this decision was taken by Amir Peretz," himself a former advocate with Peace Now, Mr. Oppenheimer said. What may begin with 30 houses could easily become more because of "thickening," Peace Now said.

There have also been reports that some settlers have moved temporarily into the ruins of the Homesh settlement in the West Bank, one of four West Bank settlements destroyed along with the Gaza settlements in 2005.

Of the seven Qassam rockets fired into Israel on Tuesday by Islamic Jihad from Gaza, one hit Ashkelon and two reached Sderot, seriously wounding the two teenagers, one critically; both were being treated at a hospital.

The injuries will put more pressure on Mr. Olmert to respond militarily. Since a supposed cease-fire was agreed to on Nov. 26 between the Palestinians and Israel, more than 55 Qassams have been fired from Gaza, about half of which have landed in Israel. The truce did not include the West Bank, but Islamic Jihad says its rocket firing is a response to Israeli military actions there.

On Tuesday, Israel arrested an Islamic Jihad commander, Mahmoud Saadi, 26, in the northern West Bank town of Jenin. Israel also announced the arrest in Ramallah on Nov. 2 of a senior commander of Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades, Muhammad Sayidi, 36, who had been wanted for several years on charges of killing an Israeli in 2000.

Separately, Israeli officials said that Mr. Olmert would travel to Egypt, probably on Jan. 4, to meet the Egyptian president, Hosni Mubarak, and Palestinian officials said that Mr. Abbas and Prime Minister Ismail Haniya of Hamas were expected to meet soon in Jordan for further discussions on how to end their political impasse and the violence between their factions.

Israel's Mixed Messages (NYT)

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

The Israeli prime minister, Ehud Olmert, took some encouraging steps over the weekend to ease the frustrations Palestinians face at West Bank and Gaza checkpoints. He hoped in that way to strengthen Mahmoud Abbas, the embattled moderate who presides over the Palestinian Authority. Unfortunately, Israel's defense minister, Amir Peretz, has undercut these moves by approving the first new West Bank settlement in more than a decade.

Israel's space for peace diplomacy is tightly constrained. It must reckon with a Hamas-led Palestinian cabinet that denies its right to exist and rejects the very notion of a negotiated peace. Yet those facts of Mideast life do not justify authorizing a new settlement. That self-defeating move adds nothing to Israel's security and needlessly complicates the quest for an eventual negotiated peace.

We hope Mr. Olmert or Israel's Parliament can reverse Mr. Peretz's damaging decision, taken in defiance of the international road map for Middle East peace, which Israel's governing coalition has pledged to support.

Meanwhile, Mr. Olmert's positive gestures still deserve recognition, although the hoped-for benefits to Mr. Abbas may now be lost. More than two dozen military checkpoints in the West Bank will be removed and Israel will take steps to ease the passage of goods in and out of the Palestinian-ruled Gaza Strip. These steps should reduce the day-to-day humiliation and economic suffering of hundreds of thousands of ordinary Palestinians.

In addition, Israel will turn over $100 million of the $500 million in Palestinian tax revenue it has withheld since Hamas came to power. This page supports freezing aid to the Hamas government. But tax revenue to which the Palestinians are legally entitled should never have been withheld.

Compared to the sweeping visions of the Oslo peace agreements, or Ariel Sharon's bold Gaza withdrawal, Mr. Olmert's gestures look modest. Yet in today's unpromising circumstances, with Mr. Olmert damaged by the Lebanon war and Mr. Abbas so far unable to nudge Hamas toward moderation, they approach the limits of the possible. Unfortunately, it has become traditional in Israel to balance constructive gestures with sops to the politically potent settlers movement. The settlers' agenda is not supported by a majority of Israelis. But no recent government has felt strong enough to resist their demands. Even when Mr. Sharon faced them down over Gaza, he compensated them with promises to expand existing West Bank settlements. Mr. Peretz has gone one regrettable step further by approving a wholly new settlement whose aim is to relocate settlers uprooted from Gaza last year.

Today, the idea of a comprehensive peace between Israelis and Palestinians seems a distant dream. Yet it represents the best long-term assurance of Israel's survival as a secure Jewish democracy at peace with its Arab neighbors. Every new settlement planted on the West Bank creates a needless obstacle to the realization of that dream.

Mubarak Vows Greater Democracy (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0109417

CAIRO, Dec. 26 -- President Hosni Mubarak said Tuesday that laws to be passed in 2007 would improve democracy and abolish Egypt's 25-year state of emergency, but rights activists said they doubted the long-serving leader would liberalize the country.

Laying out his agenda, Mubarak asked lawmakers to amend 34 articles in the Egyptian constitution to "consecrate the people's sovereignty as a source of power and give parliament more authority to monitor the government."

Hesham Kasem, president of the Egyptian Organization for Human Rights, said that during his 25 years in power, Mubarak has often promised greater democracy.

Opposition parties have long accused Mubarak, 78, of rigging elections and using the emergency laws -- introduced after the 1981 assassination of his predecessor, Anwar Sadat -- to stifle dissent. The emergency gives the government sweeping powers to detain suspects and restrict public gatherings.

Mubarak had made similar pledges during his 2005 election campaign, but none reached parliament this year.

South Korea: U.S. Made North An Offer (AP)

AP, December 27, 2006

The United States offered to remove North Korea from Washington's list of states sponsoring terrorism if the communist regime dismantles its atomic weapons program, South Korea's main nuclear envoy said Tuesday.

The proposal was just one of the incentives the U.S. spelled out last week at six-nation nuclear disarmament talks with the North, along with offers of security guarantees, a peace treaty and normalization of relations, Chun Yung-woo said.

"The point of the proposal is that everything is possible if North Korea denuclearizes and nothing is possible if it refuses," Chun told news cable channel YTN.

North Korea was not prepared to review the U.S. offer at the talks, but promised to study it and bring a response to the next round of negotiations, he said.

U.S. diplomats have declined to discuss specifics of their talks with the North Koreans, and State Department spokeswoman Amanda Rogers-Harper would not confirm Chun's report.

Referring to North Korea's promise more than a year ago to give up nuclear arms in return for security guarantees and aid, she said: "The Sept. 19, 2005, joint statement offers North Korea a clear path to a positive future and concrete benefits in return for carrying out its commitments to denuclearize."

Removal from Washington's list of terrorism-sponsoring states has long been a key North Korean demand. The listing effectively blocks a country from getting low-interest loans from international lending agencies.

North Korea was first put on the list for its alleged involvement in the 1987 mid-air bombing of a South Korean airliner that killed all 115 people aboard.

The six-nation talks in Beijing — the first since North Korea's Oct. 9 nuclear test explosion — produced no breakthrough as the North's delegation refused to discuss disarmament, demanding Washington first lift financial sanctions imposed for the North's alleged involvement in dollar counterfeiting and money laundering.

A date for a resumption of the talks — involving China, Japan, the two Koreas, Russia and the U.S. — has not been set.

North Korea says the financial sanctions are evidence of Washington's "hostile policy" and indicate its intention to overthrow the regime, and the North therefore needs nuclear weapons for protection.

Washington says the restrictions against a Macau-based bank holding North Korean accounts is a law enforcement matter unconnected to the nuclear issue.

The U.S. and North Korea held separate bilateral talks on the financial issue on the sidelines of the nuclear negotiations, but failed to narrow differences.

Chun said the U.S. and the North exchanged views on when and where to hold the next financial talks, but he declined to elaborate.

South Korea's new foreign minister, Song Min-soon, went to Tokyo on Tuesday to discuss the North Korean talks, officials said.

Making his first overseas trip since becoming South Korea's top diplomat in early December, Song was to meet with Japan's chief Cabinet secretary, Yasuhisa Shiozaki, on Tuesday and Prime Minister Shinzo Abe and Foreign Minister Taro Aso on Wednesday, the Foreign Ministry said.

Song also planned to seek ways to mend South Korea's strained relations with Japan.

Ties have been frayed by territorial disputes and by former Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi's repeated visits to a war shrine that honors Japan's war dead, including convicted war criminals. The visits angered many on the Korean peninsula, which Japan ruled as a colony in 1910-45.

The Book On North Korea (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

On the surface, "A Corpse in the Koryo," by James Church, is a crackling good mystery novel, filled with unusual characters involved in a complex plot that keeps you guessing to the end. It has received rave reviews -- as a mystery novel.

But the book has also caused a stir among Asia specialists because it offers an unusually nuanced and detailed portrait of one of the most closed societies on Earth -- North Korea. Much like Martin Cruz Smith's novel "Gorky Park," which depicted life in the Soviet Union in the early 1980s through the eyes of police inspector, "A Corpse on the Koryo" provides a vivid window into a mysterious country through the perspective of its primary character -- Inspector O.

Peter Hayes, a North Korea expert who is executive director of the Nautilus Institute for Security and Sustainable Development, a research group, described the novel as "the best unclassified account of how North Korea works and why it has survived all these years when the rest of the communist world capitulated to the global market a decade ago," and said, "This novel should be required bedtime reading for President Bush and his national security team."

That was precisely the point of writing the book, according to the author. James Church is a pseudonym for what the book jacket describes as "a former Western intelligence officer with decades of experience in Asia" who "has wandered through Korea for years." In an interview, Church said he was frustrated by the limitations of his intelligence reports. He was often required to frame any information through the moral lens of Western society, which regards North Korea as one of the most repressive regimes in the world. So he decided to see if he could take his intimate knowledge of North Korea and make it accessible to a wider audience by placing it in a thriller.

In the academic or intelligence world, an analyst who wrote about North Korea without the standard "moral bubble" immediately would be accused of being blind to the "awfulness of the place," Church said. "You don't have to do that in a mystery story."

The result is fascinating. Much of Church's writing is quite beautiful -- one wonders what his intelligence reports read like -- with keen observations of even the smallest details.

The traditional stereotype of North Korea is that it is a bare, broken place, but the book races across the northern half of the Korean Peninsula providing elaborate descriptions of its virtually unspoiled beaches and mountains. (The book, however, is sadly lacking maps.) Church said it is very difficult to look at any horizon in North Korea without seeing mountains or hills. So he sought to show how important the landscape is to the North Korean people -- and demonstrate their deep psychological attachment to it.

The characters are caught up in a blindingly complex system of cross and double-cross, a world in which every step is watched and reported on by someone else. Inspector O, who is very smart and has a sense of humor, must carefully navigate between friend and foe as he tries to unravel the connection between the death of a mysterious foreigner in a Pyongyang hotel and two rival smuggling schemes run by different government ministries. But Church shows how the North Korean government is unlike the Soviet regimes imposed on Eastern Europe, how it has adapted and in many ways become uniquely Korean.

The characters have their complaints about the strange society -- Inspector O is always in search of sandpaper for his woodworking and a cup of tea -- but also defend it. When Inspector O encounters a Finnish woman and mentions how the river in Pyongyang "sparkles on sunny days," she asks him, "Have you ever been anywhere real?" He lashes out that he has been overseas, but "some things are good, some things aren't, same as here. Nothing is perfect. This godforsaken country, as you call it, is where I live. This is my home."

The plot of the investigation is interwoven with scenes of an interrogation of Inspector O by an Irish intelligence officer who has a stereotypical view of the country, allowing Church to explore how the Western and North Korean realities rub against each other. The conversation at times seems an echo of fruitless conversations between Americans and North Koreans over North Korea's nuclear weapons programs.

But the book does not mention politics, nuclear weapons or even North Korean leader Kim Jong Il, keeping it grounded in the everyday existence of the North Korean people. It has been such a success that a second novel on the travails of Inspector O is in the works.

Sudan May Allow U.N. Force In Darfur (WP)

By Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0109419

NEW YORK, Dec. 26 -- Sudan's president has suggested that he would be willing to accept a peacekeeping force with United Nations troops in Darfur, where his counterinsurgency campaign has left hundreds of thousands of civilians dead and millions homeless.

President Omar al-Bashir has rejected calls for foreign troops and U.N. intervention to end the bloodshed. But under mounting pressure from the Bush administration to respond to U.N. plans for a cease-fire, Bashir appeared to accept some of Secretary General Kofi Annan's proposals in a letter sent over the weekend.

U.S. and U.N. diplomats were guarded in their reactions to the letter, which was made public Tuesday.

Although Bashir wrote to Annan that he would accept a proposal for U.N. forces to bolster African Union peacekeepers in Darfur, the Sudanese president wants the plan to be implemented through a three-member panel on which Khartoum has a seat. Diplomats said that arrangement could effectively give Sudan veto power over how the plan is implemented.

"While we would like to be cautiously optimistic, we have heard positive sounds before like this before," said Benjamin Chang, a spokesman for the U.S. mission to the United Nations. "We need to see actions on the ground, and we need a U.N. presence in Darfur now."

Chang said Annan or one of his advisers will brief the Security Council on Wednesday with an assessment of Bashir's letter.

In the meantime, U.S. military experts and U.N. force commanders were studying the letter, diplomats said.

Bashir's letter came after a meeting in Khartoum earlier this month with Andrew S. Natsios, President Bush's special adviser on Sudan.

Natsios said he urged Bashir to accept all aspects of Annan's plan and warned that if he did not do so by the end of the year, the United States would take a more aggressive stand.

"We have told the Sudanese that we have to move along to our own strategic processes in the United States government, and we will do that beginning in the new year if we do not see some kind of progress on Kofi's plan between now and the end of the year," Natsios said last week.

U.S. and U.N. officials have long suspected that Bashir may try to buy time until Annan leaves office at the end of the year, then begin new negotiations for more favorable terms with Annan's successor, Ban Ki Moon of South Korea.

Darfur has experienced some of the worst violence in Africa in more than a decade. The Sudanese government, backed by local Arab militia, has mounted a violent campaign against civilians suspected of supporting Darfur rebel groups. The conflict has left as many as 450,000 people dead and has driven more than 2 million people from their homes.

Last week, Annan asked the Sudanese leader for his formal consent for a joint African Union-U.N. force of at least 22,000 troops and police. Bashir has opposed a force made up of only U.N. troops, saying it would be tantamount to an invasion of his country.

The idea of a combined force was endorsed by African nations in October, but Bashir has been unclear about whether he would accept it.

In the letter, made public by Annan's office in New York, Bashir wrote that he is ready to begin talks on a cease-fire and explicitly accepted a joint force.

New U.S. Strategy In Latin America: Turn On The Charm (MCT)

By Pablo Bachelet

McClatchy, December 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Bush administration has refused to talk to foes such as Iran, North Korea and Cuba, but it has no such qualms about some of its sternest critics in Latin America, including Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez.

Chavez relishes calling President Bush names like Mr. Danger and a donkey, and over the years the State Department has accused Chavez of various misdeeds, from undermining democracy to cutting ties with U.S. agencies fighting terrorism and drug traffickers.

Yet, less than two weeks after Chavez won re-election earlier this month, the U.S. ambassador in Caracas met with the Venezuelan foreign minister to ease tensions between the two countries.

Chavez responded by attacking U.S. counter-drug efforts, so it's unclear if the charm offensive will work. But the move is part of a broader effort by U.S. officials to court leftist leaders who just weeks ago were warily viewed as pro-Chavez populists. This includes President-elects Daniel Ortega of Nicaragua and Ecuador's Rafael Correa, who recently heralded the rise of a socialist Latin America.

The Bush administration has long sought out moderate socialists, such as Brazilian President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva, and relations with once-prickly opponents like Argentine President Nestor Kirchner have improved lately.

DOJ_NMG_0109420

The thinking is that while these leaders don't see eye to eye with Bush, they were democratically elected and, unlike Iran or North Korea, their countries pose no obvious national security threats to U.S. interests, officials say.

Many observers welcome the diplomatic move.

"We have to really pursue a path of quiet pragmatism," said Eric Farnsworth, a vice president with the Council of the Americas, an organization that promotes more contacts with Latin American nations. "Stay out of the headlines, get out of the ideological debates."

The contacts are the Bush administration's adjustment to the results of a dozen elections this year. Nine of them were won by leftist leaders, ranging from moderates to far left, including several who declare themselves allies of Chavez and Cuba's Fidel Castro.

"One thing we've made clear as we deal with leaders across the region is that we don't care much if they're left, center or right, as long as they're committed to democracy and committed to working with us," Thomas Shannon, the State Department's top diplomat to Latin America, said recently.

The Bush administration changed its tone after Ortega won his election last month. Just a year ago, the State Department accused his Sandinista party of conspiring to topple a sitting pro-Washington government, and several top Sandinista officials had their U.S. visas stripped.

Last month, Shannon traveled to Nicaragua and met with Ortega, who in recent years had moderated his criticisms of U.S. policies.

Shannon described the encounter as "a really good meeting" in which Ortega expressed his support for the Central American Free Trade Agreement and several U.S. aid programs for Managua.

Ortega's friendly relations with Chavez and Castro weren't a problem, Shannon said.

"Our focus wasn't on how he relates to others," Shannon said. "Our focus was on how he's going to relate to us."

The Bush administration is also reaching out to Ecuador's President-elect Correa. On the campaign trail, the charismatic U.S.-educated economist called Bush "dimwitted," though he later toned down his rhetoric and held a meeting with the U.S. ambassador in Quito that was widely broadcast in the local media.

Correa opposes an agreement that lets the U.S. military use Ecuador's Manta air base for counter-drug operations, but the United States seems to harbor no ill feelings. Bush called Correa to congratulate him on his victory.

U.S. officials also have been courting Bolivia's feisty President Evo Morales, an Aymara indigenous leader who, like Chavez, often rails against Washington's "imperialism" and is a frequent visitor to Havana.

U.S. officials have been critical of Morales' reluctance to limit a crackdown on coca farming, which produces the raw materials to make cocaine. Coca is traditionally used by indigenous peoples for legitimate purposes.

In a goodwill gesture, the United States certified in September that Bolivia was doing enough to combat drug traffickers, even though Washington will take another look at Bolivia's efforts in March. The Bush administration this month pushed Congress to include Bolivia and Ecuador among a group of Andean nations that obtained unilateral trade preferences from Washington.

William Brownfield, the American ambassador to Venezuela, characterized the Dec. 14 encounter with Foreign Minister Nicolas Maduro as "very positive." But five days after the Brownfield-Maduro meeting and one day after Brownfield made a public call for cordiality, Chavez called Brownfield a liar for suggesting that drug trafficking in Venezuela was on the rise, and he reiterated his claims that Drug Enforcement Agency officials were spies.

"The battle against drug smuggling has been an excuse that imperialists have used for several years to penetrate our country, trample our people and justify a military presence in Latin America," Chavez said.

No Cancer For Castro, Surgeon Says (CHIT)

By Gary Marx

Chicago Tribune, December 27, 2006

HAVANA -- In the first independent diagnosis of Fidel Castro, a prominent Spanish surgeon said Tuesday the ailing 80-year-old leader does not have cancer and is recuperating slowly from intestinal surgery.

Dr. Jose Luis Garcia Sabrido traveled to Havana last Thursday to examine Castro at the request of Cuban authorities. Garcia Sabrido has returned to Madrid, where he told reporters that Castro's condition is stable and he does not require additional surgery.

But Garcia Sabrido declined to clarify what ailment Castro is suffering from. Cuban officials have said Castro's health condition is a state secret, and his Cuban doctors reportedly are sequestered.

"Fidel Castro does not suffer from any malignancy," Garcia Sabrido said at Madrid's Gregorio Maranon hospital, where he is chief surgeon. "It is a benign process in which he has suffered a series of complications."

DOJ_NMG_0109421

Garcia Sabrido said Castro's mind is active and clear and he could return to power if he recovers completely.

A U.S. diplomat in Havana who asked not to be identified said she heard Garcia Sabrido's diagnosis but declined to comment about "a statement from a private physician."

Cuba's state-run television did not cover the story in its Tuesday afternoon newscast.

Castro's health condition has been a mystery since Cuban authorities announced in late July that the nation's long-serving leader suffered intestinal bleeding, underwent surgery and ceded power to his younger brother, Defense Minister Raul Castro.

In a statement signed July 31, the Cuban leader attributed his illness to a heavy work and travel schedule. He has said little else since then.

In recent months, Cuban Vice President Carlos Lage and other officials have asserted that Castro is not suffering from cancer, but they have offered no evidence to back up their statements.

Castro has not been seen in public since late July, and the few photographs and short videos of him carried in the Cuban media showed him to be thin and fragile.

Absent information, many Cubans have come believe that Castro had undergone two or perhaps three surgeries and was suffering from cancer or another terminal illness.

U.S. intelligence chief John Negroponte said earlier this month that Castro had "months, not years" to live.

But Garcia Sabrido's diagnosis appears to confirm what Cuban officials have been saying all along about Castro's illness, though they have recently softened earlier statements that he soon would return to full duties.

"He is getting better," Ramon Castro, Fidel's older brother, said in a brief interview last week.

Rodrigo Alvarez Cambras, a leading Cuban physician who is not among the doctors treating Castro, said in an interview last week that he believes Castro is suffering from diverticulitis, a complication of a common illness in people older than 50 in which pockets develop in the colon.

In moderate cases, the pockets become inflamed and infected, causing abdominal pain, diarrhea and bleeding. In severe cases, the colon is perforated, a condition known as peritonitis, in which stool leaks into the abdominal cavity and requires immediate surgery.

"They usually cut out the piece of the colon that has a hole in it, suck out all of the stool in the cavity and give the patient a temporary colostomy bag," explained Dr. Sunanda Kane, a gastroenterologist at the University of Chicago Hospitals.

Kane said the condition could be fatal if the patient develops sepsis, a general body infection, which can cause organs such as the kidneys to shut down and require dialysis treatment.

"Eighty-year-olds who are on dialysis tend to have a poorer prognosis," she said.

But Garcia Sabrido said Tuesday that Castro's rehabilitation now involves mostly muscular and nutritional support, indicating to Kane that the worst may be over for Castro.

Responding to critics who argued that he should not have treated the communist strongman, Garcia Sabrido said his trip to Havana was motivated by humanitarian concerns and not politics.

"When a physician is called upon as a physician, his duty is to be a physician," Garcia Sabrido said. "If I am asked my opinion about a patient, I don't ask about his religion or his political ideas.

"I am a professional doctor and I devote myself to that," he said. "For me, President Castro is an exceptional patient, but he's still a patient."

Spanish Doctor Denies Castro Has Cancer (NYT)

By James C. McKinley Jr.

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Dec. 26 — A Spanish surgeon who examined Fidel Castro last week said Tuesday that the 80-year-old Cuban president did not have cancer and could return to work after recovering from the intestinal surgery he had last summer.

“His physical activity is excellent, his intellectual activity intact,” the doctor, José Luis García Sabrido, head of surgery at Gregorio Marañón Hospital in Madrid, said at a news conference in Madrid. “I’d say fantastic. He’s recovering from his previous operation.”

This is the first time since Mr. Castro dropped out of public view in the summer that a medical expert outside the Cuban government has commented on his health.

Cuban officials have said Mr. Castro’s condition is a state secret.

United States intelligence officials have said Mr. Castro is not long for this world, especially after he failed to appear at a weeklong celebration of his birthday, held this month.

Speculation has been rampant in Washington and among Cuban exiles in Miami that Mr. Castro, a leftist icon who has thumbed his nose at the White House for nearly five decades, has colon cancer.

The director of national intelligence, John D. Negroponte, told The Washington Post this month that American intelligence agencies believed that Mr. Castro was "terminally ill" and that he would be dead in "months, not years." Other American intelligence officials have said they believe that Mr. Castro is dying of cancer.

On Tuesday, a spokesman for Mr. Negroponte, Ross Feinstein, said the director had nothing to add to his earlier assessment.

Dr. García Sabrido, who examined Mr. Castro in Cuba last week, said the intestinal bleeding that prompted the handing of power to his brother Raúl and small group of cabinet ministers in the summer did not stem from a malignancy. He added that Mr. Castro could make a full recovery, but "required muscular rehabilitation and a strict diet."

"He does not have cancer, he has a problem with his digestive system," Dr. García Sabrido told reporters in Madrid. "President Castro has no malign inflammation. It's a benign process in which he has had a series of complications."

The surgeon flew to Havana last week with medical equipment not available in Cuba to determine whether Mr. Castro needed further surgery. In keeping with Havana's wishes, he did not say specifically what ailed Mr. Castro.

"It is not planned that he will undergo another operation for the moment," Dr. García Sabrido said. "His condition is stable. He is recovering slowly but progressively."

Cuban officials have steadfastly denied that Mr. Castro has cancer, although they have stopped insisting that he will return to power. On Oct. 28, video images released to the public showed that the once towering leader had become a shuffling and frail man.

A number of noncancerous ailments can cause serious intestinal bleeding. A common problem in the United States is diverticulitis. It is an inflammation of small pouchlike balloonings in the large bowel, or large intestine, and can require a number of surgical procedures. Examples of other noncancerous intestinal conditions are inflammatory bowel diseases like regional enteritis (Crohn's) or ulcerative colitis.

Serious bleeding could also develop as a complication of surgery to correct an insufficient blood supply to the intestine. Such a condition may be caused by arteriosclerosis and is analogous to the insufficient blood supply that can lead to angina, heart attack or stroke.

To correct the problem, surgeons may have to remove a large part of the small intestine, sometimes creating a difficulty known as short bowel syndrome. That syndrome can lead to difficulty in digestion.

Besides his absence from a military parade in his honor on Dec. 2, other signs have indicated Mr. Castro's weakened condition. On Friday, he missed the last session of the year of the National Assembly for only the second time in 30 years.

News reports last week said Mr. was too ill to receive a longtime friend, the Colombian author and Nobel Prize winner Gabriel García Márquez.

Cuban officials told visiting American congressmen this month that Mr. Castro did not have a terminal illness and would make a public appearance shortly.

Castro Called Cancer-free (WT/AP)

By Ciaran Giles

The Washington Times, December 27, 2006

MADRID - A Spanish surgeon who treated Fidel Castro said the ailing Cuban leader does not have cancer, insisting yesterday that he was recovering slowly but progressively from a serious operation.

The comments by Jose Luis Garcia Sabrido, the chief surgeon at Madrid´s Gregorio Maranon Hospital, were the first independent medical assessment of Mr. Castro´s condition since the Cuban leader underwent emergency intestinal surgery in July. The Cuban government has kept Mr. Castro´s condition a state secret, occasionally releasing photographs and videos of him to show that he is convalescing.

Dr. Garcia Sabrido visited Havana last week to examine Mr. Castro and consult with his medical team.

"He hasn´t got cancer," Dr. Garcia Sabrido said, adding that he thinks Mr. Castro will become physically capable of running the country again. "While respecting confidentiality, I can tell you that President Castro is not suffering from any malignant sickness."

Mr. Castro, 80, has not appeared in public since temporarily ceding power to his younger brother, Raul, after his surgery this summer. Dr. Garcia Sabrido declined to give details about Mr. Castro´s condition but said it was "a benign process in which there have been a series of complications."

Cuban authorities have denied that Mr. Castro is suffering from terminal cancer, but his prolonged absence has fueled increasing speculation that he will not return to power.

Asked whether he thought Mr. Castro would be physically capable of once again governing Cuba, Dr. Garcia Sabrido said: "If his recovery is absolute, then naturally, yes.

DOJ_NMG_0109423

"I think that in these moments his decision to delegate power implies that he must now be dedicated to his recovery. What happens in the future will be an absolutely personal matter."

He said he was impressed by Mr. Castro´s good spirits.

"His intellectual activity is intact, I´d say fantastic," the surgeon said. "I was amazed at his capacity to relate personal and historical anecdotes.

"He wants to return to work every day, but medical recommendations demand caution," he said.

Some U.S. doctors say Mr. Castro may suffer from diverticular disease, which can cause bleeding in the lower intestine, especially in people over 60. In severe cases, emergency surgery may be required.

Dr. Garcia Sabrido´s specialty is in the digestive system and in transplants. In 1988, he wrote in the medical journal Archives of Surgery about a temporary stomach "zipper" that Spanish doctors had used on patients to provide repeated easy access for draining and treating abdominal infections.

On Monday, Spanish authorities confirmed that Dr. Garcia Sabrido had traveled to Cuba´s capital with advanced medical equipment to determine whether Mr. Castro needed additional surgery. Dr. Garcia Sabrido said yesterday that another operation was not immediately necessary.

"It is not planned that he will undergo another operation for the moment," he said. "His condition is stable. He is recovering from a very serious operation."

There was no mention of Dr. Garcia Sabrido´s visit in Cuba´s state press.

As Castro Fades, A Crop Of New Leaders (CSM)

By Tom Fawthrop

The Christian Science Monitor, December 27, 2006

HAVANA, CUBA

In a country that is in the process of bidding a long farewell to its ageing revolutionaries, Mariela Castro brings an expectation of change along with an air of youthful passion. As the director of Cenesex (the National Sex Education Center) Ms. Castro is eager to consider where Cuba should go in a postrevolutionary era.

"We have many contradictions in Cuba," says Castro, the daughter of Raúl Castro, Cuba's de facto leader and brother of ailing President Fidel Castro. A Spanish doctor arrived in Cuba last week, reenergizing speculation about the health of the Cuban leader, who has not been seen in public since undergoing surgery in July. "We need to experiment and to test what really works, to make public ownership more effective, rather than simply adopting wholesale free-market reforms," Ms. Castro says.

Leaders like Ms. Castro may indicate the extent to which a post-Castro Cuba may be willing to liberalize, both economically and socially. As Cuba's old-guard leadership fades, this new generation - made up primarily of the sons and daughters of those who fought in the 1959 Communist revolution - is perhaps more sympathetic to economic reforms and more-liberal social policies.

Nevertheless, Cuba-watchers and experts have ruled out any dramatic lurch toward a liberal market economy that might undermine the island nation's heritage as the persistent holdout of traditional Communist policies. More relaxed social attitudes may also evolve gradually.

Still, no one doubts that change is afoot.

"The transition in Cuba has already taken place" and this new generation has a key role to play, says Richard Gott, a Latin American analyst and former foreign correspondent for the London-based The Guardian newspaper. "Carlos Lage will be the brains behind the new government. He, together with Julio Soberon at the central bank, will seek to chart a new economic course."

Now Raul Castro has started to echo some of his daughter's sentiments. Addressing university students, he urged that they should "fearlessly engage in public debate and analysis," according to Granma, the Communist Party newspaper.

Cuba is one of several Latin American countries that once harassed homosexuals as a matter of policy. But Mariela Castro, who is also an executive member of the World Association for Sexual Health, insists that job discrimination and mass arrests are a thing of the past.

"[Homosexuals] still sometimes face arrest by bigoted police" says Castro, adding that she has sometimes clashed with the authorities in her efforts to release gay men and women from prison.

"Now, society is more relaxed. There is no official repression of gays and lesbians," she argues confidently. A writer turned politico

Cuban writer and culture minister Abel Prieto has also emerged as an influential power broker in a changing Cuba. Since joining the state bureaucracy and the politburo, the long-haired, middle-aged minister still exudes a passion for culture and a common touch.

In response to a question about the conflict of interest between writers and the state, Mr. Prieto laughs, saying that, "sometimes I feel like Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, but I hope that artists and writers feel that I am still one of them."

Unlike many members of the government, Prieto is very candid as he speaks about allegations that the Cuban government censors political websites.

"It would be a delusion to think we could hide that torrent of information," he insists, referring to anti-Castro websites. "The only possibility is to beat them with a better concept of life."

Prieto also defended the arrest of the dissident writer Raul Rivero in 2003.

"He was not arrested for his views, but for receiving US funding for his collaboration with a country that has besieged our island," argues the minister, referring to the 45-year-long US trade embargo.

An avid fan of the Beatles since the 1970s when their music was essentially banned by the Cuban state, Prieto has led an appreciation campaign of John Lennon. In 2000, he unveiled a statue and dedicated "John Lennon Park" to the musician's memory. Many Cubans joke that he is not as much a Marxist-Leninist as a "Marxist-Lennonist."

Prieto, because of a moment on Cuban television five years ago, is known as one of the few Cabinet ministers who has ever dared to challenge the president. Cubans recall a news segment in which Castro and Prieto appeared together.

After Castro blamed his minister for the fact that so many artists were leaving the country to work abroad, Prieto defended himself.

Millions watched as their supreme leader accepted his error and apologized to Abel Prieto.

"Prieto is extremely important. He has carved out a sizable space for cultural expression [for] many Cuban artists and writers since he became minister of culture," says Julia Sweig, director of the Latin American Studies at the Council on Foreign Relations in Washington.

In a Foreign Affairs article, written after a lengthy visit to Cuba in November, Ms. Sweig indicated that expectations were high among Cuban officials that the government could move forward after Castro.

"People at all levels of the Cuban government and the Communist Party were enormously confident of the regime's ability to survive Fidel's passing," Ms. Sweig wrote.

That confidence was apparent in Raúl Castro's speech to the opening session of the new parliament last week. "Tell it like it is - tell the truth without justifications, because we are tired of justifications in this revolution," the acting president urged his ministers, according to the youth newspaper Juventud Rebelde. US economic sanctions irrelevant

Attempts by the Bush administration to set the agenda for change in Cuba, says Sweig, appear to be increasingly irrelevant to the reality inside the country, as a new generation gains increasing clout.

Gott, the Latin American analyst, says that both Ms. Castro and Prieto are figures to watch.

DOJ_NMG_0109425

"Mariela Castro is a more than competent member of the Castro clan - she will have an important role in social affairs," he says. "The genial Abel Prieto might well be promoted from the culture ministry to something more taxing."

Russian Continues The Tantrum Tradition At U.N. (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

UNITED NATIONS -- Russia has brandished a new weapon in its diplomatic arsenal: the Security Council tantrum.

Russian Ambassador Vitaly Churkin barged out of the U.N. chamber Dec. 11, canceling a crucial meeting on Iran's nuclear program. Asked to explain why the 15-nation council's major powers would not be able to address the Iranian nuclear crisis, Churkin said: "Because. Because I said so."

The Russian's outburst reflected anger over a U.S. decision to raise concern about political developments in Belarus, a Russian ally that has gained international condemnation for its repressive policies.

But it also echoed a classic Soviet practice at the United Nations dating back to 1945, when Soviet strongman Joseph Stalin's envoy, Andrei Gromyko, also used bluster to exact political concessions, threatening to pull out of the new organization unless the Security Council veto was expanded. Stalin won that fight. The practice reached its peak more than a decade later when another Soviet leader, Nikita Khrushchev, famously banged his shoe on his table in the U.N. General Assembly.

"It's something we used to associate with the Soviets, but the Russians have sort of taken this over," said Edward Luck, a Columbia University historian who studies the United Nations. "This is a negotiating tactic. The other side has to make it up to you as though you have been deeply offended. We've done it at times, and others do it."

Churkin's angry reactions to diplomatic affronts have become so common that some U.N. diplomats have invented a word to describe it: Vitalyation (rhymes with "retaliation"). But the former Soviet official has parlayed Russian outrage into tactical diplomatic victories.

The United States dropped sanctions last month against Sukhoi, a Russian jetmaker that supplies Iran, after Churkin and other top Russian officials hinted that it could jeopardize negotiations over Iran. "If they want to go it on their own, you know, legislating unilateral sanctions, they are welcome to tackle the problem alone," Churkin said.

Churkin expressed confidence this month that the United States would drop its concerns about Belarus's rights record in the council.

"I don't think they will raise" the issue again, he said. "We have had some exchanges about it, and I think we now understand better a certain choice needs to be made: Either we use the Security Council as an important instrument to discuss and resolve serious international problems, or attempts can be allowed to use it as a platform for propaganda. Our preference is to focus on important things."

Senior Europeans said that the U.S. decision to raise the issue of Belarus needlessly provoked Russia at a critical stage in the Iran negotiations and that Churkin was right in asserting that the issue does not constitute a threat to international peace and security, the threshold for Security Council involvement in a crisis.

Britain, France and the U.S. mission to the United Nations had urged the State Department not to mention Belarus in the 15-nation body until after they had concluded talks over Iran. But the State Department dismissed those concerns, instructing the U.S. political counselor, William Brencick, to urge the council to remain vigilant about developments in Belarus, citing concern over the recent 54-day hunger strike by a jailed former presidential candidate, Alexander Kozulin.

A senior U.S. official said they were responding to a plea by Kozulin's wife, who said her husband would resume eating if the United States discussed her husband's plight in the Security Council. Kozulin ended the hunger strike on the same day.

"We did it to save his life; it was the right thing to do," said the senior official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

Some observers said the Russians have used negotiations on a variety of important issues, including Iran's and North Korea's nuclear programs, to secure concessions on others.

For instance, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov eased his opposition to a resolution sanctioning North Korea only after U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice agreed to support a Russian-sponsored resolution criticizing neighboring Georgia, which had detained seven Russian soldiers who were accused of spying. The United States had previously argued that the dispute was a domestic matter that should not be handled by the Security Council.

The bluster technique has not always turned out so well.

In 1950, the United States ushered through a Security Council resolution authorizing the deployment of a U.S.-led force to repel North Korea's invasion of South Korea. The Soviet delegation had boycotted the council because it failed to grant a seat to China's communist government, so it could not cast a veto to deny the United States international backing for entering the Korean War.

DOJ_NMG_0109426

Churkin took offense when John R. Bolton, the outgoing U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, compared Khrushchev's shoe-banging to North Korea's defiance of the U.N. Security Council. He appealed to the council president, Kenzo Oshima of Japan, "to use your influence" to discourage the use of such an "inappropriate analogy."

China Urges Auto Makers To Limit Their Expansion (WSJ)

By Gordon Fairclough

The Wall Street Journal, December 27, 2006

SHANGHAI, China -- China's economic planners are waving a yellow flag at the nation's auto industry, warning that growth in car makers' production capacity is outstripping demand and calling for limits on further expansion.

Passenger-car sales have been increasing at a torrid rate, making China the world's second-largest vehicle market by unit sales after the U.S. But car companies, rushing to cash in on the growth, have been adding assembly lines at an even faster rate, the planners said.

In a statement Tuesday, the National Development and Reform Commission, which sets China's industrial policy, said overcapacity is threatening the auto industry's health and laid out guidelines to rein in growth.

For years, China has promoted the auto business, viewing it as a critical driver of economic growth and industrialization, and all kinds of companies -- from motorcycle manufacturers to cellphone-battery makers -- have started assembling cars. Now, planners fret that the industry frenzy -- which has sparked a sharp price war -- will inhibit the emergence of manufacturers large and strong enough to compete with established car makers from the U.S., Japan and Europe.

Government officials are also increasingly worried about the environmental and social costs of China's rapid shift to car driving, which has helped shroud cities in air pollution, snarled traffic and contributed to a surge in roadway-accident deaths.

The commission has tried to slow investment in industries before, including auto making and steel, in efforts to keep China's economy from overheating. But local governments and companies often ignore its pronouncements, and it is unclear how effective the new limits will be.

"Local governments want to attract car-related investments and offer cheap land to investors, even though there isn't real market demand for the products," says Jia Xinguang, chief analyst with the monthly Chinese trade publication Auto Magazine. Still, Mr. Jia said, the new policies likely will mean that "capacity control will be stricter" -- putting the government at odds with the wishes of many smaller companies struggling to break into the car business and grow quickly enough to survive.

Under the new guidelines, a company must sell cars and trucks equal to 80% of its government-approved production capacity before it can seek permission to construct a new plant away from its home base. Auto makers that don't have an approved capacity must be making at least 100,000 cars or 50,000 sport-utility vehicles a year if they want to expand.

Planners also urged Chinese car companies to invest more in developing their own models and called on local and national government agencies to buy Chinese national brands, rather than foreign brands, that are environmentally friendly, in order to "set an example for ordinary consumers."

They also said the government should foster the creation of fewer, bigger Chinese car companies able to compete in global markets through mergers, acquisitions and other means.

Most passenger cars in China are built by joint ventures between state-owned Chinese auto makers and large international car companies. General Motors Corp. and Volkswagen AG are the biggest foreign brands in the market.

Chinese car makers' push to develop their own brands has boosted their combined share of the domestic market to more than 26%, and it is a potential source of friction with multinationals. GM's partner, Shanghai Automotive Industry Corp., for example, recently unveiled its own luxury car.

The National Development and Reform Commission said that, even as it seeks to promote Chinese national brands, the government must work to build trust and "mutually beneficial relationships" with foreign partners.

Illegal Power Plants, Coal Mines In China Pose Challenge For Beijing (WSJ)

By Shai Oster

The Wall Street Journal, December 27, 2006

JUBAO VILLAGE, China -- On the edge of this dusty farming hamlet, the massive smokestack of the half-finished Xinfeng Power Plant looms as a monument to China's out-of-control demand for energy.

Unlike two other power plants nearby, Xinfeng isn't supposed to exist. China's electricity regulators never authorized the $362 million coal-burning plant. But in 2004, the provincial government here in northern China's Inner Mongolia ignored Beijing's call to slow down investment and started building the plant anyway, hoping to ensure enough juice for the region's supercharged industrialization by tapping its rich reservoirs of coal.

DOJ_NMG_0109427

Inner Mongolia's disobedience might have escaped notice. But in July 2005, in the rush to finish the plant before regulators found out about it, the housing for a turbine collapsed, killing six workers. During the yearlong investigation that followed, the central government discovered that Inner Mongolia had illegally built about 10 power plants, or 8.6 gigawatts of electricity-generating capacity -- equal to about a 10th of the United Kingdom's total capacity.

The illegal plants have had unintended -- and detrimental -- consequences. By eschewing even basic environmental safeguards, they stand out as polluters even in an industry that is one of China's leading sources of emissions, officials say. They also have driven up the demand for and price of coal, the country's most abundant source of fuel. That, in turn, has spawned thousands of illegal coal mines that have contributed to more than 4,000 coal-mining deaths in China this year.

The illegal power plants show how China's economic transformation is outpacing Beijing's ability to manage it. Never before has a country with such a big population grown as rapidly as China. The country's economy has expanded an average 10% a year since the late 1970s. The process of economic modernization is happening twice as fast in China as it did in the U.S. or Japan, where it took half a century or more.

One fifth of the power plants in China are illegal, according to government estimates -- enough to light up all of the U.K. While the electricity they supply is essential to power China's growth, the uncontrolled manner in which they are multiplying, often under the protection of local authorities, poses a challenge to Beijing's authority and its grip on energy policy.

"It is impossible for our central government to go everywhere to see, when the small power plants start building," said Zhang Guobao, vice chairman of the National Development and Reform Commission, China's top energy policy planner, in an interview.

The central government is likewise finding it hard to crack down on illegal coal mines. In past years it has shut down thousands of mines -- only to see thousands more spring up in their place. The primary reason: the soaring profits to be made from selling coal to China's power plants are a powerful temptation. Many regions have embraced coal mining to boost their growth rates, including Inner Mongolia, one of China's most coal-rich provinces.

Infuriated by the illegal Xinfeng power plant, central-government officials earlier this year demanded that the province's top leadership present self-criticisms before China's powerful State Council, or cabinet. Under China's Communist system, that's an unusually public form of rebuke, designed to send a message to others against defying Beijing's will.

Even so, construction continues today at the Xinfeng plant nearly a year after Beijing ordered it stopped. Officials at the company building the plant say they expect to get approval to complete it "sooner or later."

In China, more power plants almost invariably mean more coal consumption. The country has been unable to diversify away from coal, which is cheaper than alternative fuels, some of which are imported.

But China's coal consumption is costly in human and environmental terms. Amid the push to feed the country's power plants last year, 5,938 coal miners were killed in accidents, mostly in smaller, illegal mines. Such accidents are so commonplace here that only the larger ones rank as news.

Coal is one of the biggest pollution sources in China, which some experts think is on the verge of an environmental crisis. This year, the central government set a target of reducing the amount of energy the country consumes relative to its economic output. But the soaring demand for coal-fueled electricity has upended Beijing's efforts to rein in pollution.

"It will be very difficult to realize our targets of saving energy and reducing pollution," Ma Kai, China's top economic policy planner, said this fall.

The implications of China's mushrooming hunger for energy go far beyond its own borders. As incomes rise in China, energy use per person is starting to catch up with the richer West. The typical American consumes about eight metric tons of oil a year, or its equivalent in coal and other fuels. Japanese consume about half that sum. In China, per capita energy consumption now stands at just 1.2 metric tons.

It would require a doubling of world oil production -- an impossible feat -- for every Chinese to live the energy-intensive lifestyle of an American, as well as more coal than some believe China could ever dig up.

"We can't copy the big home and the big car" that so many Americans enjoy, said Zhou Dadi, a top researcher with the Energy Research Institute, a government-backed think tank. "It's just not doable."

China's current energy predicament is rooted in the decision it made three decades ago when it began to embrace a market economy. For the first 20 years of its transition, as China shifted from a mostly agrarian country to light industry, it was able to quadruple the size of its economy while only doubling its energy needs.

Throughout the 1990s, however, a new and faster phase of expansion quietly took hold as the government loosened restrictions on investment and the mobility of its citizens, accelerating China's industrialization and urbanization. Manufacturing accounted for a steadily greater share of the economy. Energy-intensive heavy industries boomed, from petrochemicals to auto production, aided by China's entry into the World Trade Organization in 2001.

Low energy prices, made possible in part by government controls, encouraged consumers to use more. Coal consumption initially crept up slowly, to around 1.5 billion metric tons a year in the mid-1990s, from just under one billion metric tons a year a decade earlier. Last year, however, China consumed about 2.2 billion metric tons of coal, one-third of the world's total and more than any other country.

Beijing's efforts to reduce reliance on coal have largely failed. China has plenty of coal -- an estimated 114.5 billion metric tons of recoverable reserves. Only the U.S. and Russia have more. Natural gas, which burns more efficiently and causes far less pollution, has proved too expensive to compete effectively. Planned increases in nuclear-power production would fill only a fraction of China's energy demand. Even China's more-ambitious plans for hydropower power and wind farms won't seriously challenge coal's dominance.

Coal miners are on the front lines of the battle to meet China's energy needs. It is dangerous work. As with power plants, China's government has had great difficulty regulating coal mines. In the U.S., which produces about half as much coal as China, 47 miners have been killed so far this year, up from 22 last year. In China, the number of deaths has declined slightly this year, but it is still enormous: 4,236 dead so far.

The number of casualties goes up in the winter. More than 400 miners died in November alone. "In winter, demand goes up, the market prices go up, and the profit motive goes up," said Huang Yi, spokesman for the State Administration of Worker Safety, the agency that investigates mine accidents.

Smaller, often inefficient, and dangerous mines account for about a third of China's coal production. They are so important to meeting its energy needs that the central government recently delayed plans to improve safety by shuttering many of them.

Whole regions of China are pockmarked with tiny, illegal mines like the one in Wangyu in central China's gritty Shanxi province, where an accident in early November killed 34 miners. Four tons of demolition explosives illegally stored in a shaft caught fire and destroyed the small mine, according to government safety officials. The dead, who had just started the night shift, were mostly from the same village some 250 miles away.

Wang Chenliang, from Sichuan province, had just ended his shift when the explosion occurred. He rushed back to help with rescue efforts. He and others pulled survivors from the wreckage and pumped air into the mine to aid anyone who was trapped but still alive.

"This work is tiring and dangerous," Mr. Wang said a few days after the accident, only moments before police detained a journalist attempting to interview survivors. Like others, he got his job through introductions from fellow villagers. "We came here to earn money. The money here is much higher than back home in Sichuan."

The mine's safety certificate and production permit had both expired, according to central-government officials. But the local government was protecting it, they said, because it held a financial interest in the mine.

That sort of corruption is common. Last year, the central government found that more than 4,500 government officials illegally held stakes in coal mines and frequently covered up safety violations. Many of these mines lack basic safety equipment. Workers scrabble down narrow pits, where the most modern tools may be the sticks of dynamite used to dislodge the coal. At the accident site in Wangyu, there was no rescue equipment on hand, another common problem.

Over the past few years, provincial officials in Inner Mongolia have decided to build power plants and encourage heavy industry to relocate to the region to take advantage of its coal resources. The strategy has paid off in economic terms.

Last year, the province's economy grew 21.6%, roughly double the national rate. In 2004, it grew 19.4%. Industrial output has grown an average 30% a year over the past four years. Such unbridled growth caught China's central government off guard.

In 2003 and 2004, massive power shortages in the south led to rolling blackouts. Local authorities across China decided to build power plants, often illegally, to keep their local economies humming. Around that time, officials in Inner Mongolia approved a plan to build the Xinfeng Power Plant in the small town of Fengzhen, in a bid to attract more factories.

"Inner Mongolia has a lot of coal. Other parts of China need the electricity. Of course Inner Mongolia should take advantage of its natural resources," said Yan Keji, a construction worker at one of the three power plants near Jubao.

It isn't just heavy industry that needs power. China's consumers are using more, too. Mr. Yan's hometown in the mountains of Hunan didn't have electricity until 1990. At first, his house had one light bulb. Now, the money he earns from construction has paid for a television, washing machine, refrigerator and air conditioning, a pattern repeated in millions of homes across China as people get richer.

China's sprawling cities are also driving up power demand. Inner Mongolia now provides Beijing with 20% of its electricity, according to Jim Brock, an independent energy consultant in the Chinese capital.

Nearly two years ago, China's central government started cracking down on the unauthorized power plants because they feared a surplus of power. In Inner Mongolia, local officials ignored orders to stop building the Xingfeng plant, figuring they could always get retroactive approval, according to the official Xinhua news agency. But the death of the six workers in July 2005 set in motion the investigation that culminated in the public castigation of the provincial chief and the order to stop work on Xinfeng.

DOJ_NMG_0109429

Some construction work on the plant continues. Workers interviewed at the site said the plant would be able to produce electricity next year. They declined to give their names.

Na Guiting, an official at Inner Mongolia Energy Generation Investment Co. Ltd., the plant's owner, said the company is eager to finish building and has reapplied for approval. "Mongolia still has a very serious power shortage. If Xinfeng would be approved, it could be generating in three or four months," the official said.

Tony Blair On Jet That Struck Lights On Miami Runway (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

MIAMI, Dec. 26 -- A commercial jet carrying British Prime Minister Tony Blair and his family missed a runway exit and struck some lights after landing at Miami International Airport on Tuesday. The plane was not damaged and no injures were reported, officials said.

British Airways Flight 209 from London ran over a couple of airfield lights after landing around 6:15 p.m., but it did not leave the pavement and it taxied to the gate under its own power, airport spokesman Marc Henderson said.

The plane stopped just past the official end of the runway, said Laura Brown, a Federal Aviation Administration spokeswoman.

"It landed safely on the runway. It slowed down. It was going at taxiway speed, and they just missed a turn," Brown said.

Blair was among the 343 passengers on the plane, but no additional information about his trip was available, U.S. Secret Service spokeswoman Kim Bruce said. Blair receives Secret Service protection when he lands in the United States.

A Downing Street official, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said the prime minister and his family were not hurt.

He did not say where the Blairs were going, but Blair and his family have taken vacations in Bermuda.

The pilot stopped the plane at the end of the runway because he could not see the lights to the taxiway, British Airways spokesman John Lampl said.

"Apparently they're doing some resurfacing work and relighting, so the lighting was poor. Just to err on the side of caution, the captain decided to stop at the end of the runway and called the tower," Lampl said.

The taxiway lighting met FAA standards, Brown said. She added that the FAA would look into the incident, but she did not know whether there would be a formal investigation.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Outspoken Former Guantanamo Detainee Believe Arrested By ISI. The AP (12/28, Jan) reports, "In his chronicle of life as an inmate at Guantanamo Bay, Afghan writer Abdul Rahim Muslim Dost describes his three years of humiliating detention for alleged ties to al-Qaida. Now, he has lost his liberty again — this time believed jailed by the Pakistani intelligence service for the book's fierce criticism of the agency's role in the U.S.-led war on terrorist groups." The AP notes, "There is no official word on Dost's whereabouts, although the rights group Amnesty International also thinks he is held by the government."

US, Philippines Analyzing DNA To Confirm Death Of Abu Sayyaf Leader. The AP (12/28, Alexander) reports, "Remains believed to be from the chief of the al-Qaida-linked Abu Sayyaf group, who was the target of a monthslong U.S.-backed manhunt, have been found in the southern Philippines, the military said Wednesday. Khaddafy Janjalani is on a U.S. list of wanted terrorists with a $5 million bounty on his head for a series of beheadings, bombings and mass abductions." Philippine Marines Lt. Col. Ariel Caculitan said that "Janjalani was believed to have been killed in a Sept. 4 clash with marines…but DNA tests would be needed for confirmation. … He added the U.S. was providing help in forensic tests." The AP notes, "Caculitan said former Abu Sayyaf members who had surrendered helped troops find the site and claimed Janjalani had been shot in the neck." AFP (12/28) reports Philippine General Hermogenes Esperon "told reporters in Manila the DNA would be checked against that of Khadaffy's older brother Hector Janjalani, now in jail in Manila. … Janjalani's death would be a severe blow to the Abu Sayyaf, a small gang of self-styled Islamic militants that once received funding from Osama bin Laden, he said."

Texas Attorney Glad Client Is Released From Guantanamo. The Austin American-Statesman (12/28, Lindell) reports, "The news arrived in cloak-and-dagger fashion, but for Austin lawyer Dicky Grigg, it was welcome nonetheless." The American-Statesman continues, "Mohammad Akhtiar, his Afghani client who was held as an enemy combatant for 3 1/2 years at the U.S. Naval Station at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, was back in his homeland and traveling toward a reunion with his wife and nine children. … 'One, I'm very pleased and excited that he's released and back to his family,' Grigg said. 'But then, you have to consider that 3 1/2 years were taken out of his life. I'm glad he's home, but it makes you frustrated.'" The American-Statesman adds, "Grigg was among a loose-knit group of lawyers who represented, at no charge, many of the imprisoned enemy combatants in the belief that detention without review by a civilian court violated a basic principle of the U.S. system of justice. … The 'Guantánamo Bar Association' clashed with the Bush administration over where to draw the line between combating terrorism and safeguarding constitutional rights — producing a U.S. Supreme Court ruling in June that allowed detainees to petition for writs of habeas corpus, which challenge the legality of detentions, in federal court. … The Republican-led Congress, saying classified information could be placed at risk in federal court proceedings, followed with legislation stripping federal courts of authority to hear cases from Guantánamo. Detainee cases instead will be heard by military commissions, where an officer acts as judge and at least three officers serve as jurors."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Houston Luggage Theft Probe Continues As FBI Rules Out Terrorism. The Houston Chronicle (12/28, Sallee, 530K) reports, "The 68 pieces of baggage that turned up in a trash bin Tuesday near George Bush Intercontinental Airport were probably stolen by a team of thieves in a single day's work while airline staffers were stretched thin by the demands of holiday travel, a Texas travel adviser theorized Wednesday. … Another possibility — an inside job, with somebody taking the luggage on its way from the airplanes to the baggage-claim area — was not something investigators would talk about. Meanwhile, it looked like business as usual at Bush on Wednesday." The Chronicle notes, "FBI spokesman Orlando Muñoz said there is no evidence that the incident exposed any national security or terrorism vulnerabilities." The AP (12/28) also briefly reports on the stolen luggage, in a widely-distributed story.

Corzine Said To Have Softened Stance On Chemical Security. The New York Times (12/28, Kocieniewski, 1.16M) reports though Jon S. Corzine the senator "was relentless in warning that the nation's chemical plants, and the railways that carry their potentially dangerous cargo, are vulnerable to a devastating terror attack," in his 11 months as New Jersey's governor, he "has taken a far more measured approach to the issue, disappointing some of the chemical security experts who helped him form his proposals in the Senate. … They accuse the governor of being too intent on appeasing the chemical industry, which provides more than 80,000 jobs in the state." However, "Governor Corzine and his staff say that they have quietly pressured companies and railroads to beef up plant security and switch to safer technology."

Judge Rules Against Privileges In 9/11-Related Insurance Case. The New York Law Journal (12/28, Bar) reports, "The insurance broker representing Century 21 Department Stores in its efforts to regain compensation for millions in damages it sustained to its lower Manhattan store following the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks has won a partial attempt to force the insurer overseeing the claim to produce documents it said were privileged." The Journal continues, "Southern District of New York Judge Robert W. Sweet, in OneBeacon Insurance Co. v. Forman International, 04 Civ. 2271, held that OneBeacon Insurance Co. and its attorneys at Cozen O'Connor failed to prove that the attorney-client or work product privileges should be applied in connection with the documents in dispute." The Journal adds, "Sweet also held that, because neither OneBeacon nor its counsel selectively withheld documents based on content, the fairness doctrine could not be applied to this case. … OneBeacon reached a settlement with Century 21 in March 2003 to pay the store $143 million to fully release claims. The insurer later asserted it overpaid the retailer by $52.4 million because Century 21's broker, Forman International, improperly agreed on the retailer's behalf to delete a standard business interruption provision in favor of the business interruption provision proposed by Century 21."

Judge Says He Will Not Allow FEMA To "Run The Clock Out" On Katrina Victims In Texas. In an article appearing on no fewer than 70 news websites, the AP (12/27, Apuzzo) reported FEMA sent letters to about 4,000 Hurricane Katrina victims in Texas last week, "explaining why they were deemed no longer eligible" for federal housing aid and giving them a chance to appeal the decision. "But the program is set to expire at the end of February and the appeal process can take up to three months. US District Judge Richard Leon, who has called the agency's housing program a 'legal disaster' said Wednesday that he wanted to speed up the appeals. 'This is not going to be a run-out-the-clock operation,' Leon said. 'I have no reason to believe FEMA wants that, but if this court gets the impression for one second that FEMA is trying to run the clock out, this court is not going to tolerate that.'"

WAR NEWS:

Bush To Meet With Top National Security Aides On Iraq. The Washington Post (12/28, A4, Abramowitz, White, 690K) reports President Bush's "top national security advisers arrived" at his ranch in Texas "to hone a new Iraq strategy that administration officials said seems increasingly likely to include a surge of additional troops to try to help stabilize the country." Although officials "have said no decisions will be made in the Crawford meeting, Bush seems to be laying the groundwork for one more sustained effort to defeat the Iraq insurgency and stabilize the country politically. Two defense officials said Wednesday that some sort of troop increase appears likely in an effort to contain the violence but that the specific size and nature of such a surge still has to be worked out." White House spokesman Scott Stanzel "took a swipe at Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), the incoming chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, for his comment Tuesday that ordering more troops to Iraq would do little to address the underlying political problems fostering violence." Stanzel said, "I would hope that Senator Biden would wait to hear what the president has to say before announcing what he's opposed to."

The Los Angeles Times (12/28, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports the White House "responded sharply today to a senior Democratic senator's criticism of possible increases in the U.S. military deployment in Iraq, ahead of President Bush's meeting on Thursday with senior national security advisors at his ranch." Deputy White House press secretary Scott Stanzel "took issue with Sen. Joseph R. Biden, Jr. (D-Del.), the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, who said on Tuesday that any troop increase would be 'the absolute wrong strategy.'" Stanzel said, "I hope that Sen. Biden would wait to hear what the president has to say before announcing what he's opposed to." The Times adds Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, Vice President Dick Cheney, Marine Corps

Iraq Study Group's Impact Assessed. The New York Times (12/28, Shane, 1.16M) reports that Washington's blue-ribbon panels have "a predictable life cycle, which the Iraq Study Group has so far followed to a fault." After "unrealistic expectations, fueled by feverish news coverage," comes "the report's grand unveiling, complete with White House photo op, this time featuring President Bush with the co-chairmen, James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton. And then, inevitably, the letdown." But "whether this group, too, ends up as a footnote to history, or becomes the framework for a new war policy, is unlikely to be settled until well into the new year." Former Sen. Warren Rudman said, "I don't think it's dead at all. Whether its recommendations will ultimately be followed is another question. But with the Democrats in charge of Congress, its findings will certainly get a hearing."

Special Forces Seen As Key To Win In Iraq. In a Washington Times (12/28, 88K) op-ed, Fred Gedrich and Paul E. Vallely say, "Most Americans desire an effective change in current Iraq war strategy and the wider global war against Islamic extremists and nations supporting them. President Bush and the new U.S. defense secretary, Robert Gates, could deliver it by placing experienced unconventional warfare leaders in charge of the war effort." To "prevail, the United States has to transition from a conventional to an unconventional war footing and make the enemy pay a heavy price for its despicable tactics. In Iraq and elsewhere, traditional troops, weapons and tactics are less useful than tools of influence, covert operations and intelligence brought to the battlefield by special operators working harmoniously with indigenous forces and local populations. The prime objective is to create a climate of fear within enemy ranks that breaks its will to continue the armed insurrection against the freely elected Iraqi government." Special Operations Forces "(Rangers, Seals, Delta Force and other special units) leaders and troops are uniquely qualified for this mission."

Gates Authorizes Dispatch Of Additional Army Brigade To Kuwait. The Washington Post (12/28, A24, White, Trejos, 690K) reports, "A brigade of U.S. Army troops is scheduled to deploy to Kuwait early next month to take over as the U.S. Central Command's theater reserve force, which means more than 3,000 additional U.S. troops will move into the region and could be used to support combat in Iraq, Pentagon officials announced yesterday." Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates "approved sending the 2nd Brigade, 82nd Airborne Division overseas after Gen. John P. Abizaid, who leads Central Command, requested the forces to replace the 15th Marine Expeditionary Unit, which was sent into the western province of Anbar this fall. Abizaid requested a brigade -- which is significantly larger than the Marine unit -- to allow for greater flexibility in the region."

Sadr Aide Killed In Raid By US, Iraqi Troops. The Washington Post (12/28, A1, Trejos, Raghavan, 690K) reports Sahib al-Amiri, "a top deputy of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr was killed Wednesday during a raid by U.S. and Iraqi troops in the southern holy city of Najaf, sparking protests from Sadr's followers and complicating an already tense relationship with the powerful anti-American leader." US military officials "declined to confirm that Amiri was a Sadr aide, saying only that he had provided explosives for use against Iraqi and American forces. Sadr officials said Amiri was an aide and a lawyer who ran an educational organization that helped orphans and impoverished children." The incident "comes at a delicate time for the Iraqi political process."

Iraqi Militias, Police Riven By Increasing Political Pressure. The New York Times (12/28, Santora, 1.16M) reports Maj. William Voorhies, the American commander of a military training unit in Baghdad, describes an "increasingly frustrating task — trying to build up Iraqi security forces who themselves are being used as proxies in a spreading sectarian war." Maj. Voorhies said, "I have come to the conclusion that this is no longer America's war in Iraq, but the Iraqi civil war where America is fighting." The Times adds Iraqi forces, "already struggling with corruption and infiltration, have shown little willingness to stand up to political pressure, especially when the Americans are not there to support them. That suggests, the commanders say, that if the Americans leave soon, violence will redouble."

In Letter, Saddam Calls On Iraqis To Unite. The New York Times (12/28, Santora, 1.16M) reports Saddam Hussein, whose execution is expected within 30 days, "said he was prepared to die and sure of his place in heaven as a martyr, and he called on Iraqis to unite, according to a letter that his lawyers said Wednesday had been composed by the former dictator." While "fears that the announcement upholding his death penalty on Tuesday would set off violence appeared not to be immediately borne out," officials were "still concerned about possible public reaction to the execution itself, and some speculated that the hanging would take place in secret and be announced only after the fact." In his "latest letter, Mr. Hussein displayed none of the bombast that had defined his court appearances."

The story was briefly covered by each of the networks last night, with ABC World News (12/27, story 5, 0:35, Gibson, 8.78M) reported the letter contained "unexpected words of restraint from Saddam Hussein who has been sentence in days to come to hanging. In a letter released by his defense team, Hussein writes – 'I call on you the people of Iraq not to hate because it makes you blind and closes all doors of thinking. I also call on you,' he wrote, 'not to hate the people of the other countries that attacked us.'"

The CBS Evening News (12/27, story 4, 1:15, Pinkston, 7.66M) reported, "A pro-Saddam Website threatened retaliation against the US, and carried a letter Saddam reportedly wrote that says, 'Here I offer myself in sacrifice,' and urged Iraqis to 'direct your enmity towards the invaders.' Defiant words from a former ruler who will soon hang like any other Iraqi criminal sentenced to death. The only question is when." NBC Nightly News (12/27, story 6, 0:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Saddam Hussein is urging Iraqis to see his execution as a sacrifice, and as a symbol of a continuing holy war." Saddam is "calling on the Iraqi people to unite and fight US led forces, which he says are trying to destroy that nation."

The Washington Post (12/28, A24, Raghavan, 690K) reports the letter "declared the former president to be victimized by foreign armies but ready to die and 'be with the merciful God.' The letter urged Iraqis not to hate the foreign peoples whose armies invaded the country, just their leaders." Published on "several Iraqi Web sites, the letter was written in ancient Arabic verse." In interviews, "two of Hussein's defense lawyers based in Amman, Jordan, said the letter was authentic and written by Hussein on Nov. 5. That was the day he was sentenced to death by hanging for the killings of 148 Shiite residents of the town of Dujail following an attempt on his life there in 1982."

The Washington Times/AP (12/28, Torchia) reports Hussein "urged Iraqis to embrace 'brotherly coexistence' and not to hate U.S.-led foreign troops in a goodbye letter posted on a Web site Wednesday, a day after Iraq's highest court upheld his death sentence and ordered him hanged within 30 days." Meanwhile, a top government official "said Saddam's execution could proceed without the approval of Iraq's president, meaning there were no more legal obstacles to sending the deposed dictator to the gallows." Against the "backdrop of sectarian killings that have dragged Sunni Arabs and Shiite Muslims into civil warfare over the past year, Saddam urged his countrymen to 'remember that God has enabled you to become an example of love, forgiveness and brotherly coexistence.'" But he "also voiced support for the Sunni Arab-dominated insurgency, saying: 'Long live jihad and the mujahedeen.'"

The Los Angeles Times (12/28, Zavis, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) reports Hussein "declared in a handwritten farewell letter published Wednesday that his execution for crimes against humanity would be a sacrifice for his people, and he urged Iraqis not to give in to hatred." The letter was "released as shootings and explosions rattled Baghdad for another day, and protesters took to the streets of the Shiite holy city of Najaf after an associate of a radical anti-American cleric was killed in a confrontation with Iraqi and foreign troops." Saddam said "he wrote the letter because he was not given a chance to make a final statement when his sentence was handed down."

Iraqis Have Varying Reaction To News Of Saddam Death Sentence. The Financial Times (12/28, Negus,) reports the "news of Saddam Hussein's imminent execution provoked widely differing reactions among Iraqis on Wednesday, with some welcoming the demise of their former persecutor and many afraid that it would cause further disruption to their lives, and others convinced that the president would strike a last-minute deal to avoid death." In Sadr City, "one resident said few of his neighbours actually believed that Mr Hussein would be executed."

Saddam Likely To Be Executed In Private. The Los Angeles Times (12/28, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) reports Saddam "will likely be executed soon at a private gathering of select witnesses, officials close to Iraq's Prime Minister Nouri Maliki said today." Hussein's victims, "particularly those from Dujail, are demanding a public hanging so they can see justice done. But government officials concerned about exacerbating sectarian tensions rejected the idea, said a cabinet member of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, adding the government will likely only release photographs of the hanging to the public."

Saddam's Baath Party Warns Of Retaliation. The International Herald Tribune/AP (12/28) reports Saddam Hussein's Baath Party "threatened Wednesday to retaliate if the ousted Iraqi leader is executed, warning in an Internet posting it would target U.S. interests anywhere." The statement "appeared on a Web site known to represent the Baath, which was disbanded after U.S.-led forces overthrew Saddam in 2003. The site is believed to be run from Yemen, where a number of exiled members of the party are based." The statement "said that if the execution takes place, it would be impossible for the Baath to take part in any prospective negotiations with U.S. and Iraqi officials to reduce the violence in Iraq."

LATimes Criticizes Saddam's Death Sentence. The Los Angeles Times (12/28, 850K) says in an editorial that Saddam's death sentence "and the trial that produced it can be described as very rough justice. By British and U.S. standards, there were lapses in the trial that convicted Hussein of ordering the murders of 148 residents of a Shiite village in 1982. It's also troubling that the Iraqi appeals court that ruled Tuesday that Hussein should be hanged within 30 days took only three weeks to rule on detailed arguments submitted by his lawyers." Assuming that Iraq's "president or vice president could commute Hussein's sentence — and the appeals court insists that its ruling can't be altered — the best argument for mercy is that it might appease Sunnis who regard Prime Minister Nouri Maliki as partial to his fellow Shiites."

Smith's "Stunning Break" With Bush On Iraq Analyzed. The New York Times (12/28, Risen, 1.16M) reports that Sen. Gordon Smith's December 7th speech on the Senate floor on the Iraq war "marked a stunning break with the president." Smith said, "I, for one, am at the end of my rope when it comes to supporting a policy that has our soldiers patrolling the same streets in the same way, being blown up by the same bombs day after day. That is absurd. It may even be criminal." The Times adds the "real impact of the address came not just from Mr. Smith's words, but from the way he delivered them. His somber cadence resonated in a way that made political Washington take notice, transforming him into one of the most talked-about Republicans heading into the new Congress." A White House official "quickly called Mr. Smith to discuss his speech, Mr. Smith said in an interview." Within "days of the Iraq speech, Mr. Smith emerged as a new spokesman for an endangered political species: the moderate Republican." Smith said he "decided not to speak out before the midterm elections, both out of political loyalty and a fear that his words would be drowned out by partisan attacks." Smith "faces re-election in 2008, and some Democrats in Oregon have suggested that his break with the White House was timed to aid his coming campaign, an accusation he adamantly denies."

British Commander Complains UK Troops Underfunded, Neglected. The New York Times (12/28, Cowell, 1.16M) reports the commander of Britain's "7,000 troops in southern Iraq has complained that they are operating in conditions that display 'a generation of underfunding and relative neglect' by successive governments back home." The remarks "by the commander, Maj. Gen. Richard Shirreff, echoed criticism by two other high-ranking officers in recent months, breaking with a tradition of public restraint by military commanders in expressing political views." General Shirreff said, "The nation needs to understand that the quality work done by these courageous men and women out here only happens and can only continue if our soldiers are properly supported back home in terms of the support for training, infrastructure, barracks, accommodation." General Shirreff "did not blame a specific government and directed some of his criticism at the broader relationship between civilians and the military."

US Interrogating Iranian Guards Captured In Baghdad. The CBS Evening News (12/27, story 5, 1:05, Martin, 7.66M) reported, "US intelligence is interrogating senior members of Iran's Revolutionary Guards captured last week inside Iraq. US officials say the two carried documents directly linking the Iranian government to attacks on American troops. According to these officials, the captured documents show Iran was providing weapons, including advanced explosive devices to one of Iraq's Shiite militias and helping them plan future operations in Baghdad. The two Iranians were captured in a compound belonging to the powerful Shiite leader Abdul Aziz al Hakim who earlier this month met with President Bush in Washington."

Marines Combat Snipers, IEDs Along Al Anbar Supply Route. The Los Angeles Times (12/28, Perry, 850K) reports on the heavy attacks Marines undergo on MSR Mobile, the road that "serves as a main link between several U.S. bases" in Iraq's Al Anbar province. "In the last two weeks, two Marines with Company B of the 2nd Assault Amphibian Battalion from Camp Lejeune, N.C., have fallen to snipers' bullets." The Times sees this road "as a microcosm of the Marine mission in Al Anbar: nothing likely to be made into a Hollywood war movie, just a 'persistent presence' to wear down the insurgency." The article notes a new strategy insurgents are using in which a fake roadside bomb is planted in hopes of attracting US bomb removal personnel, who then fall under sniper fire.

Pakistan Announces Plans For Border Fence To Hem In Taliban. The Christian Science Monitor (12/28, Montero, 59K) reports Pakistan has "announced a new solution to the problem" caused by Taliban militia "on its western frontier: mines and fences along the Afghan border, designed to keep militants from crossing in and out of the tribal zone." Western "capitals, newspapers, and military intelligence reports are increasingly voicing concern that the source of the Taliban's growing power rests in Pakistan and that Pakistan is not doing enough to quell it. This latest approach, beyond being quixotic, is also risky, analysts say: If the fence doesn't work, Pakistan may have exhausted all apparent options - and possibly its credibility, too."

Special Ops Soldiers Say Senior Taliban Leader Had Been Released In 2002. The Washington Times (12/28, Scarborough, 88K) reports Special Operations soldiers "say that if the command in Afghanistan had listened to them four years ago, there would have been no need this month for a U.S. air strike that killed senior Taliban leader Mullah Akhtar Mohammed Osmani. He already would have been locked up." As "reported in 2002 by The Washington Times, an Army Green Beret 'A Team' said it captured Osmani in a village near Kandahar, the Taliban's birthplace." Special Forces soldier said the US "prison at the Bagram military base north of Kabul later released Osmani, the Special Forces soldiers said. They suspect Osmani convinced his captors that he was not a Taliban leader but a poor villager. The soldiers said they heard later that he crossed into Pakistan and reorganized his forces." The Times adds the "Combined Forces Command in Kabul said that on Dec. 19 Osmani was identified, based on intelligence reports, as riding in a vehicle near the Pakistan border in a deserted area. An air strike killed him and two unidentified companions."

Air Force Considering Outside Management For Next Generation GPS System. The Wall Street Journal (12/28, Pasztor, 2.04M) reports the Air Force is "considering a potential new approach to managing multibillion-dollar space projects that could help it avoid the costly troubles that plagued previous efforts and lead to a lucrative new role for private-sector contractors." But the "new approach could present its own share of problems, including the potential for conflicts of interest." The Air Force is "considering hiring outside engineers or consultants to oversee systems integration of its next-generation navigational satellites, according to industry and government officials." Hiring a "separate project integrator could set a precedent for future projects and would be a tacit acknowledgment that both Air Force Space Command and the Pentagon's massive weapons-buying bureaucracy lack the necessary expertise to perform the required oversight role." The project "involves setting up a next-generation U.S. global positioning system, which is widely used by the military and supports consumer applications such as in-car driving directions." The preliminary specifications "for the system call for as many as two dozen satellites costing $100 million or more."

DOJ:

Connecticut US Attorney Named Gang-Violence Point-man At DOJ. The AP (12/28, Christoffersen) reports, "Connecticut's top federal prosecutor has been appointed to a national position focused on combatting violence amid signs that a three-year lull in crime is ending, officials said Wednesday." The AP continues, "U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor has been named associate deputy attorney general at the U.S. Justice Department, where he will lead a team focused on violent crime and initiatives to crack down on gangs and illegal guns. He also plans to remain U.S. attorney for Connecticut for at least six months. … 'I'm honored that they asked me to do it,' O'Connor said. 'To me this is a great opportunity to be involved on the national level on the same issues I've been involved in on a local level.'" The AP adds, "Preliminary FBI data released last week showed that murders and robberies continued to rise across the country during the first six months of 2006. Violent crime figures are on pace for a second straight annual increase. Violent crime rose 2.2 percent nationally last year - the first increase since 2001. .. .Authorities around the country also are worried about a resurgence in gangs. O'Connor held the state's first gang summit in September, and his office has been stepping up prosecutions." The AP notes, "O'Connor, who was appointed U.S. attorney in 2002 and starts his new position next week, also has been active in Project Safe Neighborhoods, which targets gun-carrying felons and has recovered about 4,000 guns over the past five years, he said. … His appointment comes nearly a year after Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced an expanded program to combat gang violence, including an infusion of federal funds for cities with gang problems. His plan also called for expanding Project Safe Neighborhoods to include more anti-gang efforts and a new national gang task force."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Apple Reportedly Falsified Files On Jobs' Stock Options. The Financial Times (12/28, Waters) reports, "Steve Jobs, chief executive of Apple Computer, was handed 7.5m stock options in 2001 without the required authorisation from the company's board of directors, according to people familiar with the matter." The Times continues, "Records that purported to show a full board meeting had taken place to approve Mr Jobs' remuneration, as required by Apple's procedures, were later falsified. These are now among the pieces of evidence being weighed by the Securities and Exchange Commission as it decides whether to pursue a case against the company or any individuals over the affair, according to these people." The Times adds, "News of the irregularities, which is expected to be revealed in a regulatory filing by Apple before the end of this week, will add to pressure that has been growing on one of Silicon Valley's most highly-regarded companies since the middle of 2005. … Apple is among more than 160 companies that have owned up to stock option backdating – handing options to executives and other employees at exercise prices that were set in hindsight at favourable levels – a scandal which has led to the departure of a number of chief executives." The times notes, "The latest revelation is likely to add to questions about Apple's disclosures about its internal investigation into the backdating issue. In October, the company largely exonerated Mr Jobs over the matter, saying that while he had been 'aware' of the backdating 'in a few instances', he 'did not receive or otherwise benefit from these grants and was unaware of the accounting implications'."

The AP (12/28, Wong) reports, "Wall Street ultimately shrugged off a report Wednesday that federal prosecutors are investigating whether former Apple Computer Inc. officials forged documents to maximize executives' profit from stock options. … The legal publication that detailed the federal probe also reported that CEO Steve Jobs has hired outside attorneys to represent him in the investigation." The AP continues, "Shares of the iPod and Macintosh computer maker went on a roller-coaster ride in trading Wednesday, falling almost 5 percent before rebounding to close up a penny at $81.52 on the Nasdaq. … In a morning note, UBS Investment Research analyst Ben Reitzes called investors' fears 'overblown.' … 'Investors seem to be reacting to the mention of Steve Jobs,' Reitzes said in his note. 'We believe it could make sense to obtain counsel, given his immense personal fortune and influence.'" The AP adds, "The Recorder, a San Francisco-based publication owned by American Lawyer Media, reported late Tuesday that federal prosecutors are looking into forged documents at Apple related to administering stock options. The report cited people with knowledge of the case who requested anonymity because the case is the subject of criminal and civil government investigations. … Apple spokesman Steve Dowling said the company is providing the Securities and Exchange Commission with the results of an internal investigation into its practices for granting stock options, but had no further comment Wednesday."

Market Watch (12/28) reports, "Apple had previously said that its own internal investigation found no misconduct by Jobs or other senior executives. The company did say that its probe had raised concerns about the actions of two unidentified former executives." Market Watch adds, "Further details about Apple's situation are expected to be unveiled Friday, when the company plans to file several quarterly reports and its annual report for the fiscal year ended Sept. 30. … Apple has delayed the filings amid an internal probe into the backdating of employee stock-option grants."

Bloomberg (12/28, King, Guglielmo) reports, "Apple is among the biggest names caught in a stock-option scandal that has widened to more than 190 companies. In June the maker of the iPod music player began an internal review of its grants, including one to Jobs. Apple said in October said it found 15 misdated grants from 1997 to 2002. … When Apple released the results of its three-month investigation in October, it didn't disclose any falsified documents. The company said it found backdated option awards on 15 occasions from 1997 to January 2002. While Jobs, 51, was aware of some instances, he didn't benefit, Apple said."

Nabors Industries To Relaunch Options Review. The Wall Street Journal (12/28, A3) reports, "Nabors Industries Ltd. said it is initiating a further review of its option-granting practices in light of 'issues raised' in an article published by The Wall Street Journal." The Journal continues, "The oil-and-gas driller said this review follows an internal review earlier this year of its stock-option practices going back to 1998. It said this initial review 'did not suggest that there was reason to question the propriety' of its option-granting practices. … The Journal article, published yesterday, said that Eugene Isenberg, the chief executive officer of Nabors, is among the highest-paid corporate executives in history, receiving more than $450 million in compensation over the past 19 years, largely due to stock-option grants whose value, the article contends, was enhanced by certain 'controversial moves' made by the company, which has U.S. headquarters in Houston but is registered in Bermuda." The Journal notes, "The moves cited by the Journal included allowing Mr. Isenberg to trade in certain worthless options for new ones with lower exercise prices and 'reloading' Mr. Isenberg with new options when he cashed in others. … In separate options-related news, HCC Insurance Holdings Inc. said it has completed an independent review of its stock-option-granting practice and recorded a gross noncash compensation expense of $26.6 million related to corrections of errors from 1997 to 2005."

France To Fine GLG, Deutsche Bank In Hedge Fund Case. The Wall Street Journal (12/28, C3, MacDonald) reports, "France's markets regulator will fine hedge fund GLG Partners LP and Deutsche Bank AG for abuses arising out of a convertible-bond offer for French telecommunications-equipment maker Alcatel SA, according to people familiar with the matter." The Journal continues, "The Autorité des Marchés Financiers, or AMF, is following the recommendations of a preliminary report it received in October that was compiled by one of its officials. … The AMF has decided to increase the fine levied on London-based GLG to €1.2 million ($1.6 million) from €1 million recommended in the report and reduce Deutsche Bank's fine to about €300,000 from €1.5 million, these people said." The Journal adds, "Alcatel SA, now Alcatel-Lucent, announced Dec. 12, 2002, that it would offer between $640 million and $835 million in bonds that would convert into shares. .. .The AMF was investigating whether hedge funds acted on information offered by Deutsche Bank before the bonds' issuance was publicly announced. .. While it is common practice by banks to preview deals to select clients ahead of their announcement, it is against market regulations in Europe to act on that information."

Former KLA-Tencor Chairman Resigns From Board. Bloomberg (12/28, King) reports, "Former KLA-Tencor Corp. Chairman Jon Tompkins resigned from the board, making him the fourth senior official to sever ties with the company since it discovered problems related to the backdating of stock option grants." Bloomberg continues, "Tompkins resigned on Dec. 21, San Jose, California-based KLA-Tencor said in a U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission filing today. Tompkins, who is also chairman of Electro Scientific Industries Inc., quit for personal reasons, KLA-Tencor spokeswoman Kyra Whitten said. She declined to comment further." Bloomberg adds, "Tompkins served as chief executive officer from May 1997 until July 1998, then as chairman until June 1999. The company said in September it would restate results from 1997 to 2002 after a special committee found incorrect dates were used in granting stock options to executives. … KLA-Tencor, the second-largest U.S. chip-equipment maker, said on Oct. 16 it found $400 million in costs related to backdated stock options and canceled grants to another former CEO, Kenneth Schroeder. … General Counsel Stuart J. Nichols resigned that day and KLA-Tencor said it terminated 'all aspects of its employment relationship' with Schroeder, who ran the company from 1999 to 2005, succeeding Tompkins. A day later, Chairman Kenneth Levy retired. The company said it would reprice options held by Levy and other executives. … KLA-Tencor is among more than 190 companies to disclose internal or federal investigations of stock-option practices to determine if grant dates were manipulated to enrich employees. The SEC, the Justice Department and Internal Revenue Service are looking for evidence that companies broke securities or tax laws by backdating grants to coincide with days when share prices were low."

Frank Criticizes New SEC Executive Pay Rules. The Wall Street Journal (12/28, A2, Hughes, 2.04M) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission's decision to reverse course and relax disclosure rules on executive pay isn't sitting well with the Democrat who will head the House Financial Services Committee in the new Congress." Rep. Barney Frank "said he is 'very disappointed with both the substance and the procedure' involved in the rule changes, which the SEC announced late Friday, just before the long Christmas weekend." The rules, "which apply to publicly held companies, would reduce the amount of top executives' compensation that many companies would be required to disclose next year." Frank's committee "has oversight of the SEC, and he could hold hearings on the executive-pay rules. He has already said he would push for legislation to allow shareholders to vote on executive compensation."

USA Today (12/28, 6B, 2.27M) quotes Frank saying, "Backtracking by the SEC on this important matter of stock options reinforces my determination that Congress must act to deal with the problem of executive compensation that is now unconstrained by anything except the self-restraint of top executives." The Washington Post (12/28, D1, Hilzenrath, 690K) runs a similar story headlined "New SEC Pay Rule To Benefit Executives," in which it mentions Frank's criticism and says "the SEC action reflects the confusion and criticism that surround stock options, which have created great wealth for many executives and have been criticized as contributing to some of the worst corporate scandals. In recent months, many companies have been examining whether option grants were improperly backdated to maximize their value to executives, and some corporate chiefs have lost their jobs."

Editorial Criticizes DOJ's "Thompson Memo" Tactics. The Harrisburg Patriot-News (PA) (12/28) editorializes, "Reacting to pressure by Arlen Specter and others on the 'Thompson Memorandum,' the Justice Department has proposed guidelines on what critics contend have been coercive and unconstitutional tactics used in investigations of corporations. … But the new guidelines still fall short of adequately protecting constitutional rights of employees. Specter and his allies, who include former Pennsylvania governor and U.S. Attorney General Dick Thornburgh and incoming Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., should continue pushing." The Patriot-News continues, "A memorandum issued in 2003 by then Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson issued a number of factors prosecutors should consider in deciding whether to bring criminal charges against a company. One of them took heavily into account the degree of a company's cooperation with investigators. … As a result, critics contend companies have gone too far and pressured employees to do such things as waive attorney-client privileges and other protections. While this may aid the company, it can expose individuals." The Patriot-News adds, "Specter has said he will re-introduce legislation in the next Congress that would prohibit the Justice Department from pressuring corporations to waive their rights to preserve conversations and other information shared with lawyers as confidential; allow corporations to continue paying employees' lawyers fees without threat of retribution from prosecutors; and bar the department from considering how cooperative a corporation has been in determining whether to file charges. … The Thompson Memorandum remains in effect, but investigators must show a 'legitimate need' to obtain privileged information and must obtain written approve from a deputy attorney general before pursuing them. … This is unsatisfactory in that we are talking about constitutional rights still being left to the discretion of too few in the Justice Department."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Probing Alleged Fraud In Detroit City Lease. The Detroit News (12/28, Egan) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department is investigating possible fraud in a building lease held by Detroit's Employment and Training Department after an audit identified $1.5 million in apparent overcharges, sources familiar with the investigation said." The News continues, "The Detroit City Council allocated $5.3 million at the end of 1999 to cover five years of lease payments on the building at 1300 Rosa Parks, but city payments totaled $10.7 million after 39 months, the audit said. … The building is owned by Hampton Ridge Properties LLC, which is controlled by Grosse Pointe Farms businessman Cullan Meathe, a major donor to several Detroit politicians and co-owner of Metro Cars Inc." The News adds, "Detroit lawyer Steve Fishman, who represents Meathe, said the case is essentially a landlord-tenant dispute. 'My understanding is that most, if not all, of the money in dispute has been paid back to the city,' Fishman said. … The city-commissioned audit, by the Whall Group of Auburn Hills, found in 2003 that Hampton Ridge charged the city for insurance and other expenses the company was supposed to pay; charged the property taxes for other buildings or for taxes it never paid; and submitted duplicate invoices for security, taxes, insurance and other expenses." The News notes, "Federal investigators also are reviewing allegations that a subcontractor supplied Hampton Ridge Properties two sets of invoices -- a lower one to be paid by Hampton Ridge and a higher one to be submitted to the city for reimbursement, sources familiar with the investigation said. … The inquiry is one of several investigations at Detroit City Hall that have led to the indictment of two former City Council members and scrutiny of city contracts at Cobo Center and elsewhere. Justice Department officials refused to confirm or deny the lease investigation."

Murders Up In Many US Cities. The AP (12/28, Matthews) reports, "After many years of decline, the number of murders climbed this year in New York and many other major U.S. cities, reaching their highest levels in a decade in some places." The AP continues, "Among the reasons given: gangs, drugs, the easy availability of illegal guns, a disturbing tendency among young people to pull guns when they do not get the respect they demand, and, in Houston at least, an influx of Hurricane Katrina evacuees." The AP adds, "In New York, where the city reported 579 homicides through Dec. 24 - a nearly 10 percent increase from the year before - the spike is mostly the result of an unusually large number of 'reclassified homicides,' or those involving victims who were shot or stabbed years ago but did not die until this year. Thirty-five such deaths have been added to this year's toll, compared with an annual average of about a dozen. … At the same time, Police Department spokesman Paul Browne noted that this year's total is only slightly higher than last year's 539 homicides - the city's lowest death toll in more than 40 years." The AP notes, 'Browne blamed the rise in part on the availability of guns, particularly weapons from out of state. The city this year sued dozens of out-of-state gun shops that it says are responsible for many of the illegal weapons on the streets of New York. … In Chicago, homicides through the first 11 months of the year were up 3.3 percent compared with the same period in 2005, reversing a four-year decline. A police spokeswoman said gang violence has been a contributing factor."

Ryan Sues To Force Payment Of State Pension. The Chicago Tribune (12/28, Higgins, 617K) reports, "Former Gov. George Ryan filed a lawsuit Wednesday against state retirement officials, battling to keep a pension of more than $60,000 a year that Ryan says he earned before the scandals that led to his wide-ranging fraud convictions in April." The General Assembly Retirement System board "voted unanimously last month to cancel Ryan's entire $197,000-a-year pension in light of the convictions. But that decision was 'erroneous,' Ryan's lawyers argued in the lawsuit filed in Cook County Circuit Court. They contend that Ryan's racketeering and fraud convictions dealt only with his actions as secretary of state and governor — not his 24 previous years in public office." The Tribune notes, "According to the retirement board, public officials who commit felonies relating to their "official duties" forfeit the right to receive any pension from the state."

Texas Couple Victims Of $2 Million Mortgage Fraud. WFAA-TV Dallas (12/27, Harris) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "Misfortune is not the only reason 3500 homes are posted for foreclosure next month in North Texas. The FBI says mortgage fraud has reached epidemic proportions. One couple, who found they were major property owners in North Texas without ever signing any papers, has felt the epidemic first-hand." Paul and Jackie Dyl "were victims of identity theft and mortgage fraud to the tune of more than $2 million. The checks and balances that might be expected to be in place when getting a mortgage failed, six times. … The Dyls contacted the FBI but nothing has happened. They ultimately took their case to the Cheyenne Wyoming Police Department, which took their complaint."

Credit Agencies Said To Take Only "Ineffectual" Action Against Fraud. The Boston Globe (12/28, Healy, 413K) reported on "the glacial and ineffectual response of the three giant keepers of consumer credit records -- Experian, Equifax, and TransUnion -- to any errors in their files, even those that appear to result from fraud. Until the errors are corrected, debt collectors will try again and again to squeeze out a payment. … The local, state, and federal law enforcement response to complaints of identity fraud is similarly passive, despite the huge volume of complaints -- 255,000 last year to the Federal Trade Commission alone. Consumers are left to fend for themselves -- a recipe for frustration and worse." The Globe notes that Boston resident Susan Litchfield was a victim of credit card fraud and "wrote to the three companies, telling them of the apparent fraud, to no avail. She said she filed a complaint with the FTC, and she called the FBI and US Secret Service," but she is yet to undo the damage to her credit.

Mississippi Women Ordered To Pay Restitution For Katrina Relief Fraud. The Scott County (MS) Times (12/27, Phillips) reported, "A federal court has ordered two Morton women to pay restitution fines and conduct community service for their part in a scam to secure FEMA funds following Hurricane Katrina. One of the women will also serve time in prison, the office of United States Attorney Dunn Lampton announced earlier this month. Stephanie Fontan was sentenced to serve eight months in prison and to pay restitution to FEMA in the amount of $6,000. Glenda Spangler was ordered to pay $4,358 in restitution to FEMA. In addition, both women were ordered to conduct 40 hours of community service."

Former Us Weekly Columnist Convicted Of Child Enticement. The AP (12/28) reports, "Former Us Weekly gossip columnist Timothy McDarrah has been found guilty of charges related to soliciting sex with a minor. McDarrah, a former reporter at the Las Vegas Sun, was arrested last year in New York after soliciting sex from an undercover federal agent posing as a 13-year-old girl." The AP notes, "McDarrah, 44, responded in June 2005 to a posting on the craigslist.com Web site offering introductions to the "freshest, youngest" girls in New York, an FBI affidavit said. The gossip writer told an undercover FBI agent, who had posted the advertisement to lure pedophiles, that he would pay $200 for sex with a 13-year-old girl, the affidavit said."

Kansas Judge Won't Reinstate Charges Against Abortion Doctor. The Washington Post/AP (12/28, A18, Hanna) reports, "A judge refused Wednesday to reinstate criminal charges against a Wichita abortion doctor, only hours after the outgoing attorney general named a special prosecutor to handle the case. Last week, state Attorney General Phill Kline, a vocal abortion opponent, filed 30 charges against George Tiller, accusing him of performing 15 illegal late-term abortions in 2003 on patients ages 10 to 22 and not properly reporting details to the state." Sedgwick County Judge Paul W. Clark "dismissed the charges on jurisdictional grounds later the same day. Kline this week asked Clark to reinstate the charges, but the judge rejected that request during a hearing Wednesday." The Los Angeles Times (12/28, Simon, 850K) also reports the story.

Gibbons Won't Face Prosecution. The AP (12/28, Hennessey) reports, "Nevada Gov.-elect Jim Gibbons will not be prosecuted on allegations that he assaulted a cocktail waitress in a parking garage three weeks before the election, authorities said Wednesday. There was insufficient evidence to prove criminal charges against Gibbons beyond a reasonable doubt, Clark County District Attorney David Roger said." Said Roger, "You may consider the case against Gov.-elect Jim Gibbons closed."

Fairfax Police Eye Links Between Assault, Slayings. The Washington Times (12/28, Wagner) reports, "Fairfax County police are trying to determine whether the assault on a Springfield woman alone in her home on Christmas Eve is related to the unsolved killings of two women nearby." The Times continues, ""There's certainly a possibility of a linkage in the other cases," said Fairfax County police spokeswoman Officer Camille Neville, 'but there's nothing at this time to confirm it.' … Police said a man forced his way into a house near Frontier Drive on Sunday between 8 and 9:40 p.m. and assaulted a 62-year-old woman. Police have not disclosed the location of the house. … The woman, who was found by a relative, was hospitalized with a puncture wound to her arm and other injuries that were not life-threatening. Investigators interviewed the woman at Inova Fairfax Hospital. She described her attacker only as a man wearing white or gray clothing." The Times adds, "The assault occurred about a mile from houses where two women were killed in recent months. … Marion Newman, 74, was found dead inside her home in the 7100 block of Reservoir Road about 11:15 a.m. Nov. 21. A friend said she had missed a dinner appointment a day earlier. … Police found signs of a struggle but no forced entry. … At about 6:10 p.m. on Aug. 14, a friend found Marion Barbara Marshall, 72, slain inside her home two miles away in the 6600 block of Bostwick Drive. .. .Both women had been beaten to death."

Inmate Suicides Linked To Solitary Confinement. USA Today (12/28, 1A, Johnson) reports, "The number of suicides in the nation's two largest state prison systems is ticking upward, and authorities in California and Texas are linking the increase to the rising number of inmates kept in solitary confinement." USA continues, "In California, which has the largest state prison system with about 170,000 inmates, there have been 41 suicides this year, the most in at least six years and a 17% increase from 2005. Although an estimated 5% of California's inmates are housed in solitary confinement — also known as "administrative segregation" — 69% of last year's suicides occurred in units where inmates are isolated for 23 hours a day, according to state Department of Corrections records. About half the suicides this year were in such units." USA adds, "In Texas' prison system, which has 169,000 inmates, there have been 24 suicides this year, up from 22 in 2005. Most of the inmates who killed themselves were in some form of solitary confinement, says John Moriarty, inspector general for the prison system. .. .Texas prisons also are reporting a 17% increase in attempted suicides: 652 so far this year, compared with 559 in 2005. The number of attempted suicides this year is the most in nearly a decade, according to state prison records. Statistics on attempted suicides in California prisons were not immediately available." USA notes, "The figures from California and Texas are fueling a debate over whether solitary confinement is the best way to control or punish violent or dangerous inmates, particularly those who are mentally ill. .. .More than 70,000 of the 1.5 million inmates in state and federal prisons are kept in isolation, a reflection of get-tough policies designed to separate rival gang members and those who have gotten into fights while behind bars."

DC Police Chief Stepping Down Amid Praise, Criticism. The Washington Post (12/28, A1, Klein, Thompson) reports, "Charles H. Ramsey arrived in spring 1998 as the District's newly minted police chief with a mandate to cut spiraling crime, build stronger relations with the community and reform a department tainted by scandal." The Post continues, "Under his watch, crime has dropped, standards have become tighter and the public has received access to more public safety information than ever, due in part to a Web site that charts robberies, burglaries and other offenses by the block." The Post adds, "Ramsey, a career cop who got as much attention for his personality as his policies, leaves office today as the city's longest-serving chief in more than three decades. As a master of the sound bite, he often spouted off about crimes and railed about topics that were beyond his control, including irresponsible parents and failing schools. .. .His critics -- in the police union, on the D.C. Council and in some crime-ravaged neighborhoods -- view him as a showboat. In many parts of the city, residents say that they don't see enough officers on patrol and that crimes are not investigated quickly or thoroughly. Inside the agency, morale is low, with officers saying that Ramsey overworked them by declaring crime emergencies that took away days off and lasted for months. … But Michael A. Mason, executive assistant director of the FBI, said public relations is a 'huge part' of the job. 'What police do is the embodiment of public relations,' said Mason, who once headed the FBI's Washington Field Office."

The Washington Times (12/28, Cella) reports, "Chief Charles H. Ramsey says that he will leave the Metropolitan Police Department next week after eight years and eight months on the job confident that he has done what he was hired to do. … 'When other agencies look at the Metropolitan Police Department, it's a respected organization,' he said. 'That's what I'm most proud of.'" The Times continues, 'Chief Ramsey, 56, will step down Tuesday, the day Adrian M. Fenty is sworn in as mayor. … The District's only police chief to be hired from outside the city, Chief Ramsey reflected on his accomplishments during an interview last week in his office, which by then had been stripped of the mementos accumulated during a 38-year career in law enforcement." The Times adds, "Upon his arrival in 1998, the Metropolitan Police Department was mired in mismanagement and scandal. Top officials were under criminal investigation, poor recruiting and standards gave rise to second-rate officers, technology and information systems were substandard, facilities were crumbling, and officers were driving around in 10-year-old squad cars with used tires bought from the U.S. Park Police. … Chief Ramsey helped secure $100 million in federal funding to rebuild the department's infrastructure. He upgraded radios, started a mounted unit, equipped a bicycle unit, instituted uniform training standards, and restarted an aviation unit that had been shut down in 1996 and had its helicopters sold because of a budget shortfall."

CIVIL LAW:

Judge Vacates $6.5 Million Wrongful Prosecution Jury Award. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/28) reports, "A federal judge has thrown out a jury award of more than $6.5 million to a former policeman" in Chicago "who claimed two FBI agents framed him for murder and kidnapping. Steven Manning spent 14 years in prison - eight on death row - before the charges were dropped," and Manning claimed in his lawsuit that FBI Special Agents Robert Buchan and Gary Miller "framed him for the crimes after he tried to stop working as an FBI informant." However, "Manning has lost a separate civil lawsuit he had filed against the federal government on the same allegations," and yesterday, "U.S. District Judge Matthew Kennelly cited Manning's failure to win that second lawsuit as the reason for vacating the jury's award for damages." The AP notes, "Miller has retired from the FBI. Buchan was still working for the bureau."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Gonzales Considers Probe Of Duke Lacrosse Prosecution. WSOC-TV, Charlotte, NC (12/27, 5:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "Meanwhile US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales already said he's thinking about opening an investigation into Nifong's handling of the Duke Lacrosse rape case."

WGHP-TV, Greensboro, Winston, Salem, High Point, NC (12/27, 8:00 a.m.) broadcasted, "Defense attorneys are pushing for Federal involvement in the case asking Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to start a civil rights investigation."

FBI, Mississippi Authorities Investigating Alleged Prisoner Abuse. The AP (12/28) reports, "The FBI and the Mississippi Bureau of Investigation are looking into allegations of prisoner abuse in the Pearl River County jail. At least six inmates filed statements with Hancock County judges and as many as 10 or 11 told of beatings while making court appearances. They said they were beaten by jailers, attacked by other prisoners as corrections officers stood by, and they received slow medical treatment, among other complaints, a pair of Hancock County judges said." The AP notes, "Pearl River County Sheriff Joe Stuart confirmed the reports of abuse and the investigation. … In addition to the claims by prisoners, Stuart said residents of both counties have come to him with complaints, which he forwarded to the FBI to avoid the appearance of a conflict of interest. 'I have no problems with being investigated,' Stuart said."

Civilian Review Of Atlanta-Area Police Deaths Sought. The AP (12/28, Weber) reports, "Community activists on Wednesday called for the creation of civilian review boards to investigate police misconduct complaints, citing the fatal shooting of an elderly woman by Atlanta police and the killings of 12 other people by suburban DeKalb County officers this year. … 'The police, no matter how difficult their job, are not exempt from community scrutiny,' said the Rev. Joseph Lowery, co-founder of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference and chairman of the Coalition for The People's Agenda." The AP continues, "Lowery was joined by close to a dozen other activists. He said that the civilian review boards should have subpoena power and that Atlanta Mayor Shirley Franklin had told him she was not opposed to the idea." The AP adds, "DeKalb County Chief Executive Vernon Jones said he would take Lowery's suggestion under advisement. … The district attorney's office is already investigating the 12 lethal shootings by the DeKalb County Police Department. In addition, the Justice Department is 'gathering information' about the shootings, according to a letter from the agency to a community activist. … The call for the review boards comes in the wake of the Nov. 21 fatal shooting of Kathryn Johnston by Atlanta police during a raid in search of a drug suspect. Police say Johnston fired at them first, wounding three officers, and they shot back. Family members said Johnston was 92; a medical examiner said she was 88. … Johnston's death is being investigated by local agencies and the FBI."

The Los Angeles Times (12/28, Jarvie) reports, "A civilian review board, Lowery said, was vital in restoring trust in local law enforcement. … Atlanta already has a Civilian Review Board that examines allegations of excessive force, serious bodily injury or death resulting from the action of police officers. But the board, formed in 1996, has not reviewed a case since 2002. It has no subpoena power and requires citizens to file a complaint and waive their right to sue." The Times adds, "A number local and federal organizations are examining the recent shootings. In Atlanta, the FBI is already investigating the shooting of Johnston. In DeKalb, the district attorney's office is investigating the 12 lethal shootings by police officers. .. The Justice Department, along with the FBI, is also gathering information about the case, but has yet to open a federal investigation. According to the National Assn. for Civilian Oversight of Law Enforcement, 71 of the nation's 100 largest cities have citizen review mechanisms."

Massachusetts Court Will Not Force Gay Marriage Vote. The AP (12/28, Lindsay) reports, "Massachusetts' highest court said Wednesday it has no authority to force lawmakers to vote on a proposed constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage. But it rebuked the Legislature for its 'indifference to, or defiance of, its constitutional duties.'" The AP continues, "The unanimous 7-0 ruling - and the stinging reproach - leave the fate of the amendment up in the air in the only state that allows gay marriage." The AP adds, "Opponents of gay marriage have collected 170,000 signatures in favor of an amendment to end the practice. But the measure needs the Legislature's approval to appear on the 2008 ballot, and lawmakers refused to vote on the proposal last month. Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican expected to run for president in 2008, and other opponents of gay marriage responded by suing to try to force the lawmakers to act. … In its ruling, the Supreme Judicial Court - the same court that ruled in 2003 that the Massachusetts Constitution gives gays the right to marry - said it cannot force a vote. It said that the Legislature's obligation to vote was 'beyond serious debate,' but that the most the court could do was remind lawmakers of that duty. … The proposed amendment needs the approval of lawmakers in two consecutive two-year sessions to appear on the 2008 ballot. The last day of the current session is Tuesday. If lawmakers adjourn without taking up the amendment, the measure will die."

The Los Angeles Times (12/28, Barry, 850K) reports, "If the lawmakers adjourn Jan. 2 without a vote, as many predict they will, the measure to repeal gay marriage in Massachusetts will die. To appear on the ballot, a citizen initiative must be approved by at least a quarter of the legislature in two consecutive sessions." Romney "has been critical of the lawmakers' inaction. Romney was a lead plaintiff in the suit brought by opponents of gay marriage, which argued that lawmakers were stripping voters of their right to amend the state constitution."

Deputy In Mel Gibson Arrest Claims Harassment. The Los Angeles Times (12/28, Blankstein) reports, "Six months after he arrested Mel Gibson for drunk driving in Malibu, a Los Angeles County Sheriff's deputy claims he's being harassed for his action by officials who question whether he leaked a report detailing the actor's anti-Semitic rant to the news media." The Times continues, "Deputy James Mee's attorney said Wednesday his client was abruptly transferred from patrolling Malibu to another assignment in Agoura Hills and unfairly singled out for scrutiny by his supervisors. … Attorney Richard Shinee also said sheriff's officials subjected him to a three-hour-long interrogation and served a search warrant on his home last September, taking a home computer and phone records. … 'His life and career would be a lot different had he not made that arrest,' Shinee told The Times." The Times adds, "The Sheriff's Department has already come under fire for initially telling reporters that Gibson was arrested 'without incident' even though Mee's arrest report said the actor/director was belligerent, profane and unleashed a 'barrage of anti-Semitic remarks.' … Mee's report was leaked to TMZ.com, a celebrity news website." The Times notes, "Neal Tyler, the division chief who oversees the Sheriff's Department's Lost Hills station, where Gibson was booked, said he knew of no problems with Mee's treatment and said the deputy is in no way being singled out. … 'I disagree with the assessment that personnel in the department or at the station have been relating to him or supervising him in an unfair manner,' Tyler said."

ANTITRUST:

New Jersey Orders Muni Firms To Disclose Subpoenas. Bloomberg (12/28, Cataldo) reports, "New Jersey is demanding that financial firms seeking state business disclose whether they have been subpoenaed or audited by the government." Bloomberg continues, "Treasury officials told firms applying to work for the state by investing proceeds from a planned bond sale to describe pending litigation and 'federal or state investigations or audits, subpoenas or other information requests' since 2002, according to a Dec. 18 request for proposals. Similar documents in September and November didn't mention subpoenas or audits." Bloomberg adds, "The requirement comes one month after federal investigators raided three brokers in the widest-ever criminal probe of the municipal bond market. The Justice Department, the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Internal Revenue Service are probing whether bankers and brokers conspired to fix prices on financial products sold to local governments when they invested proceeds from bond sales. … Investigators last month demanded information from more than a dozen banks and insurers and raided the brokers as part of the probe, including CDR Financial Products Inc., New Jersey's adviser on interest-rate swaps. Earlier this month, the SEC asked officials in Jefferson County, Alabama, for records related to bond issues and derivatives since January 2002."

FTC Gives Antitrust Nod To Freeport Takeover Of Phelps Dodge. The AP (12/27) reports, "The Federal Trade Commission approved the $25.9 billion takeover of copper miner Phelps Dodge Corp. by Freeport-McMoran Copper & Gold, according to a notice posted Tuesday on the agency's Web site." The AP continues, "FTC clearance removes at least one obstacle to the proposed combination, which would create the world's largest copper miner. The deal still needs shareholder approval, and there is no certainty the companies will get it." The AP adds, "Earlier this month, a hedge fund with a 5.1 percent stake in Phelps Dodge said it would throw the weight of its 10.3 million shares against the takeover. SAC Capital Partners opposes the combination, saying that the cash-and-stock offer doesn't fairly value Phelps Dodge. … The FTC granted early termination of a mandatory antitrust waiting period on Dec. 22."

401(k) Industry Under Scrutiny For Alleged Collusion. In a column for the Wall Street Journal (12/28, C1), Tom Lauricella writes, "Americans' 401(k) retirement plans are starting to face scrutiny -- of a kind that previously helped to reshape the mutual-fund business and many practices on Wall Street." Lauricella continues, "In recent months, a series of lawsuits has raised questions that longstanding business practices in the industry may represent illegal forms of collusion. In the past few weeks, Congressional Democrats -- after winning the majority in November for the first time in years -- are calling for hearings into whether current laws do enough to protect 401(k) investors. A November report by the Congressional Government Accountability Office said some practices 'may not be in the best interest' of investors." Lauricella adds, "At the same time, the summer's landmark pension-reform law is encouraging employers to take a more active and even paternal role in their employees' 401(k) plans by offering in-depth investment advice and other tools designed to encourage people to save. Previously, companies were discouraged from taking these steps for fear of being sued should the investments go wrong. … As a result of these forces, 401(k) plans could receive their most significant overhaul since coming into existence a quarter-century ago. Fees to investors could be reduced, and companies could be forced to do a better job ensuring investors receive the most bang for their retirement dollar." Lauricella notes, "Since being created in 1981 as a way to sock away dollars tax-free for retirement, 401(k)s have supplanted traditional pension funds as the primary way most Americans save for retirement. Some 47 million participants have $2 trillion in money invested in the plans. … Critics increasingly are complaining about poorly disclosed financial arrangements -- known as 'pay-to-play' deals -- that not only have the potential to influence which investment options are offered in a given plan, but also have the potential to drive up fees charged to investors. … The pressure for change is occurring at every level of a complex industry: Employers have a legal obligation to run a plan in the best interest of its participants. The money manager has responsibility for the investments, but other companies might have a separate role in keeping investor records and holding the actual securities being bought and sold in the plan. On top of that, sometimes there are outside brokers or consultants paid to help decide which investments go into a plan."

Italy's Antitrust Regulators Orders Energy Competition Measures. The AP (12/28) reports, "Italy's antitrust watchdog said Wednesday that Enel SpA must sell 1,000 megawatts of capacity next year, and if necessary 700 more megawatts in 2008 to promote competition in the country's power market." The AP continues, "The regulator said in a statement that the sale will be at 'competitive conditions,' at which point the antitrust body will close its inquiry, started in April 2005, into possible anticompetitive behavior by Enel, Italy's former electricity monopoly. … The regulator said Enel will sell the capacity under a mechanism that allows a company to keep ownership of generation facilities while selling its output to competitors."

Administration Says Global Warming May Be A Threat To Polar Bears. ABC World News (12/27, story 6, 2:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In Washington, a victory for environmentalists and a stunning about-face by the Bush Administration. It is proposing that polar bears should be listed as a threatened species because the animals' habitat is disappearing fast. That acknowledgement that their habitat is disappearing is seen as a tacit recognition of global warming." ABC (Blakemore) added, "Today, the Bush Administration admitted that all this, disappearing in the heat of global warming, could take one of earth's most powerful creatures with it. The problem is, polar bears must have the vast, frozen Arctic Sea as a platform to hunt for sales. And that sea ice is disappearing so fast scientists calculate it could all be gone in less than 40 years. In a teleconference today, government officials explained why they are seeking to protect polar bears under the Endangered Species Act."

NBC Nightly News (12/27, story 7, 1:20, Williams, 9.87M) also reported, "The Bush Administration acknowledged that global warming is melting the polar ice cap and may be threatening the very existence of the polar bear." And the CBS Evening News (12/27, story 6, 1:05, Assura, 7.66M) said "the designation" of polar bears and endangered "would ensure Arctic operations like oil exploration or commercial shipping would not jeopardize the bears or their habitat. Environmentalists hope the designation will push the government to cut back on greenhouse gases that they claim contribute to global warming."

USA Today (12/28, Davis, 2.27M) reports Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne "says polar bears appear to be dying because their habitat -- ice in the Arctic Ocean -- is melting. 'Polar bears are one of nature's ultimate survivors,' Kempthorne says. But their 'habitat may literally be melting.'" The Endangered Species Act "puts the responsibility on the federal government to avoid authorizing any activities that might jeopardize an endangered species or the habitat where it lives." The Wall Street Journal (12/28, Randall, 2.04M), New York Times (12/28, Barringer, Revkin, 1.16M), Washington Times/AP (12/28) and Financial Times (12/28, Kirchgaessner), among other newspapers, also reports the story.

Energy Conservation Programs Make Comeback Amid Global Warming Fears. USA Today (12/28, 1B, Davidson, 2.27M) reports that "power companies these days are increasingly being told by regulators to pump hundreds of millions of dollars into selling less electricity. Energy-efficiency programs, which first caught fire in the 1970s before fading in recent years, are making a big comeback spurred by global-warming fears and the public's aversion to more pollution-belching power plants." Conservation "has shifted into high gear with global-warming fears and the federal Energy Policy Act of 2005. The legislation provides tax credits of up to $2,000 per home to builders of new homes that exceed international energy-saving standards by at least 50% and up to $500 to improve efficiency on existing homes." USA Today adds, "The Natural Resources Defense Council sued the Energy Department for failing to update energy-efficiency standards for 22 appliances ... . Under a recent settlement, standards will be set over the next four years. Energy Department spokesman Craig Stevens says clearing the backlog has been a priority for Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman."

Democrats Pledge To Reinvigorate Superfund Program. The Christian Science Monitor (12/28, Clayton, 59K) reports that although "1 in 4 Americans lives within four miles of a designated toxic-waste site, the federal program to clean up the sites has slowed." Key congressional Democrats "are looking to push the program, known as Superfund, back into the spotlight. They're looking not only at its funding levels but also its funding sources. A central issue: whether to restore 'polluter pay' taxes on industry to help fund cleanups." Sen. Barbara Boxer "says she's making Superfund, along with global warming, focal points of her environmental agenda. She has tapped presumed presidential aspirant Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D) of New York to chair the Superfund subcommittee."

Water Battle Rages In Colorado's Black Canyon. The Grand Junction (CO) Sentinel (12/27, Magill) reports, "Before the dams were built, the Gunnison River raged through Black Canyon each spring with such ferocity that it carved through the volcanic rock Colorado's deepest and most sheer abyss. … More than 2,000 feet above the river on the south rim of Black Canyon of the Gunnison National Park, there's no running water, no grand lodge inviting tourists to luxuriate, no concession stand feeding the masses." The Sentinel continues, "Black Canyon may be Colorado's most controversial national park —not necessarily because of how it was created or how its government caretakers manage its formidable land, but because of the water in the Gunnison River, which not only imbues the canyon with life, but supplies water and electricity to thousands of people in central Colorado. … But the amount of water released below the dams would forever change the ecology of the river through Black Canyon National Park. … The dams eliminated the Gunnison River's natural hydrograph through the canyon, evening out flows during spring runoff, when the river should be raging with floodwater, said Ken Stahlnecker, chief of resource stewardship and science at Black Canyon." The Sentinel notes that "a 2003 agreement between the National Park Service, the U.S. Department of Interior and the State of Colorado threatened to starve the canyon of its flows, reducing it to a year-round minimum of 300 cubic feet per second. .. .To maintain the vitality of the Gunnison River through Black Canyon, water would ideally need to flow at a volume well above 300 cubic feet per second, especially during spring runoff when the river naturally runs highest, Stahlnecker said. … The agreement relinquished Black Canyon National Park's water right to peak and shoulder flows during the spring, a right dating to 1933 when President Hoover declared Black Canyon a national monument. … The agreement was 'nonsensical,' said U.S. District Court Judge Clarence A. Brimmer in his September decision to set aside the pact. The National Park Service ignored the needs of the public in a decision that would profoundly effect the canyon's ecology and human environment, he wrote. … He declared that because Black Canyon is a wilderness area and a national park, the National Park Service must maintain enough water in the river to leave the canyon's ecology and scenic beauty unimpaired. The agreement, he said, protected the canyon's competitors and not the canyon itself. … After being given until Dec. 18 — the court granted a one month extension to the government's original deadline — to appeal Brimmer's decision, the U.S. Department of Justice filed a notice of appeal that day, which preserves the government's right to file its appeal beyond the deadline. … Cynthia Magnuson, spokeswoman for the Justice Department in Washington, said the appeal would likely be filed by the beginning of January."

Senior FBI Officials Honing Management Skills In Business School Program. Under the headline "The New FBI Means Business," the Los Angeles Times (12/28, Schmitt, 850K) reports in a generally positive light on the senior FBI officials who are attending management classes at Northwestern University's business school. "In an effort to change the famously insular and hidebound organization, the FBI has sent more than 2,000 of its top agents and supervisors — including this group of spy-catchers, cyber-sleuths and terrorist-hunters — to management school at Northwestern," where "they explore how large corporations have shifted their missions." The Times notes, "The program was started three years ago by FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III," who "is an ardent student of management science. He has sought the views of successful chief executives…and has looked to outsiders to fill high positions. The training has been one of Mueller's main efforts to bring fresh thinking into the bureau, though some FBI officials at first found the idea puzzling." The Times goes on to report in detail on its reporter's shadowing of agents through a day of courses in the program.

Court Rules Federal Investigators Can Use MLB Test Results In Drug Probe. There are more than 500 media references to a court decision that would give the government access to baseball players' drug-test results as an investigation of illegal drug distribution among athletes continues. The AP (12/27) reported, "The names and urine samples of about 100 Major League Baseball players who tested positive three years ago can be used by federal investigators, a court ruled Wednesday." The ruling from the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals "could bolster the government's perjury case against [Barry] Bonds if investigators are able to link his name to a positive test from baseball's anonymous testing in 2003. The San Francisco Giants slugger has been the target of a perjury investigation since he testified before a 2004 grand jury that he didn't knowingly use illegal drugs." Baseball players and owners "agreed in their 2002 labor contract that the [test] results would be confidential, and each player was assigned a code number to be matched with his name." The New York Times, Wall Street Journal, Los Angeles Times, San Diego Union-Tribune, Houston Chronicle, and Forbes are among the many news outlets that used the AP story.

The San Francisco Chronicle (12/27) reported the appeals court "revealed…that more than 100 major league baseball players tested positive for steroids in 2003, and ruled that the government could use their tests in its investigation of illegal drug distribution to athletes. … The government has expressed no intention of prosecuting any athlete for illegal drug use. The court quoted government lawyers as saying athletes who tested positive could be called before a grand jury and asked about their suppliers."

In the New York Times (12/28), Murray Chass writes, "By a vote of 2 to 1, the three-judge panel overturned lower court decisions in Los Angeles, San Francisco and Nevada. The [Players Association] had no immediate public reaction to the decision, preferring to take time to digest the 120-page opinion before commenting. However, the union is certain to go further with the case."

The Washington Post (12/28, E5, Shipley) reports the decision "means additional major league players could get swept up in the probe into sports doping that began in 2003 when a raid of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative (BALCO) in Burlingame, Calif., yielded information that tied dozens of elite and professional athletes to steroids and other drugs."

USA Today (12/28, Ortiz) writes that the tests "were conducted in 2003 as part of baseball's survey to determine whether to implement a stricter policy, which began in 2004 after more than 100 of the approximately 1,200 players had positive results. Federal investigators raided testing labs in California and Nevada, seeking the results of 10 players — among them Bonds, Jason Giambi and Gary Sheffield— who were subpoenaed to testify in front of the grand jury probing BALCO."

The San Jose Mercury News (12/27) reported a "divided panel of the San Francisco-based 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals rejected the privacy arguments of the players' union, raising the possibility the names of baseball players who tested positive for steroids in the league's 2003 anonymous testing program could become public as the government continues to probe the fallout from the BALCO steroids case."

The New York Sun (12/28) reports one judge on the appeals court panel, Sidney Thomas, "filed a scathing dissent warning that computer-based files were being opened to wholesale rummaging by the government."

Bloomberg (12/27) also reported on the ruling.

On its Web site, ESPN (12/28) reports the attorney for Barry Bonds "downplayed the significance of a court ruling Wednesday allowing federal investigators access to confidential Major League Baseball drug-testing data from the 2003 season, suggesting that the San Francisco Giants slugger was not among the 100 or so players who tested positive for performance-enhancing drugs. … In its ruling, the court provided that the names of the players who tested positive remain sealed. … The players' association, which sued to keep the government from accessing the records, has not decided whether to appeal the ruling."

Network TV Coverage. NBC Nightly News (12/27, story 8, 0:30, Williams) aired, "A bombshell in baseball's ongoing steroid investigation. A federal court of appeals ruled the names and urine samples of 100 baseball players who tested positive three years ago could be used by federal authorities. This could help the government's case against Barry Bonds, who has testified that he never knowingly used steroids."

Cable TV Coverage. CNN's The Situation Room (12/27, 7:00 p.m.) aired, "A U.S. appeals court ruling today could affect more than 100 Major League Baseball players tested for potential steroid use. The court says lower courts wrongly blocked government access to confidential blood tests conducted by two labs. Investigators are still investigating whether some lied to a federal grand jury. Barry Bonds…has declined comment so far, saying the lawyers must first review the court's decision."

FOX's O'Reilly Factor (12/27, 8:00 p.m.) aired, "A federal appeals court says the names and urine samples of Major League Baseball players tested for steroids three years ago can be used. Among them, Barry Bonds. He has maintained he never tested positive."

Judge Rules Against Arizona Church Founders Who Use Marijuana, Trial Date Set. The AP (12/27) reported a federal judge "has ruled against the founders of an Arizona church that deifies marijuana and uses it as a sacrament. U.S. District Judge Judith C. Herrera in Albuquerque, N.M., refused to dismiss charges against Dan and Mary Quaintance, saying they don't have a 'sincere' religious belief. … Herrera's order means the government's criminal case against the Quaintances will proceed in the new year. The couple is scheduled to go to trial on Jan. 16 on criminal charges of possessing more than 100 pounds of marijuana, as well as conspiracy charges."

Convicted Cocaine-Ring Supplier Sentenced In Connecticut. The Connecticut Post (12/28) reports a Bridgeport man, who police "said was supplying drugs to dealers in the greater New Haven area, was sentenced Wednesday to eight years in prison. Johnny Rolon…pleaded guilty to possession of narcotics with intent to sell and criminal possession of a weapon. … According to police, in March agents of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration infiltrated a cocaine distribution ring operating in the greater New Haven area. … Police said they subsequently learned that Rolon was supplying the ring with cocaine."

New York Authorities Say Gambling Ring Also Smuggled Marijuana. The New York Times (12/28, Cotroneo) reports a Long Island gambling ring that "took in $8.6 million a year was broken up with the arrest of 14 people," according to the Suffolk County district attorney. District Attorney Thomas J. Spota "said that the 14-month investigation also uncovered lucrative marijuana and fireworks smuggling rackets that were run by the chief bookmaker, Salvatore Gerrato, 45, of Seaford. In addition, three people were charged in the drug case."

Long Island Newsday (12/28, Castillo) reports police "arrested 17 suspects on assorted gambling and conspiracy charges, and continue to search for one more -- a Freeport attorney charged with helping run 'hundreds of pounds' of pot from California to Long Island."

The AP (12/28) reports police "investigating a lucrative bookmaking operation came across a related drug-smuggling ring and busted both, arresting 17 and seizing $1 million, authorities said Wednesday. Thirteen men and a woman were arrested on gambling charges, while three men were arrested on charges of conspiracy to possess marijuana."

Internet Operation Accused Of Selling Millions In Illegally Prescribed Drugs, Four Arrested. USA Today (12/28, 3A, Leinwand) reports federal agents "say they have shut down an Internet pharmacy operation and arrested four people who allegedly sold millions of dollars of illegally prescribed drugs to customers across the nation. Drug Enforcement Administration agents are still seeking four doctors from Puerto Rico who allegedly wrote the prescriptions based on Internet health questionnaires, DEA spokeswoman Erin Mulvey said Wednesday. … The sites, in operation for at least three years, did about $50,000 a day in business, she said. … Agents earlier closed two pharmacies in Georgia and one in Maryland that allegedly supplied the ring, Mulvey said."

US Indicts New Mexico Man On Drug Charges. The Carlsbad (NM) Current-Argus (12/28, Bowen) reports, "A grand jury has indicted Ricky Green of Carlsbad on federal drug and firearm charges stemming from the seizure of illegal drugs and a gun at his home on Townsend Road in August." The Current-Argus continues, "Green, 45, also known as Ricky Barksdale, was arrested during the early morning hours of Aug. 31, when agents of the Pecos Valley Drug Task Force served a search warrant at his home in the 4300 block of Townsend Road." The Current-Argus adds, "On Dec. 21, a federal grand jury indicted him on three charges possession of crack cocaine with intent to distribute, possession of methamphetamine with intent to distribute and possession of a firearm in the furtherance of a drug trafficking crime. … Green was originally charged in state court, but those charges were dismissed after authorities sought federal charges against him, hoping for a more severe, longer sentence. … 'We pushed for the indictment because he has a long history of selling narcotics and we wanted a stiffer penalty on the drug crimes,' Commander David Edmondson of the Pecos Valley Drug Task Force said on Wednesday. … Edmondson said pursuing federal charges was the only way to ensure a stiffer penalty. He said because Green has at least three prior drug crime convictions he is eligible"

Nearly 500 Assassinations Reported This Year In Nuevo Laredo. The San Bernardino Sun (12/28) reports street violence in Nuevo Laredo "has become a way of life for the nearly 380,000 residents of Mexico's most violent border city. According to law-enforcement officials in Mexico and U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration officials, more than 500 people were assassinated in Nuevo Laredo in 2005. Official estimates, in news reports, put the 2005 death toll at 186. This year, there have been nearly 500 assassinations, and the death toll continues to rise. … The violence has also changed the lives of American citizens living in Laredo, on the Texas side of the border, where kidnappings, narcotics trafficking and corruption have become common."

In a separate story, the San Bernardino Sun (12/28) reports the government "announced a new operation - Northern Border - in mid-March 2006. Under the program, 600 to 800 Federal Protective Police officers were deployed to Nuevo Laredo, according to the U.S. Office of National Drug Control Policy. In a July interview, a Mexican police official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said many of the agents under the Northern Border initiative have either left the city or are working for the cartels."

IMMIGRATION:

Illegal Migrant Arrests Drop After Guard Troops Sent To Border. The AP (12/28, Rodriguez) reports, "Arrests of illegal migrants along the U.S.-Mexico border have dropped by more than a third since U.S. National Guard troops started helping with border security, hinting at a drop in attempted crossings, the U.S. Border Patrol said Tuesday." The AP continues, "U.S. Border Patrol agents arrested 149,238 fewer people from the start of July through November, down 34 percent from the same period last year, according to monthly figures provided by U.S. Border Patrol spokesman Mario Martinez." The AP adds, '"Arrests also had dropped by 9 percent for the same period from 2004 to 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0109453

If the downward trend continues, it would be the first sustained decrease in illegal immigrant arrests since shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. … Border Patrol officials usually attribute a drop in arrests to fewer people crossing. … National Guard troops started arriving along the border June 15, and 6,000 were in place by August."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats' Agenda Targets GOP Corporate Allies. The Christian Science Monitor (12/28, Chaddock, 59K) reports that with their new majority in Congress, Democrats "are targeting some of the GOP's strongest corporate allies - Big Oil, big pharmaceutical companies, and, in all likelihood, defense contractors." In their "first 100 legislative hours, Democrats aim to negotiate lower drug prices for seniors, roll back subsidies for oil and gas companies, and reduce the cost of student loans. They're also quickly gearing up to investigate allegations of corruption in war contracting." University of Virginia political analyst Larry Sabato said, "Parties reward their constituency groups, and they go after the other party's constituency groups. Parties are never stronger than in the first few days, so they do it early."

Part B Premiums To Go Up For Some Beneficiaries. The Washington Post (12/28, A15, Kaufman, 690K) reports, "When new income-based premiums for Medicare's Part B program go into effect next month, some seniors will get an unwelcome surprise: Their monthly costs will be going up considerably more than expected because of the government's method of counting their income." The Times adds, "In addition to income from investments, pensions and wages, seniors will find that big but unusual windfalls -- from house sales, for instance, or from taking cash from an individual retirement account -- will also be included in government calculations. As a result, an advocacy group for seniors says, tens of thousands of people will be counted as wealthy even though their continuing yearly income is modest." Mark Hinkle, a spokesman for the Social Security Administration, "said that a small number of people will indeed have to pay more for their 2007 premiums because of large 2005 capital gains reported on their income tax returns. But he said that the premiums would go down in future years once the capital gains are no longer part of a recipient's tax return."

Pelosi To Visit Childhood Home In Baltimore. The Washington Times/AP (12/28, Wyatt) reports incoming House speaker Nancy Pelosi plans a visit to Baltimore's Little Italy, her childhood home, before arriving in Washington for the start of the 110th Congress. The "youngest of six, Mrs. Pelosi was born into a political family in a house always full of strangers asking for help. Thirty years before going to Congress, Nancy D'Alesandro was brokering political deals for constituents of her father, Thomas D'Alesandro Jr., who served as Baltimore mayor from 1947 to 1959 and as a congressman from 1939 to 1947." But childhood friends "said they never imagined Mrs. Pelosi's political career eclipsing those of her father and her brother, Thomas D'Alesandro III, who served one term as mayor from 1967 to 1971." So proud "is Little Italy of Mrs. Pelosi's political ascension that the city will name part of Mrs. Pelosi's childhood street for her."

Housing Vouchers Under "Moving To Opportunity" Said To Have Limited Value. The Wall Street Journal (12/28, Hilsenrath, Gerena-Morales, 2.04M) profiles Lydia Grayson, a mother who moved her family to North Carolina to escape "her drug-addled, East Harlem housing project," a decade ago, citing her as emblematic of "a question society has wrestled with for years: Can a family escape poverty by getting out of the neighborhood where it takes root? It also sheds light on the government's shifting efforts to use housing policy as a solution to poverty." The Journal notes the increased use of Section 8 vouchers supplanting the formerly prevalent urban housing project, and the impact of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita on poverty-level housing. "Ms. Grayson's move was part of a government test designed to study the effects of a new neighborhood on poverty in the way a researcher studies the effects of a new drug." The Journal continues to detail Moving to Opportunity, a federal program begun in 1994 in which one group of housing project residents were "offered a lottery for housing vouchers," and a second group was not given such an offer. "Researchers have since tracked and compared the fortunes of the two groups." The study's results were mixed, with certain demographics impacted differently, and the Journal portrays simply moving families out of poverty-stricken areas as being ill-suited to cure the complexities of poverty.

Author Says Charities Won't Benefit From Greater Government Subsidies. In a Wall Street

Journal (12/28, A14, 2.04M) op-ed, Arthur C. Brooks, author of "Who Really Cares: The Surprising Truth About Compassionate Conservatism," writes about the uncertainty of whether the incoming Democratic majority in Congress will move to boos government funding of nonprofit charities, adding that "even less clear is whether greater government subsidies are in the interest of the charities themselves." Brooks cites the example of a "large nonprofit organization that helps the poor in New York state," which received a temporary influx of state money, which hindered the group's operations by first requiring staff to manage the money, and then by reducing the group's fundraising acumen. Moreover, Brooks argues, "the problem with government money goes beyond just its volatility: Studies by economists over the past decade have demonstrated that government spending on nonprofit activities actually lowers private charitable giving. … The bottom line is that there is nothing free about cash from the government."

Congress Urged Not To Acquiesce To Union "Card Check" Demands. In a piece in the Wall Street Journal (12/28, A15, 2.04M), Detroit freelance journalist Thomas J. Bray writes about the steady decline in union membership in the US, noting that organized labor groups are "scrambling for new ways to beef up [their] membership rolls. The latest hot idea is 'card check,' in which unions demand to be recognized as the bargaining unit for a workplace if a majority of the workers merely sign a card indicating their support. Under current law, companies are required to recognize a union only after a secret ballot of the workers -- and unions have been losing an increasing number of those elections. Now that Congress is back under Democratic control, unions sniff a win." The Journal notes that union lobbyists have tied Democratic legislators' support of card-check bills to future political support, but that "Republicans still have the strength to filibuster such a measure to death, and President Bush might veto it." However, "The fact that unions now call card-check their No. 1 legislative priority should be seen as a sign of weakness rather than strength," and "Republicans could be making a serious miscalculation if they bow to union demands for card check."

OTHER NEWS:

Home Sales Data Suggests Housing Slump May Be Ending. USA Today (12/28, Knox, 2.27M) reports, "Sales of newly built homes rose a surprising 3.4% from October to November, the Commerce Department said Wednesday, as more builders offered special deals to attract buyers, and buyers took advantage of declining interest rates and mild weather to visit model homes." This is "the third increase in four months and a sign that the housing correction may be ending. Builder confidence levels, which hit bottom in September, are also slowly beginning to rise, according to December's Housing Market Index."

The Wall Street Journal (12/28, Conkey, 2.04M) also says "recent firmness in mortgage applications and an increase in new-home sales suggest the housing slump may be nearly over, limiting the risk of wider damage to the overall economy. One indication that home-buying demand has leveled off after a yearlong decline comes from the Mortgage Bankers Association, which conducts a weekly mortgage-application survey." Yesterday, "the group said mortgage applications fell sharply last week from the week before. Even so, its indexes of applications for home purchases and refinancings have been rising steadily since summer. The four-week moving average for the MBA's purchase index, which offers a less-volatile picture of the trend, has risen 12% since August, while the four-week average for the group's refinancing index has soared more than 41% since July."

The New York Times (12/28, Peters, 1.16M) says "many economists said the report, rather than foreshadowing a quick rebound, highlighted how fragile residential construction remained and suggested that the downturn now rattling the housing market had not yet run its course."

Dow Hits New Record. Another New York Times (12/28, Peters, 1.16M) story reports the news about the housing market "helped propel stocks on Wall Street to another all-time high, with the Dow Jones industrial average rising more than 100 points to finish the day above 12,500 for the first time." NBC Nightly News (12/27, story 9, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) also reported on the "record session" in Wall Street, and notes "NASDAQ gained almost 18 points [to close at 2,431.22]." The Wall Street Journal (12/28, C1, Browning, 2.04M), Washington Post/AP (12/28, D4) and USA Today (12/28, 5B, 2.27M) also report the stock numbers.

Retail Sales Appear On Track For "Low End Of Expectations." The Wall Street Journal (12/28, Covert, 2.04M) reports, "Retailers posted a disappointing 1.7% increase in comparable sales for the week ended Dec. 23, putting holiday sales on track to hit the low end of expectations, according to the International Council of Shopping Centers." The Journal adds, "A surge of last-minute purchases by consumers fueled a 2% rise in same-store sales, or sales at stores open at least a year, from the previous week's levels, with sales on Friday and Saturday particularly strong." But "the 1.7% same-store increase from year-ago spending was the weakest such gain recorded by the New York-based trade group since the week ended Feb. 12, 2005."

Cyber Sex Scandal Heads To Trial. USA Today/AP (12/28) reports, "When Robert Steinbuch discovered his girlfriend had discussed intimate details about their sex life in her online diary, the Capitol Hill staffer didn't just get mad. He got a lawyer. … Soon, though, the racy tidbits about the sex lives of the two Senate aides faded from the front pages and the gossip pages. Steinbuch accepted a teaching job in Arkansas, leaving Washington and Jessica Cutler's Washingtonienne Web log behind." The AP continues, "While sex scandals turn over quickly in this city, lawsuits do not. Steinbuch's case over the embarrassing, sexually charged blog appears headed for an embarrassing, sexually charged trial. … Lurid testimony about spanking, handcuffs and prostitution aside, the Washingtonienne case could help establish whether people who keep online diaries are obligated to protect the privacy of the people they interact with offline." The AP adds, "Cutler, a former aide to Sen. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio, says she created the blog in 2004 to keep a few friends up to date on her social life. Like a digital version of the sex-themed banter from a Sex and the City episode, Cutler described the thrill and tribulations of juggling sexual relationships with six men. … One of those men was Steinbuch, a counsel to DeWine on the Judiciary Committee. … When Ana Marie Cox, then the editor of the popular gossip website Wonkette.com, discovered and linked to Cutler's blog, the story spun out of control. Cutler was fired and Steinbuch says he was publicly humiliated. He went to court seeking more than $20 million in damages. … The case is embroiled in thorny pretrial issues, with each side demanding personal information from the other. Steinbuch wants to know how much money Cutler received from the man she called her 'sugar daddy.' Cutler demanded Steinbuch's student evaluations from the University of Arkansas at Little Rock Law School, where he teaches. … Steinbuch also recently added Cox as a defendant in the case, though he has not served her with court papers. A trial date has not been set, but Matthew Billips, Cutler's attorney, said there are no settlement talks that might head off a trial."

Ford "Very Strongly" Disagreed With Iraq War Decision. The death of former President Gerald Ford dominated TV and print coverage last night and this morning. The coverage overwhelmingly focuses on Ford's likeability and honesty, as well as on his decision to pardon President Nixon after the Watergate scandal. But some of the tributes also include veiled (and not so veiled) criticisms of the current occupant of the White House. Most significantly, the Washington Post (12/28, A1, Woodward, 690K) runs a front-page story titled "Ford Disagreed With Bush About Invading Iraq," reports that Ford "said in an embargoed interview in July 2004 that the Iraq war was not justified. 'I don't think I would have gone to war,' he said a little more than a year after President Bush launched the invasion advocated and carried out by prominent veterans of Ford's own administration." In "a four-hour conversation at his house in Beaver Creek, Colo., Ford 'very strongly' disagreed with the current president's justifications for invading Iraq and said he would have pushed alternatives, such as sanctions, much more vigorously. In the tape-recorded interview, Ford was critical not only of Bush but also of Vice President Cheney -- Ford's White House chief of staff -- and then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who served as Ford's chief of staff and then his Pentagon chief." Ford also "took issue with the notion of the United States entering a conflict in service of the idea of spreading democracy."

Another aspect of the Ford presidency that is being widely noted is its impact on the current White House team. CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (12/27, Greenfield) reported Ford's "legacy is measured not so much in policy, as policy-makers. … Some of the political fallout from the Ford years continues to this day in very significant ways," as Vice President Dick Cheney was Ford's chief of staff, and that former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld held the same post in Ford's administration. The Wall Street Journal (12/28, A8, Dreazen, 2.04M) also says Ford's "tenure is felt through the ranks of aides -- most notably…Cheney -- who became pivotal figures in the Bush administration. They have used their years in office to restore powers of the presidency they felt were lost after Mr. Nixon's resignation and the Vietnam War. The Bush White House's assertion of presidential power in areas such as the war on terror may be Mr. Ford's most surprising legacy." In the New York Times (12/28, 1.16M),

Barry Werth writes, "President Ford believed that by pardoning Mr. Nixon, he was putting Watergate and the imperial presidency in the past. But by sacrificing his popularity, he also lost much of his mandate" and was "forced to the right." As a result, "his administration spawned many of the core attitudes and key players of the…Bush White House." David Broder, in the Washington Post (12/28, A27, 690K), says that "for all that he has borrowed from Ronald Reagan, President Bush owes the greatest debt to three stalwarts of economic and national security policy inherited from Ford," Cheney, Rumsfed and former Federal Reserve chairman Alan Greenspan, Ford's chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers.

Some stories praising Ford's management style are also critical of Bush. Under the headline "Similar Personnel, Different Approaches," the Washington Post (12/28, A8, Baker, 690K) reports that "if the Ford administration proved an incubator for future Republican talent after the demise of Richard M. Nixon's presidency, it turned out not to be much of a model for the current Bush administration in terms of style and ideology. Where Ford governed close to the political center, working with congressional Democrats and presenting a pragmatic, cautious domestic and foreign policy agenda, Bush has styled himself as more of a crusader for change at home and abroad -- bold in the eyes of his admirers but reckless in the view of his critics." Bush "has led the nation in a more polarized time and more polarized fashion."

The Washington Post (12/28, A1, Baker, 690K) also says "Ford's legacy…dominated the discussion in Washington and across the country yesterday, standing in contrast to a time when leaders in both parties often seem unable to join hands on the big issues of the day. During his final years, mostly privately but sometimes publicly, Ford often expressed regret at what he saw as a coarsening political environment that personalizes policy differences and undermines national unity."

The Los Angeles Times (12/28, Spiegel, 850K), for example says Ford "was comfortable with being less knowledgeable than his advisors and was unthreatened by strongly voiced disagreements. Unlike almost any subsequent president, Ford was able to create a White House that was open to dissent. … The comparisons with Bush's style first broke into the public debate two years ago. Paul O'Neill, a senior official in the Ford White House's budget office who three decades later became Bush's Treasury secretary, cooperated with author Ron Suskind on a book that made critical contrasts between the two presidents. … Other Ford White House veterans, many of whom asked not to be named because they did not want to appear critical of Bush, say they share O'Neill's view of the contrasts."

USA Today (12/28, 1A, Kiely, 2.27M) notes Ford "got one appointment to the Supreme Court, in 1975, and he is still there. John Paul Stevens, 86, is now the oldest justice. … The fact that Ford alumni include Cheney and Rumsfeld, now viewed as arch-conservatives, as well as Stevens, one of the court's most liberal members, speaks volumes about the former president, according to those who knew him." Ford "served as 'a balance point between the increasingly conservative wing of the Republican Party and the more liberal wing,' said presidential historian Carl Sferrazza Anthony. 'He was always seeking middle ground.'"

The Los Angeles Times (12/28, Neuman, Alonso-Zaldivar, 850K) reports that yesterday, "many praised Ford for his moderate views and consensus approach to governance." Log Cabin Republicans, "the nation's largest gay GOP organization, said that Ford always believe in inclusiveness in welcoming gays into the party and advocating equal rights for them. … And former first lady Nancy Reagan, in a statement, said that Ford's support for stem cell research his early support of stem cell research was important 'in getting the US Congress to debate the potential lifesaving cures and treatments that may result.'"

Drawing contrasts between Ford presidency and those that ensued, the Christian Science Monitor (12/28, 59K) editorializes that "Ford's candor and amicability are sorely needed in Washington politics today, given the steadily rising shrill, partisan tone." USA Today (12/28, 11A, 2.27M), also in an editorial, says Ford's "down-to-earth ways…stack up well against some of the more ego-driven and polished presidencies that preceded and followed his."

Funeral Services Will Begin Friday. The New York Times (12/28, Stout, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports, "Services for Mr. Ford, the 38th president, who died late Tuesday, will begin Friday in Palm Desert, Calif., with private prayers for the family at St. Margaret's Episcopal Church, Gregory D. Willard, a Ford family spokesman, said at a news conference. The next day, his body will be flown to Washington. The hearse is to pause at the World War II Memorial on the National Mall in recognition of Mr. Ford's naval service in the Pacific. His state funeral is to be conducted on Saturday evening in the Capitol Rotunda, after which the public will be allowed to file by the coffin." A service "will be held next Tuesday in the Washington National Cathedral." Plans for Ford's funeral are also described by the AP (12/28, Woodward), The Los Angeles Times (12/28, 850K), USA Today (12/28, 5A, Parker, 2.27M) and Washington Post (12/28, A8, Vogel, 690K).

Ford Survived Two Assassinations Attempts. The CBS Evening News (12/27, story 3, 2:35, Mitchell, 7.66M) recounted the two assassination attempts against Ford, " In September, 1975 Lynnette 'Squeaky' Fromm, a follower of Charles Manson aimed a pistol at the President. 17 days later in San Francisco, another woman, Sarah Jane Moore fired a shot at him. Both women are serving life in prison." The AP (12/28) runs a similar story.

"Drop Dead" Quote Was Apocryphal. The New York Times (12/28, Roberts, 1.16M) reports, "Ford and Marie Antoinette did not have much in common, but being misquoted cost both of them their jobs. In Hollywood's latest biography of the French queen, she denies having callously suggested that breadless peasants eat cake instead." Ford, on Oct. 29, 1975, "gave a speech denying federal assistance to spare New York from bankruptcy. The front page of The Daily News the next day read: 'FORD TO CITY: DROP DEAD.'" Ford "never explicitly said 'drop dead.' Yet those two words, arguably the essence of his remarks as encapsulated in the immortal headline, would, as he later acknowledged, cost him the presidency the following year, after Jimmy Carter, nominated by the Democrats in New York, narrowly carried the state."

Ford's Economic Policies Were Object Of Ridicule. The Washington Post (12/28, D1, Birnbaum, 690K) analyzes Ford's economic record, saying his policies in that area "are usually remembered as a joke. Soon after he took over as president, in August 1974, he tried to tame runaway price increases by urging Americans to wear round red lapel pins emblazoned with the initials WIN, for 'whip inflation now.' That didn't work, of course, and the pins soon disappeared amid public ridicule." But "Ford didn't give up the fight against what was then called stagflation: a debilitating mix of rapid inflation, high unemployment and slow economic growth. In fact, before his 30-month administration ended, he discarded his original plans and cobbled together an unconventional set of programs that succeeded, at least for a while, in slowing the country's financial slide." The US economy "was in sad shape when Ford replaced the disgraced Richard M. Nixon to become the nation's 38th president. Then it got worse. The economy fell into the steepest recession since World War II, coupled with an upward price spiral that was faster than at any time in modern memory." The Post reports economy didn't recover until the Reagan years.

Ford's Contribution To Conservatism Noted. In the Washington Times (12/28, 88K), Alvin S. Felzenberg writes, "[C]onservatives of the era misjudged Mr. Ford as much as had the liberals. As they rallied behind the rising star of Mr. Reagan, who personified bold color conservatism as opposed to one shaped in pastels, they overlooked the 50 vetoes Mr. Ford unfurled against spending bills the Democrats sent him. … That Mr. Reagan had a case to make, which proved essential to his own ascendancy, and conservatism's future triumphs have long clear. That Mr. Ford provided service to his country in ways that went beyond his cleaning up for his predecessor is becoming increasingly apparent with the passage of time."

Writers Recount Ford Experience In World War II. In the New York Times (12/28, 1.16M) op-ed contributors Robert Drury and Tom Clavin call Ford a "war hero." They recount his World War II experience aboard the aircraft carrier Monterey. On Dec. 18, the carrier was trapped in a "vicious Pacific cyclone later designated Typhoon Cobra. They write, "Admiral Halsey had ordered Captain Ingersoll to abandon ship, and the Monterey was ablaze from stem to stern as Lieutenant Ford stood near the helm, awaiting his orders. 'We can fix this,' Captain Ingersoll said, and with a nod from his skipper, Lieutenant Ford donned a gas mask and led a fire brigade below. Aircraft-gas tanks exploded as hose handlers slid across the burning decks. Into this furnace Lieutenant Ford led his men, his first order of business to carry out the dead and injured. Hours later he and his team emerged burned and exhausted, but they had put out the fire." Drury and Clavin conclude, "[I]n contrast to the public's image of him as a clumsy nonentity, Mr. Ford was a man whose grace under pressure saved his ship and hundreds of men on it."

NYTimes, WPost, WSJournal, WTimes Positively Assess Ford's Pardon Of Nixon. In their unsigned editorials, major newspapers echo the praises of Ford, but also turn attention to the criticism that erupted after Ford pardoned Nixon. However, they offer a generally positive assessment of his legacy., depicting Ford as an honest president who sacrificed his own popularity so the nation could better heal after the Watergate scandal. The New York Times (12/28, 1.16M) calls Ford "the right man summoned at the right time to begin the necessary process of healing a country exhausted by war abroad and scandal at home," but adds, "History has been more sympathetic to Mr. Ford's argument that to allow Mr. Nixon's prosecution to go forward, perhaps all the way to a trial, would have been profoundly destabilizing to a nation that was already in shaky health. … Our own bottom line continues to be the same: that the nation is strong enough to endure almost anything but burying the truth. Still, Mr. Ford deserves to be remembered for more than the pardon. Marking the end of a national nightmare is no small thing."

The Washington Post (12/28, A26, 690K) writes, "[I]n the period between Richard M. Nixon's resignation and Jimmy Carter's inauguration -- just under 2 1/2 years -- Gerald R. Ford did the main thing that needed doing, even though there were some in the Nixon White House who had thought him unqualified for the presidency: He reassured the people about the nature and quality of their government." The Post adds, "Today, with the passions of the period greatly diminished, it's hard to recall how much discord that decision created, even among those who believed Mr. Ford to be a trustworthy successor to Mr. Nixon. It's also hard, from today's vantage point, to see how an indictment and trial would have done the country much good. The pardon may have come too soon and been too broad, but it was basically the right thing to do."

The Wall Street Journal (12/28, 2.04M) writes, "The abiding cliché about Gerald Ford -- who died Tuesday at age 93 -- is that he was a decent man who steadied the country but held the White House too briefly to leave a major imprint. We've always thought that view of his Presidency is too diminishing, not least because he led the nation at a dangerous time and resisted political furies that could have done the U.S. far more harm." The Journal continues, "He made a particular contribution in pardoning Nixon, though he knew Nixon's enemies would accuse him of a quid pro quo. The decision cost him dearly in the polls and may have cost him the election in 1976, but it also spared the country from years of division over a criminal trial that special prosecutor Leon Jaworski seemed determined to pursue."

The Washington Times (12/28, 88K) writes, "Some argue still that the pardon deprived the nation of a 'full telling' or the nation of an opportunity to 'fully heal.' This is nonsense."

Ford's Decency, Integrity Widely Praised. ABC World News (12/27, lead story, 3:50, Gibson, 8.78M) said Ford "assumed the Presidency in its darkest days and brought it into the light." On the CBS Evening News (12/27, lead story, 3:45, 7.66M), Bob Schieffer said, "In all my years as a reporter…Ford it was nicest and most decent public figure I ever covered." And NBC Nightly News (12/27, lead story, 2:45, Mitchell, 9.87M) noted "Ford's decency and his ability to lead the nation through one of its worst crises."

Bob Woodward, in the Washington Post (12/28, A5, Woodward, 690K) recounts that "on Sunday, Sept. 8, 1974…Ford attended church alone. He sat by himself in a pew at St. John's Episcopal Church on Lafayette Square. He took Holy Communion. Back at the White House at 11:05 a.m., he went on television to announce that he had decided to pardon Richard Nixon for any crimes he committed during Watergate. … The reverberations from that decision may well have cost Ford his presidency in the next election." Woodward goes on to quote from interviews he conducted with the former president in which he commented on his pardon decision.

The AP (12/28, Riechmann) reports President Bush "remembered former President Gerald Ford as a 'man of complete integrity who led our country with common sense and kind instincts' and helped restore faith in the presidency after the Watergate scandal." The President "personally expressed his condolences in a phone call late Tuesday night with former first lady Betty Ford." The Financial Times (12/28, Sevastopulo) also reports on Bush's remarks, while the Washington Times (12/28, Pfeiffer, 88K) notes Cheney "praised his former boss in a statement, calling him a 'dear friend and mentor.'"

The CBS Evening News (12/27, story 2, 2:40, Mitchell, 7.66M) showed President Bush saying, "The American people came to know President Ford as a man of complete integrity who led our country with common sense and kind instincts," and ABC World News (12/27, story 2, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Donald Rumsfeld, who was Ford's chief of staff, today said, 'Our nation has a way of finding leaders that are needed in tough time. Gerald Ford was just the President our country needed back in 1974.' Even Jimmy Carter, the man who defeated Ford by a razor-thin margin in 1976, today hailed Jerry Ford as 'one most admirable public servants and human beings I have ever known.' Carter will eulogize Ford at one of the services to be held next week."

ABC World News (12/27, story 4, 2:55, Gibson, 8.78M) ran a segment on Ford's legacy, which Cokie Roberts described as "that of a healer." ABC World News (12/27, story 3, 3:15, Gibson, 8.78M) later noted Ford "entitled his memoirs 'A Time to Heal.'" And NBC Nightly News (12/27, story 2, 5:10, Williams, 9.87M) showed Ford saying, "When historians 50 years from now objectively write about the Ford Administration, I hope they will say that President Ford healed the wounds of Watergate, ended the tragedy of the war in Vietnam and restored public confidence in the White House itself."

On MSNBC's Scarborough Country (12/27), host Joe Scarborough said, "30 years after leaving Washington, Gerald Ford is being remembered tonight as the man who ended America's long national nightmare and brought honor back to the presidency." Fox News' Special Report (12/27, Wallace), which devoted most of its broadcast to Ford's life and legacy, said Ford was a "man who helped heal a nation torn apart by Watergate and Vietnam." During his report on Special Report, correspondent Wendell Goler described Ford as an "everyman" who "made his own breakfast his first morning in the White House." CNN's 360 Degrees (12/27, Cooper) said, "He never wanted to be president, but he helped redeem the office, just when the presidency and the country needed it most. … This accidental president had anything but an incidental presidency."

Politicians and journalists who worked with Ford also remarked on Ford's personality. On MSNBC's Scarborough Country (12/27, Scarborough), Pat Buchanan said, "While I do disagree with President Ford, I do believe he was the pivot on which the country turned out of a horrible time into a better time." On Fox News' Your World (12/27, Asman), former Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole (R), who was Ford's 1996 running mate, said Ford had a "sort of an amiable way about him" and averred that history will treat Ford "very well." On Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (12/27, Gallagher), Robert McFarlane, who was a special assistant for national security during the Ford administration, said, "I think the outstanding quality of Gerald Ford has been character and integrity.… I mean, almost every politician you and I watch in Washington views what they say and do in terms of how it affects their personal political self-interest. Not Gerry Ford." On MSNBC's Countdown (12/27, Olbermann), Andrea Mitchell said, "He really believe din the goodness of people." On MSNBC's Hardball (12/27, Matthews), former NBC Nightly News anchor Tom Brokaw said, "People keeping asking me today what it was like covering Gerald Ford as president after covering Nixon. Metaphorically and truly, it was the difference between night, the darkness of Richard Nixon, and day, the Gerald Ford administration. He was open, candid. When he told us something, we generally could believe it." Brokaw also noted that Ford came from a "different Republican Party" than today's.

The Chicago Tribune (12/28, Neikirk, 617K) praises Ford for bringing "a calming presence to the highest office in the land, shunning the imperial atmosphere fostered by Nixon." The Christian Science Monitor (12/28, Grier, 59K) says he was "decent, fair, modest, and -- truth be told -- shrewd, he made Washington seem normal again." The Washington Post (12/28, C1, Haygood, 690K) and USA Today (12/28, 5A, Ritter, 2.27M) run equally laudatory pieces about the Fords.

In a brief op-ed appearing in the Washington Post (12/28, A27, 690K), former Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole praises Ford as a "principled partisan…who worked diligently for Republican causes but who knew the limits of partisanship." In the New York Times (12/28, 1.16M), David Hume Kennerly, Ford's personal photographer, writes, "The man I came to know and admire had a quiet and very powerful sense of self. He had the least guile of anyone I've ever met and a total lack of vanity." In an op-ed in the Washington Post (12/28, A27, 690K), Ron Nessen writes, "Unlike politicians who carefully calculate for decades how their every word and deed will sound and look when they eventually run for the White House, Ford moved into the Oval Office without having his persona distorted by lust for the presidency. And the public sensed this genuineness. What a relief to have a regular person as president, particularly after the imperial presidencies of Nixon and Lyndon B. Johnson." Melvin R. Laird, secretary of defense under Nixon and an eight-term congressman from Wisconsin, also praises Ford in the Wall Street Journal (12/28, 2.04M).

Contrasting Ford's seemingly accidental accession to the presidency with his actions, particularly after the Watergate scandal, commentators also refer to Ford's as the "right person" to hold the presidency. In an op-ed appearing in Financial Times (12/28), Ar Cyr, Clausen Distinguished professor at Carthage College in Wisconsin, describes Ford as "right president at one particular moment in history." In an op-ed appearing in the Wall Street Journal (12/28, A14, 2.04M), Melvin Laird writes, "He was our Accidental President. … It was a happy accident for America, and in many ways it was no accident. It was years in the making and required hard work, planning and good fortune." After recounting Ford's accomplishments reforming the CIA and fighting inflation, Laird writes, "Of greatest importance…was his righting of the ship of state," including his pardon of Nixon.

In his Washington Post (12/28, A27, 690K) column, George Will writes, "Ford was an 'accidental president,' but there are reasons accidents happen as they do. Call it the cunning of history or an irony of American life, but this underestimated graduate of Yale Law School served a purpose Richard Nixon did not have in mind when he nominated him to replace the disgraced Vice President Spiro Agnew."

There are other stories in this morning's papers on Ford's life and career. The Washington Post (12/28, E1, Gildea, 690K) describes Ford's love of sports, while the Los Angeles Times (12/28, Martin, Abrams, Powers, 850K) reports on Ford's activities in Palm Desert, CA where he "helped open and fund such charitable endeavors as a domestic violence shelter, a children's museum, a teenage outreach program and a bighorn sheep preserve. Betty Ford is best known for establishing the alcohol and drug treatment clinic in Rancho Mirage that bears her name. It has treated more than 60,000 people since opening in 1982." The Times adds, "Although Ford represented Grand Rapids, Mich. for 25 years in Congress, he and Betty were hometown heroes in the Coachella Valley." The Washington Post (12/28, B1, Shapira, 690K) also notes that the former president's home in Alexandria, VA, has long been on the market, and the New York Times (12/28, Stanley, 1.16M) muses about how the media should approach covering Ford's passing.

Wealth Of New York Presidential Aspirants May Foretell National Political Shift. The Washington Post (12/28, A3, Powell, 690K) reports on the abundance of New York politicians with presidential aspirations, ranging from the "instantly identifiable," like New York Sen. Hillary Clinton (D) or former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani (R), to the less universally known, like current New York mayor Michael Bloomberg (R) and New York Gov. George Pataki (R). "New York may not challenge Virginia for its title as 'Mother of Presidents,' but the state could produce four presidential candidates in 2008 -- not to mention new Gov. Eliot L. Spitzer (D), who has harbored presidential dreams since he was in fourth grade and is already rumored to have an eye on 2012." The Post suggests this could indicate a national trend in which the South is "played out," and is "a curious turnabout for a state and a city" with which "Americans have long had a love-loathe relationship." The piece continues to detail New York's political history and to profile its current batch of 2008 hopefuls.

Edwards Enters Race For White House. Former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards (D), the 2004 Democratic vice presidential nominee, on Wednesday joined the 2008 race for president. The CBS Evening News (12/27, story 8, 0:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported that Edwards "says he will make a second run for president. Officially the announcement comes tomorrow in New Orleans. Edwards arrived there today. The campaign actually got ahead of itself, breaking the story today on its Website. An advisor says better a day earlier than a day late."

Fox News' Big Story (12/27, Gibson) reported that Edwards will announce his decision to run for president in 2008 from New Orleans' Ninth Ward. Fox News added, "Today, he helped clean up a New Orleans home that was badly damaged by Katrina." On MSNBC's Hardball (12/27), host Chris Matthews commented, "I think he's a guy to watch."

The AP (12/28, Pickler) reports that Edwards "jumped into the presidential race Wednesday a day earlier than he'd planned, prodded by an Internet glitch to launch a candidacy focused on health care, taxes and other domestic issues." Edwards' "campaign accidentally went live with his election Web site a day before an announcement Thursday that was supposed to use Hurricane-ravaged New Orleans as a backdrop. The slip-up gave an unintended double-meaning to his campaign slogan on the John Edwards '08 Web site: 'Tomorrow begins today.' Aides quickly shut down the errant Web site but could not contain news of the obvious, even in the shadows of former President Ford's death." The AP notes, "Earlier Wednesday, Edwards visited the site of his planned announcement for a photo opportunity," doing "yard work at the home of Orelia Tyler, 54, whose house was gutted by Hurricane Katrina and is close to being rebuilt."

The New Orleans Times-Picayune (12/28, Nolan) reports that in New Orleans Wednesday, Edwards "limited his remarks," saying that "his candidacy would emphasize Americans helping Americans, New Orleans being the most spectacular current example of the opportunities that offers. Edwards did speak briefly to the recovery, faulting the White House for providing too little help. 'The president should've said, 'I want someone in my office every morning, telling me what was happening in New Orleans yesterday,'' he said."

Bloomberg (12/28, Johnston) notes that during his first run for president, Edwards "spoke often about two Americas, one rich and one poor. He will use New Orleans tomorrow as a backdrop to highlight that disparity."

The Wall Street Journal (12/28, A4, Calmes, 2.04M) reports, "For the roughly two dozen candidates considering a run for the White House, it is perhaps the jackpot question: What might be the winning message in a contest whose first nominating vote is still more than a year away?" On Thursday, Edwards "begins testing his hunch that Americans, though focused now on the war in Iraq, can be won over to a campaign built on what he calls 'the great moral issue of our time' -- fighting poverty at home." The Journal notes that though Edwards' "theme of ending the 'Two Americas' of haves and have-nots dates to his 2004 presidential bid," Edwards "argues that the disparity between the richest Americans and the working class has widened since then. 'When I talked about poverty in the 2004 campaign, political types said it was futile,' he said in a speech this year. 'They said nobody cares about poverty except for the poor. Not true, and we saw it with Katrina.'" The Journal notes, however, "Many Democratic political operatives remain skeptical that the Edwards message will resonate among either Democratic or independent voters when antiwar talk is the rage, and could continue to be into 2008."

Edwards' Second Bid For President Will Face New Challenges. The Raleigh News & Observer (12/28, Christensen) reports that that as Edwards kicks off his second run for president, he "faces a different political landscape than he did three years ago when he was a little-known freshman senator from North Carolina." Now, Edwards is "an established national political figure," meaning that "the pressure is on for him to perform well in the early caucus and primary states in 2008, as well as in the money-raising chase in 2007." He "must contend with widespread assumptions that New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton is the odds-on favorite to capture the nomination and that Edwards' fresh-faced appeal has been eclipsed by Illinois Sen. Barack Obama. 'Before Barack Obama, it was clear Edwards was going to be the biggest hurdle for Hillary to overcome and had the best shot at stopping her,' said Chuck Todd, editor-in-chief of the Political Hotline, an Internet newsletter. 'Obama complicates his run. … If it wasn't for Obama, I think we'd say this is a two-person race.'" McClatchy lists as Edwards' key assets: name recognition, the likely "solid financial support" of "many of the nation's trial lawyers," the likely "support of a significant portion of organized labor," the new Democratic nominating calendar, and the fact that Edwards is "the only Southerner in the race, with the possible exception of retired Gen. Wesley Clark."

CQ Politics (12/27, Horrigan, Benenson) reported that although the possible presidential bids of Sens. Clinton and Obama have received more attention from the media, "the handsome and personable Edwards has an opportunity to pursue a sizable niche as an alternative for Democratic voters worried about the electability of Clinton -- who carries the baggage of controversies that surrounded her and her husband during their White House years -- or Obama, who bears the burden of proof that the nation is prepared to elect a black president, and whose mere two years in the Senate would raise questions about whether he had sufficient experience."

The New York Sun (12/28, Gerstein) reports, "By focusing on social justice and the poor, Mr. Edwards, 53, hopes to court Democratic Party activists and pose a challenge from the left to other likely presidential contenders, such as Senator Clinton. 'I don't think there's any question that by talking about labor, the minimum wage, and poverty, his strategy has been to run as the progressive alternative,' a Democratic operative and lobbyist, Steven Elmendorf, said in an interview." The Sun notes, "Democratic strategists said Mr. Edwards has made good use of his time since leaving the Senate in 2004. … In addition to staking out the poverty issue and boosting his foreign affairs resume with international travel," Edwards "has moved aggressively to win the support of labor unions, particularly those for service workers. 'He's made an effort. He's worked it hard,' Mr. Elmendorf said. However, he said, he doubts many unions will be willing to endorse Mr. Edwards in the primary, in part because Mrs. Clinton will be seeking those same endorsements, or a pledge from labor groups to stay neutral."

News Coverage Of Ford's Death Expected To Overshadow Edwards' Announcement. The Washington Post (12/28, A3, Balz, 690K) reports that Edwards chose "the week between Christmas and New Year's Day to announce his candidacy in large part because he and his advisers thought it would attract more attention during what is traditionally a slow news period. But the death of former president Gerald R. Ford was by far the dominant news on Wednesday and probably will continue to be for several more days. Edwards issued a statement mourning the death of the 38th president. 'President Ford was a true leader -- he made decisions based on what he believed was right, not what was politically expedient,' the statement said. 'He called on us to never lose faith that we can change America.' He said Americans could honor Ford's memory by 'lifting ourselves above partisan politics and acting with the courage and conviction of our ideals.'"

Edwards Set To Launch Announcement Tour Of Key Early Presidential States. The Winston-Salem Journal (12/28, Romoser) reports that following a news conference Thursday in New Orleans, Edwards "is expected to begin a whirlwind, three-day tour in which he will visit Iowa, Nevada, New Hampshire and South Carolina -- the first four states in the 2008 Democratic primary season. On Saturday night, Edwards will conclude the tour with a rally in Chapel Hill."

Carlson Says "Nice Guy" Edwards "Candidate Most Reminiscent" Of Ford. In a piece for Bloomberg (12/28), columnist Margaret Carlson writes that "Edwards's pitch that there are two Americas is, if anything, truer today than when he first took it out for a spin. … He favors an expansion of the earned income tax credit, better lending practices, housing vouchers, sprinkling low-income housing amid McMansions and a program to rehabilitate Louisiana after Katrina. And it isn't only the Ninth Ward that bears Edwards out. Wages are stagnant. There has been no increase in the minimum wage. More people are without health insurance than before." Carlson adds, "It could be that in 2004, Edwards suffered from first-time jitters, too much message discipline about a divided America and the handicap of playing second banana to a waffling, windsurfing stiff. There could be a hunger now for a quieter man after eight years of taking our enemies dead or alive. Edwards is the candidate most reminiscent of the late Gerald Ford," who "was a fine president in a difficult moment, so decent he couldn't win the presidency on his own. We are a schizophrenic electorate. We prefer the likeable candidate over the sourpuss, but we also want a tough guy. Edwards has a chance only if nice guys don't finish last."

Ohio Supreme Court Reprimands Taft. The AP (12/28, Welsh-Huggins) reports, "The state Supreme Court on Wednesday publicly reprimanded Ohio Gov. Bob Taft for his ethics violations in office, a black mark that will stay on his permanent record as an attorney." Taft, "a Republican and great-grandson of President William Howard Taft, pleaded no contest in 2005 to failing to report golf outings and other gifts worth nearly $6,000 during his four-year term. He was fined $4,000. Taft could not seek re-election because of term limits and leaves office in less than two weeks." The New York Times (12/28, Driehaus, 1.16M) also reports the story.

Schwarzenegger Plans Boost In Government Spending On "Cutting Edge Research." The Los Angeles Times (12/28, Halper, 850K) reports, "A plan announced by Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger on Wednesday to boost public funding for cutting-edge research could prove to be a boon to some of the state's top universities -- and to private companies that leverage their breakthroughs into big profits." The proposal, which is "to be included in the budget unveiled by the governor early next month, calls for investing $95 million in four research projects based at the state's public universities. The projects designated for funding, at least one of which would be developed in partnership with a major oil company, are mostly geared toward the creation of cleaner burning fuels." The Times adds "some advocacy groups questioned whether the state would get a proper return on its investment. They urged the administration to put safeguards in place that would assure that taxpayers -- and not just private companies -- reap some of the profits created by publicly funded innovations."

High Energy Prices Lift Houston's Economy. The Los Angeles Times (12/28, Bustillo, 850K) reports from Houston, "High oil, natural gas and electricity prices may bring pain to families and business owners elsewhere, but in America's energy capital, they bring prosperity. Two out of every five Houstonians owe their jobs to energy — many big oil and gas companies have their world or American headquarters in Houston — and the industry's spectacular profits in recent years have helped the nation's fourth-largest city outdistance the country as a whole in economic growth." But "veterans of Houston's boom-and-bust energy economy are mindful that fortunes could turn quickly, like they did in the 1980s, when a sudden swoon in crude oil prices sent the city's economy crashing." The current "boom is tied not only to short-term spikes in energy prices, but to forecasts for global energy demand that are leading many companies to make ambitious long-term bets."

Shell Hires Norton As Counsel. The Wall Street Journal (12/28, B5, 2.04M) reports, "Royal Dutch Shell PLC said it hired former U.S. Interior Secretary Gale Norton to serve as a counsel for the Anglo-Dutch oil company. The move comes amid rising scrutiny in Washington of the department's dealings with the oil industry." Norton "will serve as general counsel for the firm's unconventional-resources division, Shell said. The oil company is developing and testing proprietary technology designed to enhance oil recovery from certain unconventional sources, such as oil shale and extra-heavy oil, Shell said."

Fleishman-Hillard Launches PH Boom Initiative. The Washington Post's Judy Sarasohn reports in her "Special Interests" column, "In Washington, where every special interest has a lobbyist or at least a spokesman, baby boomers now have their own practice group. Public relations biggie Fleishman-Hillard Inc. has launched what it calls FH Boom, a practice that targets baby boomers, those folks roughly between 42 and 60 years old. The demographic is about 78 million people." The Post adds, "The practice is heavy on commercial marketing and public relations, but FH Boom also figures to advise public affairs clients on coalitions and advocacy issues involving baby boomers. Think legislative and administration issues dealing with taxes, health care, Medicare costs, Social Security and college costs." Paul Johnson, president of public affairs for Fleishman, "said that the firm's work for AARP has given it a 'ringside seat' to see how boomers affect politics and government."

Harlem Church Seeks Housing Improvements Without Displacing Elderly. The Wall Street Journal (12/28, Lagnado, 2.04M) reports on the strategy used by Abyssinian Development Corp., "the 17-year-old not-for-porfit real-estate arm of the famed nearly 200-year-old Abyssinian Baptist Church," to "keep the elderly—and particularly the elderly poor—at home, where they want to be, and out of institutions. Abyssinian's unusual answer is real estate." The group, which "controls $299 million in property assets in booming central Harlem,…is using its resources to create a social, psychological and economic sanctuary for the community's elderly and poor residents, pumping proceeds into social-service projects while enabling tenants in Abyssinian-owned housing to pay low rents."

Police Charity Abandons Fundraising Scheme. The Wall Street Journal (12/28, B1, Anders, 2.04M) reports on the efforts of Robert Teal, who "recently became chairman of the CHP 11-99 Foundation," to end a fundraising practice which critics say could result in drivers improperly avoiding speeding tickets. The organization provides college scholarships and other benefits to members of the California Highway Patrol. "For years, the foundation had been selling 'Life Memberships' to motorists for $1,800 apiece. Lots of people with Ferraris, BMWs and other fast cars snapped them up, mounting the foundation's hard-to-miss license-plate holders on their vehicles' rear bumpers. … Buying a membership was seen by many as protection against speeding tickets." Mindful of the perception of impropriety, "Teal led a push to revamp the way the 8,000-member foundation raises money." Teal's strategy involved boosting the price of memberships to make them inaccessible to most, and "tapping into big new sources of money. He urged colleagues to approach some of California's leading corporations and wealthiest people, asking them to donate $100,000 or more to create endowed scholarships in their name, which could run in perpetuity."

WPost Accuses Virginia Republicans For Blocking Transportation Funding. An editorial in the Washington Post (12/28, A26, 690K) titled, "The Snooker Strategy," scolds Virginia Republicans for failing to adequately fund the state's "aging transportation network," noting that Gov. Tim Kaine (D) "did the sensible thing by proposing a tax package that would yield $1 billion annually for transportation statewide. The Republican-dominated state Senate backed him. But Republicans who control the House of Delegates would have none of it. Instead, after a generation of neglect, they have decided to attack the problem of Virginia's roads with press releases" which "are masterpieces of omission, obfuscation and budgetary shenanigans designed to snooker voters. Rather than proposing a long-term fix for a long-term problem, they proudly announce that they favor spending what amounts to a pittance -- half of the state's current $500 million surplus -- on one-time transportation projects."

Islamists Retreat As Ethiopian-Backed Troops Near Mogadishu. The New York Times (12/28, A1, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports on its front page that Islamist forces who have controlled much of Somalia in recent months have "suddenly vanished from the streets of the capital, Mogadishu, residents said Wednesday night," as thousands of Ethiopian-back troops massed outside the city. In recent days, Ethiopian-backed forces, "with tacit approval from the United States, have unleashed tanks, helicopter gunships and jet fighters on the Islamists, decimating their military and paving the way for the internationally recognized transitional government of Somalia to assert control." The Washington Post (12/28, A22, McCrummen, 690K) reports the situation in Mogadishu "appeared confused, with witnesses reporting thousands of Somalis…fleeing the capital, and those who remained unsure who might next control the city." Meanwhile, a draft UN Security Council statement calling for a cease-fire "remained stalled, while African Union officials asked for a meeting of regional leaders in the Ethiopian capital, Addis Ababa, and called on Ethiopian forces to withdraw."

The Washington Times/AP (12/28, Hassan) reports the transitional Somali government "predicted that the capital and stronghold of the radical Islamists would fall without a fight." However, the Financial Times (12/28, England, Sevastopulo) reports officials from the Islamist movement "have said they are planning for a 'new phase' in the conflict, suggesting they are preparing to mount a guerrilla campaign against the better-equipped Ethiopian forces."

The Los Angeles Times (12/28, Sanders, Albadri, 850K) reports US military officials "acknowledged they have been conducting operations to interdict terrorists in the seas surrounding the Horn of Africa but noted those missions have been in place for several years." One military official said there is "a Navy presence off the coast of Somalia, but it is aimed primarily at anti-piracy efforts and has been in place for some time."

More Commentary. In an editorial, the New York Times (12/28, 1.16M) writes, "It is tempting to wink at Ethiopia's stunningly successful offensive in Somalia. … But if there's anything we should have learned over the past few sad years, it is that this kind of unilateral pre-emptive attack seldom solves anything, particularly when the country doing the invading is regarded as a longstanding enemy." Although "there was little international outcry…moderate forces in Somalia have been appalled by the brutal intolerance of Islamist leaders who have threatened to behead people for not praying five times a day, they are unlikely to embrace Ethiopian soldiers as a good alternative." Therefore, the Times argues that "rather than trying to marginalize the Islamic militias and the huge clan they represent, the international community should try to harness this moment to push for unity talks while the Islamists are weak and the transitional government has attained a more equal standing."

The Wall Street Journal (12/28, A14, 2.04M) editorializes, "The armed conflicts that so often roil Africa rarely engage US interests except in a humanitarian sense. But that cannot be said of the war that has now broken out between Ethiopia and the Islamists who seized control of much of Somalia in June. Here America's strategic interests are very much engaged, even if the actors in the fight range, morally speaking, from the unpalatable to the unacceptable." However, the Journal concedes, "There is a material limit to what the US can do for East Africa, and expectations for what the region can and will do it for itself cannot be high. Still, the Ethiopian offensive against Islamic Courts is an act of regional hygiene that we can hope is able to contain radical Islam from spreading to a far larger swath of Africa."

Iran's Ties With Syria Complicate US Plans.

The New York Times (12/28, A14, Slackman, 1.16M) reports, "As the White House begins to rethink its strategy for dealing with the Middle East, particularly how to calm the chaos in Iraq, pressure to try to re-engage Syria has grown." Some Western analysts contend that Syria "can be pried away from Iran's influence and convinced that its long-term interests lie instead with the West. But Washington has spent years trying to isolate Syria, while Iran has for decades moved to entwine itself with Syria on many levels -- political, military, economic and religious." Iran, it notes, has "pools of money" to "help promote Iranian influence in Syria," which some Western diplomats in Iran "say that, even if the United States tried, it might be impossible to extricate Syria from Iran's orbit."

Iranian Parliament Backs "Revision" Of IAEA Cooperation.

The New York Times (12/28, A3, Fathi, 1.16M) reports the Iranian Parliament, "by an overwhelming vote," approved legislation "that could limit Iran's cooperation with the" IAEA. The Times says the bill "was a response to" Saturday's UNSCR, and notes it "asserts that the government should 'revise its cooperation with the [IAEA] based on the interests of Iran and its people.'" The Guardian Council's quick endorsement of the measure was "a gesture that suggested that religious authorities are united behind the bill."

Author Says Ahmadinejad Trying To Appeal To All Muslims. Author Roya Hakakian writes in a Wall Street Journal (12/28, A14, 2.04M) op-ed that Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's "existential mission is to recast the ethos of being Iranian," by "peddling a pan-Islamism." Hakakian says that Ahmadinejad's "numerous spectacles, most recently the Holocaust conference, are meant to bring a sense of transcultural and transethnic unity through a common political purpose. On the domestic scene, this is an old act -- a familiar blunder to annihilate Iranian nationalism, or to force it to become subordinate to the Muslim, with Arab undertones."

State Department Rebukes Israel For Settlement Building Plan. The AP (12/28, Schweid) reports, "In a rare criticism, the Bush administration said Wednesday if Israel proceeds with construction of a settlement on the West Bank it would violate its peacemaking obligations." State Department spokesman Gonzalo Gallegos said, "The US calls on Israel to meet its roadmap obligations and avoid taking steps that could be viewed as predetermining the outcome of future negotiations. The establishment of a new settlement or the expansion of any existing settlement would violate Israel's obligations under the roadmap." The AP says the Administration "rarely criticizes Israel's actions and has gained Israel's support for establishment of a Palestinian state." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "is expected to go to the Middle East next month to try to spur peacemaking between Israel and the Palestinians," however, "it was not clear whether she had approved [Gallegos'] statement."

The New York Times (12/28, A6, Cooper, 1.16M) calls the statement "a rare public rebuke to Israel," adding, "For the Bush administration, which has shied away from criticizing Israel, the rebuke was so unusual that State Department officials took pains to assure reporters that it represented official policy and had been cleared by senior members of the administration." Tel Aviv's announced planned to proceed with construction "has particularly confounded American diplomats because it appears to run counter to the prevailing effort by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who offered a series of gestures to the Palestinians several days ago, after meeting with [Palestinian President Mahmoud] Abbas."

Israel To Resume Efforts To Stem Rocket Attacks. The Financial Times (12/28, Morris) reports Tel Aviv "on Wednesday ordered the military to resume targeting militants spotted firing rockets from the Gaza Strip but said its month-long ceasefire with the Palestinians would otherwise remain in force." The IDF "ended its policy of restraint in the face of ceasefire violations after one of eight rockets fired at Israel on Tuesday wounded two youths in the southern town of Sderot, one of them seriously." The Times says Olmert "had been under pressure from inside and outside his cabinet to end the policy of restraint in the face of continuing rocket attacks, many of them claimed by the Islamic Jihad movement, which has no political role in the Palestinian Authority." Tel Aviv said it does plan to "continue its policy of liaising with Palestinian security officials as part of efforts to stem the rocket fire." The New York Times (12/28, A6, Erlanger, 1.16M) adds Olmert "had ordered the military not to respond, but political pressure to do so was growing." Olmert was also "being criticized from the left by his own defense minister, Amir Peretz of the Labor Party, and from the right by Benjamin Netanyahu." The AP (12/28, Federman) says that "a new round of fighting in Gaza could undermine Israel's efforts to bolster the moderate Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, in his standoff with the Islamic militants of Hamas who control the Palestinian government and legislature."

Abbas Asks For "Closed-Door Talks" On "Most Difficult Disputes." The AP (12/28, Nasrawi) reports Abbas "proposed Wednesday that he start closed-door talks with Israel on some of their most difficult disputes including the status of Jerusalem and the fate of Palestinian refugees." Abbas "did not spell out why he was proposing that the negotiations with Israel be 'backdoor.' But as one of the architects of the 1993 Oslo peace accord between Israel and the Palestinians, he is known to champion quiet, informal diplomacy." He "said he proposed backdoor negotiations to Olmert at their weekend meeting, and that the Israeli leader promised to consider the suggestion. He also said he planned to discuss the idea with [Secretary Rice] when she comes to the Middle East next month." The AP says "recent weeks have seen a growing momentum toward reviving Israeli-Palestinian peace talks."

US Intensifies Crackdown On Hezbollah Funding. The Wall Street Journal (12/28, A1, Higgins, 2.04M) reports in a front page article that "until war erupted in July, Washington hailed Lebanon as a beacon for its vision of the 'new Middle East' -- a region committed to democracy, aligned with the West and eager to root out militant groups." But today, the country is "a showcase for the growing clout of forces that America wants eclipsed: Hezbollah, Iran and Syria." While cracking down on terrorist financing "has been a key front in America's 'war on terror' since al Qaeda's 2001 attacks," efforts "initially focused on Osama bin Laden's network but has struck hard in recent months at Hezbollah." For example, the Treasury Department has "targeted an Iranian state bank it says channeled funds to Hezbollah and a host of organizations and companies." The Bush administration "argues that all Hezbollah-related money must be stopped, whether it is used to buy weapons, fund microcredits or run the group's network of clinics, schools and other services." Pat O'Brien, assistant Treasury secretary for terrorist financing, said, "We don't buy into the frame of mind that you can distinguish between the military and social arms." However, this approach "carries a risk: It has strengthened the view of Hezbollah's supporters, many of whom come from Lebanon's most-impoverished areas, that America wants to keep them poor, not fight terrorism. Even Hezbollah's rivals say the US strategy plays into the hands of Islamist propagandists, who blame America and Israel for economic and other woes."

Turkey Acquits 13 In Attack On US Troops. The AP (12/28) reports thirteen Turkish villagers were acquitted Wednesday "of attacking US troops with stones and eggs after an errant US Tomahawk missile fell near their village three years ago." A Turkish court ruled the villagers' actions "did not constitute a crime" after defense lawyer Seyhmus Ulek said the incident was "a democratic reaction against American soldiers."

Israeli Tourists Heed Terror Warning In India. The Washington Times (12/28, Mitnick, 88K) reports, "Israeli backpackers in India are heeding a government warning of an al Qaeda terrorist attack over the New Year's holiday on beach resorts and rave parties in the state of Goa." The two-week-old warning from Israel's Headquarters for the War on Terror "has raised concern that al Qaeda wants to repeat the 2002 bombing in the Indonesian resort island of Bali that killed 202 persons." It also marked the first time Israel warned of a "concrete threat" of an al Qaeda attack in India, however, "Indian defense and police officials rejected the warning."

Sudan's Position On UN Darfur Force Remains Unclear. The AP (12/28, Lederer) notes Khartoum "raised new questions Wednesday about its commitment to a U.N. peace effort in the violence-wracked Darfur region as its ambassador ruled out any U.N. peacekeeping troops — an element of the world body's proposal." PermRep Abdalmahmood Abdalhaleem's "surprise statement came just minutes after the [UNSC] announced that it welcomed the Sudanese president's acceptance of the U.N. plan to help end the escalating conflict — a plan that includes deployment of a hybrid African Union-United Nations force." He told the media "that the hybrid force must be smaller and have no U.N. peacekeepers, only U.N. technical and logistical experts supporting African troops."

In more positive tones, the New York Times (12/28, A13, Gootman, 1.16M) reports UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan "said Wednesday that the Security Council was 'encouraged' that a recent message from the Sudanese government could pave the way for a large-scale peacekeeping operation in the country's war-ravaged Darfur region." Annan did add "that some diplomats remained skeptical of Sudan's overtures, and he urged the [UNSC] to press ahead quickly with its plans to test the government's intentions." The Times adds that a letter from Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir to Anna "seems to welcome a joint United Nations-African Union peacekeeping force for Darfur, it also suggests that Sudan should have veto power over how the effort is carried out."

UK's Atomic Weapons Hunters Remain Hot On Trail Of Spy's Killers. Under the headline, "Atomic Alliance: UK Village Is Home To Secretive Agency; Aldermaston Adopts Policy Of Peaceful Coexistence With Weapons Facility," the Wall Street Journal (12/28, Bryan-Low, Mollenkamp, 2.04M) reports from the village, that the "Atomic Weapons Establishment – [is] Britain's nuclear-weapons agency that, for the most part, peacefully coexists with residents here." The Journal adds that recently "though, the super-secretive agency has given the public a glimpse of what its labs do. AWE's specialists identified polonium 210 as the radioactive poison that killed former Russian intelligence agent Alexander Litvinenko on Nov. 23. Now, AWE's scientists are playing a vital role in Scotland Yard's investigation into the suspected murder by testing for radiation in places that Mr. Litvinenko or his associates went in the weeks before."

Efforts To Combat Malnutrition In Africa Improving. In a front page article, the New York Times (12/28, A1, Wines, 1.16M) reports on "sub-Saharan Africa's curse" of malnutrition, which contributed to nearly half of the deaths of five million African children under age 5 died last year. However, "the outlook for malnourished children in sub-Saharan Africa is better than in decades, thanks to an awakening to the issue -- by selected governments, anyway." Ethiopia, it notes, has "the most comprehensive program in all Africa -- a joint venture with United Nations agencies that regularly screens nearly half of its 14 million children under 5 for health and nutrition problems." Unicef's Ethiopia representative, Bjorn Ljungqvist, said the program "may be a model for Africa."

Russian Investigators Link Poisoning Probe To Yukos Case. The New York Times (12/28, A3, Myers, 1.16M) reports Russia's Prosecutor General's Office Wednesday "produced a startling new twist in the investigation of the killing of Alexander V. Litvinenko" by announcing that it was investigating "the possible involvement of former executives of Yukos Oil." In a statement, the prosecutor's office said its investigation "indicated a link between the poisoning of Mr. Litvinenko and criminal cases under way against Yukos executives," singling out "Leonid B. Nevzlin, a major shareholder and partner of the company's jailed chief executive, Mikhail B. Khodorkovsky." The statement, however, "did not elaborate on any evidence that might link Mr. Nevzlin and others to Mr. Litvinenko's death." AFP (12/28) reports Litvinenko's former spokesman, Alex Godfarb, called the allegations "an attempt to deflect responsibility from the true perpetrators." Meanwhile, the AP (12/28, Meyer) notes that Russia has "unsuccessfully pressed for the extradition of a number of Kremlin critics in recent years, including Nevzlin and tycoon Boris Berezovsky, who lives in Britain." The Washington Post (12/28, A22, Finn, 690K) runs a similar report.

Gazprom Dispute With Belarus Could Disrupt European Gas Supply. The New York Times (12/28, Kramer, 1.16M) reports Gazprom "reacted fiercely on Wednesday to a suggestion from Belarus that it would pull natural gas out of export pipelines rather than pay a higher price for the fuel. Reversing course from its assurances of Tuesday, Gazprom warned Poland, Lithuania and Germany of possible supply disruptions. About 8 percent of the European Union's gas imports pass through Belarus." The Times adds, "As in the dispute with Ukraine, the bargaining has become a test of Belarus's leverage as a transit country for Russian energy and its willingness to risk the energy supplies of its neighbors farther down the pipelines."

The Wall Street Journal (12/28, 2.04M) reports, "Gazprom, which is demanding Belarus pay more than twice the current price for gas next year and hand over a 50% stake in its gas distribution system, refused to back down after Minsk threatened to siphon off Russian natural gas bound for Europe in the event of a suspension of supplies to Belarus. 'If a gas supply contract for next year is not reached, Gazprom will have no grounds for deliveries of gas to Belarus as of 10 a.m. Moscow time on Jan. 1, 2007,' Gazprom Chief Executive Alexei Miller said."

The Financial Times (12/28, Ostrovsky) reports analysts "said Gazprom's reputation could suffer further from the dispute." Gazprom "admitted it would not be able to fully compensate its European customers if Belarus started siphoning off gas from the pipeline, which transports 20 per cent of its gas to Europe." Gazprom "is in a difficult position, partly induced by its own policies towards Ukraine and other former Soviet republics over the past year. If Gazprom turns off gas supplies to Belarus, disrupting supplies to Europe, its reputation for unreliability would suffer further. If it caves in to Belarus's demands, however, it would lose face at home, while also displaying a selective approach to different political regimes in the former Soviet Union."

US, China Increase Maritime-Security Exchanges. The Washington Times (12/28, Halloran, 88K) reports, "The US Coast Guard is quietly expanding exchanges with Chinese maritime-security agencies in a move that reflects the boom in seaborne trade between the two countries." Coast Guard officials say the cooperation, which includes Chinese law-enforcement officers on Coast Guard cutters in the North Pacific and officers from China and America examining port security on each other's coasts, "is justified by growing trade links in spite of often uneasy political relations between the United States and China." The Times adds that the exchanges are also "part of a broader US effort to rebuild military exchanges with China," and "Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates indicated to the Senate Armed Services Committee ahead of his confirmation that he would continue" the effort.

Chinese Hydrogen-Power Entrepreneurs Struggle As System Hampers Innovation. The Washington Post (12/28, A22, Cody, 690K) reports, "As the economy matures, China's government has warned, it must rely increasingly on new technology invented by the Chinese themselves, who are being urged to turn assembly plants into laboratories blooming with a hundred flowers of new ideas. But the experiences of...companies with ambitions to market hydrogen power suggest that China's one-party system and pervasive controls hamper innovation in many fields, from arts to sciences." The Post adds, "Although the need for pollution-free vehicles and renewable energy is clear in China's increasingly choked cities, the future of hydrogen power has remained in the grasp of a powerful officialdom that decides on budget allocations. The government's senior levels repeatedly have endorsed alternative forms of energy but have yet to take decisive steps toward getting hydrogen-powered vehicles onto the streets."

Author Praises Annan's Service At UN. Author William Shawcross writes in the Washington Post (12/28, A27, 690K) that out-going UN Secretary General Kofi Annan "deserves a good sendoff. For 10 years he has persevered with unfailing grace in what really is 'a job from hell.'" Shawcross notes that "tragically for Annan and the United Nations, more than 20 of his best people were brutally murdered in Baghdad by al-Qaeda in August 2003. This assault, together with the political divisions, have crippled the United Nations in Iraq ever since." The U.N. role in Iraq has been "further complicated, if not diminished, by the oil-for-food scandal," he notes. However, Shawcross says it is "wrong to blame all this on Annan -- members of the Security Council, particularly France, Russia and China, were all busily corrupting the program for their own ends. Even the United States and Britain turned a blind eye to sanctions-busting when it helped their ally Jordan." Annan, he concludes, has dealt with problems "with more skill, patience and decency than any recent secretary general. If he was unable to create the decent, reformed, efficient and humane organization he sought, that is because far too few of its members want any such thing."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Outspoken Former Guantanamo Detainee Believe Arrested By ISI. The AP (12/28, Jan) reports, "In his chronicle of life as an inmate at Guantanamo Bay, Afghan writer Abdul Rahim Muslim Dost describes his three years of humiliating detention for alleged ties to al-Qaida. Now, he has lost his liberty again — this time believed jailed by the Pakistani intelligence service for the book's fierce criticism of the agency's role in the U.S.-led war on terrorist groups." The AP notes, "There is no official word on Dost's whereabouts, although the rights group Amnesty International also thinks he is held by the government."

US, Philippines Analyzing DNA To Confirm Death Of Abu Sayyaf Leader. The AP (12/28, Alexander) reports, "Remains believed to be from the chief of the al-Qaida-linked Abu Sayyaf group, who was the target of a monthslong U.S.-backed manhunt, have been found in the southern Philippines, the military said Wednesday. Khaddafy Janjalani is on a U.S. list of wanted terrorists with a $5 million bounty on his head for a series of beheadings, bombings and mass abductions." Philippine Marines Lt. Col. Ariel Caculitan said that "Janjalani was believed to have been killed in a Sept. 4 clash with marines…but DNA tests would be needed for confirmation. … He added the U.S. was providing help in forensic tests." The AP notes, "Caculitan said former Abu Sayyaf members who had surrendered helped troops find the site and claimed Janjalani had been shot in the neck." AFP (12/28) reports Philippine General Hermogenes Esperon "told reporters in Manila the DNA would be checked against that of Khadaffy's older brother Hector Janjalani, now in jail in Manila. … Janjalani's death would be a severe blow to the Abu Sayyaf, a small gang of self-styled Islamic militants that once received funding from Osama bin Laden, he said."

Texas Attorney Glad Client Is Released From Guantanamo. The Austin American-Statesman (12/28, Lindell) reports, "The news arrived in cloak-and-dagger fashion, but for Austin lawyer Dicky Grigg, it was welcome nonetheless." The American-Statesman continues, "Mohammad Akhtiar, his Afghani client who was held as an enemy combatant for 3 1/2 years at the U.S. Naval Station at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, was back in his homeland and traveling toward a reunion with his wife and nine children. … 'One, I'm very pleased and excited that he's released and back to his family,' Grigg said. 'But then, you have to consider that 3 1/2 years were taken out of his life. I'm glad he's home, but it makes you frustrated.'" The American-Statesman adds, "Grigg was among a loose-knit group of lawyers who represented, at no charge, many of the imprisoned enemy combatants in the belief that detention without review by a civilian court violated a basic principle of the U.S. system of justice. … The 'Guantánamo Bar Association' clashed with the Bush administration over where to draw the line between combating terrorism and safeguarding constitutional rights — producing a U.S. Supreme Court ruling in June that allowed detainees to petition for writs of habeas corpus, which challenge the legality of detentions, in federal court. … The Republican-led Congress, saying classified information could be placed at risk in federal court proceedings, followed with legislation stripping federal courts of authority to hear cases from Guantánamo. Detainee cases instead will be heard by military commissions, where an officer acts as judge and at least three officers serve as jurors."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Houston Luggage Theft Probe Continues As FBI Rules Out Terrorism. The Houston Chronicle (12/28, Sallee, 530K) reports, "The 68 pieces of baggage that turned up in a trash bin Tuesday near George Bush Intercontinental Airport were probably stolen by a team of thieves in a single day's work while airline staffers were stretched thin by the demands of holiday travel, a Texas travel adviser theorized Wednesday. … Another possibility — an inside job, with somebody taking the luggage on its way from the airplanes to the baggage-claim area — was not something investigators would talk about. Meanwhile, it looked like business as usual at Bush on Wednesday." The Chronicle notes, "FBI spokesman Orlando Muñoz said there is no evidence that the incident exposed any national security or terrorism vulnerabilities." The AP (12/28) also briefly reports on the stolen luggage, in a widely-distributed story.

Corzine Said To Have Softened Stance On Chemical Security. The New York Times (12/28, Kocieniewski, 1.16M) reports though Jon S. Corzine the senator "was relentless in warning that the nation's chemical plants, and the railways that carry their potentially dangerous cargo, are vulnerable to a devastating terror attack," in his 11 months as New Jersey's governor, he "has taken a far more measured approach to the issue, disappointing some of the chemical security experts who helped him form his proposals in the Senate. … They accuse the governor of being too intent on appeasing the chemical industry, which provides more than 80,000 jobs in the state." However, "Governor Corzine and his staff say that they have quietly pressured companies and railroads to beef up plant security and switch to safer technology."

Judge Rules Against Privileges In 9/11-Related Insurance Case. The New York Law Journal (12/28, Bar) reports, "The insurance broker representing Century 21 Department Stores in its efforts to regain compensation for millions in damages it sustained to its lower Manhattan store following the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks has won a partial attempt to force the insurer overseeing the claim to produce documents it said were privileged." The Journal continues, "Southern District of New York Judge Robert W. Sweet, in OneBeacon Insurance Co. v. Forman International, 04 Civ. 2271, held that OneBeacon Insurance Co. and its attorneys at Cozen O'Connor failed to prove that the attorney-client or work product privileges should be applied in connection with the documents in dispute." The Journal adds, "Sweet also held that, because neither OneBeacon nor its counsel selectively withheld documents based on content, the fairness doctrine could not be applied to this case. … OneBeacon reached a settlement with Century 21 in March 2003 to pay the store $143 million to fully release claims. The insurer later asserted it overpaid the retailer by $52.4 million because Century 21's broker, Forman International, improperly agreed on the retailer's behalf to delete a standard business interruption provision in favor of the business interruption provision proposed by Century 21."

Judge Says He Will Not Allow FEMA To "Run The Clock Out" On Katrina Victims In Texas. In an article appearing on no fewer than 70 news websites, the AP (12/27, Apuzzo) reported FEMA sent letters to about 4,000 Hurricane Katrina victims in Texas last week, "explaining why they were deemed no longer eligible" for federal housing aid and giving them a chance to appeal the decision. "But the program is set to expire at the end of February and the appeal process can take up to three months. US District Judge Richard Leon, who has called the agency's housing program a 'legal disaster' said Wednesday that he wanted to speed up the appeals. 'This is not going to be a run-out-the-clock operation,' Leon said. 'I have no reason to believe FEMA wants that, but if this court gets the impression for one second that FEMA is trying to run the clock out, this court is not going to tolerate that.'"

WAR NEWS:

Bush To Meet With Top National Security Aides On Iraq. The Washington Post (12/28, A4, Abramowitz, White, 690K) reports President Bush's "top national security advisers arrived" at his ranch in Texas "to hone a new Iraq strategy that administration officials said seems increasingly likely to include a surge of additional troops to try to help stabilize the country." Although officials "have said no decisions will be made in the Crawford meeting, Bush seems to be laying the groundwork for one more sustained effort to defeat the Iraq insurgency and stabilize the country politically. Two defense officials said Wednesday that some sort of troop increase appears likely in an effort to contain the violence but that the specific size and nature of such a surge still has to be worked out." White House spokesman Scott Stanzel "took a swipe at Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), the incoming chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, for his comment Tuesday that ordering more troops to Iraq would do little to address the underlying political problems fostering violence." Stanzel said, "I would hope that Senator Biden would wait to hear what the president has to say before announcing what he's opposed to."

The Los Angeles Times (12/28, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports the White House "responded sharply today to a senior Democratic senator's criticism of possible increases in the U.S. military deployment in Iraq, ahead of President Bush's meeting on Thursday with senior national security advisors at his ranch." Deputy White House press secretary Scott Stanzel "took issue with Sen. Joseph R. Biden, Jr. (D-Del.), the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, who said on Tuesday that any troop increase would be 'the absolute wrong strategy.'" Stanzel said, "I hope that Sen. Biden would wait to hear what the president has to say before announcing what he's opposed to." The Times adds Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, Vice President Dick Cheney, Marine Corps Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley, and Deputy National Security Adviser J.D. Crouch will be meeting with Bush.

Iraq Study Group's Impact Assessed. The New York Times (12/28, Shane, 1.16M) reports that Washington's blue-ribbon panels have "a predictable life cycle, which the Iraq Study Group has so far followed to a fault." After "unrealistic expectations, fueled by feverish news coverage," comes "the report's grand unveiling, complete with White House photo op, this time featuring President Bush with the co-chairmen, James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton. And then, inevitably, the letdown." But "whether this group, too, ends up as a footnote to history, or becomes the framework for a new war policy, is unlikely to be settled until well into the new year." Former Sen. Warren Rudman said, "I don't think it's dead at all. Whether its recommendations will ultimately be followed is another question. But with the Democrats in charge of Congress, its findings will certainly get a hearing."

Special Forces Seen As Key To Win In Iraq. In a Washington Times (12/28, 88K) op-ed, Fred Gedrich and Paul E. Vallely say, "Most Americans desire an effective change in current Iraq war strategy and the wider global war against Islamic extremists and nations supporting them. President Bush and the new U.S. defense secretary, Robert Gates, could deliver it by placing experienced unconventional warfare leaders in charge of the war effort." To "prevail, the United States has to transition from a conventional to an unconventional war footing and make the enemy pay a heavy price for its despicable tactics. In Iraq and elsewhere, traditional troops, weapons and tactics are less useful than tools of influence, covert operations and intelligence brought to the battlefield by special operators working harmoniously with indigenous forces and local populations. The prime objective is to create a climate of fear within enemy ranks that breaks its will to continue the armed insurrection against the freely elected Iraqi government." Special Operations Forces "(Rangers, Seals, Delta Force and other special units) leaders and troops are uniquely qualified for this mission."

Gates Authorizes Dispatch Of Additional Army Brigade To Kuwait. The Washington Post (12/28, A24, White, Trejos, 690K) reports, "A brigade of U.S. Army troops is scheduled to deploy to Kuwait early next month to take over as the U.S. Central Command's theater reserve force, which means more than 3,000 additional U.S. troops will move into the region and could be used to support combat in Iraq, Pentagon officials announced yesterday." Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates "approved sending the 2nd Brigade, 82nd Airborne Division overseas after Gen. John P. Abizaid, who leads Central Command, requested the forces to replace the 15th Marine Expeditionary Unit, which was sent into the western province of Anbar this fall. Abizaid requested a brigade -- which is significantly larger than the Marine unit -- to allow for greater flexibility in the region."

Sadr Aide Killed In Raid By US, Iraqi Troops. The Washington Post (12/28, A1, Trejos, Raghavan, 690K) reports Sahib al-Amiri, "a top deputy of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr was killed Wednesday during a raid by U.S. and Iraqi troops in the southern holy city of Najaf, sparking protests from Sadr's followers and complicating an already tense relationship with the powerful anti-American leader." US military officials "declined to confirm that Amiri was a Sadr aide, saying only that he had provided explosives for use against Iraqi and American forces. Sadr officials said Amiri was an aide and a lawyer who ran an educational organization that helped orphans and impoverished children." The incident "comes at a delicate time for the Iraqi political process."

Iraqi Militias, Police Riven By Increasing Political Pressure. The New York Times (12/28, Santora, 1.16M) reports Maj. William Voorhies, the American commander of a military training unit in Baghdad, describes an "increasingly frustrating task — trying to build up Iraqi security forces who themselves are being used as proxies in a spreading sectarian war." Maj. Voorhies said, "I have come to the conclusion that this is no longer America's war in Iraq, but the Iraqi civil war where America is fighting." The Times adds Iraqi forces, "already struggling with corruption and infiltration, have shown little willingness to stand up to political pressure, especially when the Americans are not there to support them. That suggests, the commanders say, that if the Americans leave soon, violence will redouble."

In Letter, Saddam Calls On Iraqis To Unite. The New York Times (12/28, Santora, 1.16M) reports Saddam Hussein, whose execution is expected within 30 days, "said he was prepared to die and sure of his place in heaven as a martyr, and he called on Iraqis to unite, according to a letter that his lawyers said Wednesday had been composed by the former dictator." While "fears that the announcement upholding his death penalty on Tuesday would set off violence appeared not to be immediately borne out," officials were "still concerned about possible public reaction to the execution itself, and some speculated that the hanging would take place in secret and be announced only after the fact." In his "latest letter, Mr. Hussein displayed none of the bombast that had defined his court appearances."

The story was briefly covered by each of the networks last night, with ABC World News (12/27, story 5, 0:35, Gibson, 8.78M) reported the letter contained "unexpected words of restraint from Saddam Hussein who has been sentence in days to come to hanging. In a letter released by his defense team, Hussein writes – 'I call on you the people of Iraq not to hate because it makes you blind and closes all doors of thinking. I also call on you,' he wrote, 'not to hate the people of the other countries that attacked us.'"

The CBS Evening News (12/27, story 4, 1:15, Pinkston, 7.66M) reported, "A pro-Saddam Website threatened retaliation against the US, and carried a letter Saddam reportedly wrote that says, 'Here I offer myself in sacrifice,' and urged Iraqis to 'direct your enmity towards the invaders.' Defiant words from a former ruler who will soon hang like any other Iraqi criminal sentenced to death. The only question is when." NBC Nightly News (12/27, story 6, 0:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Saddam Hussein is urging Iraqis to see his execution as a sacrifice, and as a symbol of a continuing holy war." Saddam is "calling on the Iraqi people to unite and fight US led forces, which he says are trying to destroy that nation."

The Washington Post (12/28, A24, Raghavan, 690K) reports the letter "declared the former president to be victimized by foreign armies but ready to die and 'be with the merciful God.' The letter urged Iraqis not to hate the foreign peoples whose armies invaded the country, just their leaders." Published on "several Iraqi Web sites, the letter was written in ancient Arabic verse." In interviews, "two of Hussein's defense lawyers based in Amman, Jordan, said the letter was authentic and written by Hussein on Nov. 5. That was the day he was sentenced to death by hanging for the killings of 148 Shiite residents of the town of Dujail following an attempt on his life there in 1982."

The Washington Times/AP (12/28, Torchia) reports Hussein "urged Iraqis to embrace 'brotherly coexistence' and not to hate U.S.-led foreign troops in a goodbye letter posted on a Web site Wednesday, a day after Iraq's highest court upheld his death sentence and ordered him hanged within 30 days." Meanwhile, a top government official "said Saddam's execution could proceed without the approval of Iraq's president, meaning there were no more legal obstacles to sending the deposed dictator to the gallows." Against the "backdrop of sectarian killings that have dragged Sunni Arabs and Shiite Muslims into civil warfare over the past year, Saddam urged his countrymen to 'remember that God has enabled you to become an example of love, forgiveness and brotherly coexistence.'" But he "also voiced support for the Sunni Arab-dominated insurgency, saying: 'Long live jihad and the mujahedeen.'"

The Los Angeles Times (12/28, Zavis, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) reports Hussein "declared in a handwritten farewell letter published Wednesday that his execution for crimes against humanity would be a sacrifice for his people, and he urged Iraqis not to give in to hatred." The letter was "released as shootings and explosions rattled Baghdad for another day, and protesters took to the streets of the Shiite holy city of Najaf after an associate of a radical anti-American cleric was killed in a confrontation with Iraqi and foreign troops." Saddam said "he wrote the letter because he was not given a chance to make a final statement when his sentence was handed down."

Iraqis Have Varying Reaction To News Of Saddam Death Sentence. The Financial Times (12/28, Negus,) reports the "news of Saddam Hussein's imminent execution provoked widely differing reactions among Iraqis on Wednesday, with some welcoming the demise of their former persecutor and many afraid that it would cause further disruption to their lives, and others convinced that the president would strike a last-minute deal to avoid death." In Sadr City, "one resident said few of his neighbours actually believed that Mr Hussein would be executed."

Saddam Likely To Be Executed In Private. The Los Angeles Times (12/28, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) reports Saddam "will likely be executed soon at a private gathering of select witnesses, officials close to Iraq's Prime Minister Nouri Maliki said today." Hussein's victims, "particularly those from Dujail, are demanding a public hanging so they can see justice done. But government officials concerned about exacerbating sectarian tensions rejected the idea, said a cabinet member of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, adding the government will likely only release photographs of the hanging to the public."

Saddam's Baath Party Warns Of Retaliation. The International Herald Tribune/AP (12/28) reports Saddam Hussein's Baath Party "threatened Wednesday to retaliate if the ousted Iraqi leader is executed, warning in an Internet posting it would target U.S. interests anywhere." The statement "appeared on a Web site known to represent the Baath, which was disbanded after U.S.-led forces overthrew Saddam in 2003. The site is believed to be run from Yemen, where a number of exiled members of the party are based." The statement "said that if the execution takes place, it would be impossible for the Baath to take part in any prospective negotiations with U.S. and Iraqi officials to reduce the violence in Iraq."

LATimes Criticizes Saddam's Death Sentence. The Los Angeles Times (12/28, 850K) says in an editorial that Saddam's death sentence "and the trial that produced it can be described as very rough justice. By British and U.S. standards, there were lapses in the trial that convicted Hussein of ordering the murders of 148 residents of a Shiite village in 1982. It's also troubling that the Iraqi appeals court that ruled Tuesday that Hussein should be hanged within 30 days took only three weeks to rule on detailed arguments submitted by his lawyers." Assuming that Iraq's "president or vice president could commute Hussein's sentence — and the appeals court insists that its ruling can't be altered — the best argument for mercy is that it might appease Sunnis who regard Prime Minister Nouri Maliki as partial to his fellow Shiites."

Smith's "Stunning Break" With Bush On Iraq Analyzed. The New York Times (12/28, Risen, 1.16M) reports that Sen. Gordon Smith's December 7th speech on the Senate floor on the Iraq war "marked a stunning break with the president." Smith said, "I, for one, am at the end of my rope when it comes to supporting a policy that has our soldiers patrolling the same streets in the same way, being blown up by the same bombs day after day. That is absurd. It may even be criminal." The Times adds the "real impact of the address came not just from Mr. Smith's words, but from the way he delivered them. His somber cadence resonated in a way that made political Washington take notice, transforming him into one of the most talked-about Republicans heading into the new Congress." A White House official "quickly called Mr. Smith to discuss his speech, Mr. Smith said in an interview." Within "days of the Iraq speech, Mr. Smith emerged as a new spokesman for an endangered political species: the moderate Republican." Smith said he "decided not to speak out before the midterm elections, both out of political loyalty and a fear that his words would be drowned out by partisan attacks." Smith "faces re-election in 2008, and some Democrats in Oregon have suggested that his break with the White House was timed to aid his coming campaign, an accusation he adamantly denies."

British Commander Complains UK Troops Underfunded, Neglected. The New York Times (12/28, Cowell, 1.16M) reports the commander of Britain's "7,000 troops in southern Iraq has complained that they are operating in conditions that display 'a generation of underfunding and relative neglect' by successive governments back home." The remarks "by the commander, Maj. Gen. Richard Shirreff, echoed criticism by two other high-ranking officers in recent months, breaking with a tradition of public restraint by military commanders in expressing political views." General Shirreff said, "The nation needs to understand that the quality work done by these courageous men and women out here only happens and can only continue if our soldiers are properly supported back home in terms of the support for training, infrastructure, barracks, accommodation." General Shirreff "did not blame a specific government and directed some of his criticism at the broader relationship between civilians and the military."

US Interrogating Iranian Guards Captured In Baghdad. The CBS Evening News (12/27, story 5, 1:05, Martin, 7.66M) reported, "US intelligence is interrogating senior members of Iran's Revolutionary Guards captured last week inside Iraq. US officials say the two carried documents directly linking the Iranian government to attacks on American troops. According to these officials, the captured documents show Iran was providing weapons, including advanced explosive devices to one of Iraq's Shiite militias and helping them plan future operations in Baghdad. The two Iranians were captured in a compound belonging to the powerful Shiite leader Abdul Aziz al Hakim who earlier this month met with President Bush in Washington."

Marines Combat Snipers, IEDs Along Al Anbar Supply Route. The Los Angeles Times (12/28, Perry, 850K) reports on the heavy attacks Marines undergo on MSR Mobile, the road that "serves as a main link between several U.S. bases" in Iraq's Al Anbar province. "In the last two weeks, two Marines with Company B of the 2nd Assault Amphibian Battalion from Camp Lejeune, N.C., have fallen to snipers' bullets." The Times sees this road "as a microcosm of the Marine mission in Al Anbar: nothing likely to be made into a Hollywood war movie, just a 'persistent presence' to wear down the insurgency." The article notes a new strategy insurgents are using in which a fake roadside bomb is planted in hopes of attracting US bomb removal personnel, who then fall under sniper fire.

Pakistan Announces Plans For Border Fence To Hem In Taliban. The Christian Science Monitor (12/28, Montero, 59K) reports Pakistan has "announced a new solution to the problem" caused by Taliban militia "on its western frontier: mines and fences along the Afghan border, designed to keep militants from crossing in and out of the tribal zone." Western "capitals, newspapers, and military intelligence reports are increasingly voicing concern that the source of the Taliban's growing power rests in Pakistan and that Pakistan is not doing enough to quell it. This latest approach, beyond being quixotic, is also risky, analysts say: If the fence doesn't work, Pakistan may have exhausted all apparent options - and possibly its credibility, too."

Special Ops Soldiers Say Senior Taliban Leader Had Been Released In 2002. The Washington Times (12/28, Scarborough, 88K) reports Special Operations soldiers "say that if the command in Afghanistan had listened to them four years ago, there would have been no need this month for a U.S. air strike that killed senior Taliban leader Mullah Akhtar Mohammed Osmani. He already would have been locked up." As "reported in 2002 by The Washington Times, an Army Green Beret 'A Team' said it captured Osmani in a village near Kandahar, the Taliban's birthplace." Special Forces soldier said the US "prison at the Bagram military base north of Kabul later released Osmani, the Special Forces soldiers said. They suspect Osmani convinced his captors that he was not a Taliban leader but a poor villager. The soldiers said they heard later that he crossed into Pakistan and reorganized his forces." The Times adds the "Combined Forces Command in Kabul said that on Dec. 19 Osmani was identified, based on intelligence reports, as riding in a vehicle near the Pakistan border in a deserted area. An air strike killed him and two unidentified companions."

Air Force Considering Outside Management For Next Generation GPS System. The Wall Street Journal (12/28, Pasztor, 2.04M) reports the Air Force is "considering a potential new approach to managing multibillion-dollar space projects that could help it avoid the costly troubles that plagued previous efforts and lead to a lucrative new role for private-sector contractors." But the "new approach could present its own share of problems, including the potential for conflicts of interest." The Air Force is "considering hiring outside engineers or consultants to oversee systems integration of its next-generation navigational satellites, according to industry and government officials." Hiring a "separate project integrator could set a precedent for future projects and would be a tacit acknowledgment that both Air Force Space Command and the Pentagon's massive weapons-buying bureaucracy lack the necessary expertise to perform the required oversight role." The project "involves setting up a next-generation U.S. global positioning system, which is widely used by the military and supports consumer applications such as in-car driving directions." The preliminary specifications "for the system call for as many as two dozen satellites costing $100 million or more."

Connecticut US Attorney Named Gang-Violence Point-man At DOJ. The AP (12/28, Christoffersen) reports, "Connecticut's top federal prosecutor has been appointed to a national position focused on combatting violence amid signs that a three-year lull in crime is ending, officials said Wednesday." The AP continues, "U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor has been named associate deputy attorney general at the U.S. Justice Department, where he will lead a team focused on violent crime and initiatives to crack down on gangs and illegal guns. He also plans to remain U.S. attorney for Connecticut for at least six months. … 'I'm honored that they asked me to do it,' O'Connor said. 'To me this is a great opportunity to be involved on the national level on the same issues I've been involved in on a local level.'" The AP adds, "Preliminary FBI data released last week showed that murders and robberies continued to rise across the country during the first six months of 2006. Violent crime figures are on pace for a second straight annual increase. Violent crime rose 2.2 percent nationally last year - the first increase since 2001. .. .Authorities around the country also are worried about a resurgence in gangs. O'Connor held the state's first gang summit in September, and his office has been stepping up prosecutions." The AP notes, "O'Connor, who was appointed U.S. attorney in 2002 and starts his new position next week, also has been active in Project Safe Neighborhoods, which targets gun-carrying felons and has recovered about 4,000 guns over the past five years, he said. … His appointment comes nearly a year after Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced an expanded program to combat gang violence, including an infusion of federal funds for cities with gang problems. His plan also called for expanding Project Safe Neighborhoods to include more anti-gang efforts and a new national gang task force."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Apple Reportedly Falsified Files On Jobs' Stock Options. The Financial Times (12/28, Waters) reports, "Steve Jobs, chief executive of Apple Computer, was handed 7.5m stock options in 2001 without the required authorisation from the company's board of directors, according to people familiar with the matter." The Times continues, "Records that purported to show a full board meeting had taken place to approve Mr Jobs' remuneration, as required by Apple's procedures, were later falsified. These are now among the pieces of evidence being weighed by the Securities and Exchange Commission as it decides whether to pursue a case against the company or any individuals over the affair, according to these people." The Times adds, "News of the irregularities, which is expected to be revealed in a regulatory filing by Apple before the end of this week, will add to pressure that has been growing on one of Silicon Valley's most highly-regarded companies since the middle of 2005. … Apple is among more than 160 companies that have owned up to stock option backdating – handing options to executives and other employees at exercise prices that were set in hindsight at favourable levels – a scandal which has led to the departure of a number of chief executives." The times notes, "The latest revelation is likely to add to questions about Apple's disclosures about its internal investigation into the backdating issue. In October, the company largely exonerated Mr Jobs over the matter, saying that while he had been 'aware' of the backdating 'in a few instances', he 'did not receive or otherwise benefit from these grants and was unaware of the accounting implications'."

The AP (12/28, Wong) reports, "Wall Street ultimately shrugged off a report Wednesday that federal prosecutors are investigating whether former Apple Computer Inc. officials forged documents to maximize executives' profit from stock options. … The legal publication that detailed the federal probe also reported that CEO Steve Jobs has hired outside attorneys to represent him in the investigation." The AP continues, "Shares of the iPod and Macintosh computer maker went on a roller-coaster ride in trading Wednesday, falling almost 5 percent before rebounding to close up a penny at $81.52 on the Nasdaq. … In a morning note, UBS Investment Research analyst Ben Reitzes called investors' fears 'overblown.' … 'Investors seem to be reacting to the mention of Steve Jobs,' Reitzes said in his note. 'We believe it could make sense to obtain counsel, given his immense personal fortune and influence.'" The AP adds, "The Recorder, a San Francisco-based publication owned by American Lawyer Media, reported late Tuesday that federal prosecutors are looking into forged documents at Apple related to administering stock options. The report cited people with knowledge of the case who requested anonymity because the case is the subject of criminal and civil government investigations. … Apple spokesman Steve Dowling said the company is providing the Securities and Exchange Commission with the results of an internal investigation into its practices for granting stock options, but had no further comment Wednesday."

Market Watch (12/28) reports, "Apple had previously said that its own internal investigation found no misconduct by Jobs or other senior executives. The company did say that its probe had raised concerns about the actions of two unidentified former executives." Market Watch adds, "Further details about Apple's situation are expected to be unveiled Friday, when the company plans to file several quarterly reports and its annual report for the fiscal year ended Sept. 30. … Apple has delayed the filings amid an internal probe into the backdating of employee stock-option grants."

Bloomberg (12/28, King, Guglielmo) reports, "Apple is among the biggest names caught in a stock-option scandal that has widened to more than 190 companies. In June the maker of the iPod music player began an internal review of its grants, including one to Jobs. Apple said in October said it found 15 misdated grants from 1997 to 2002. … When Apple released the results of its three-month investigation in October, it didn't disclose any falsified documents. The company said it found backdated option awards on 15 occasions from 1997 to January 2002. While Jobs, 51, was aware of some instances, he didn't benefit, Apple said."

Nabors Industries To Relaunch Options Review. The Wall Street Journal (12/28, A3) reports, "Nabors Industries Ltd. said it is initiating a further review of its option-granting practices in light of 'issues raised' in an article published by The Wall Street Journal." The Journal continues, "The oil-and-gas driller said this review follows an internal review earlier this year of its stock-option practices going back to 1998. It said this initial review 'did not suggest that there was reason to question the propriety' of its option-granting practices. … The Journal article, published yesterday, said that Eugene Isenberg, the chief executive officer of Nabors, is among the highest-paid corporate executives in history, receiving more than $450 million in compensation over the past 19 years, largely due to stock-option grants whose value, the article contends, was enhanced by certain 'controversial moves' made by the company, which has U.S. headquarters in Houston but is registered in Bermuda." The Journal notes, "The moves cited by the Journal included allowing Mr. Isenberg to trade in certain worthless options for new ones with lower exercise prices and 'reloading' Mr. Isenberg with new options when he cashed in others. … In separate options-related news, HCC Insurance Holdings Inc. said it has completed an independent review of its stock-option-granting practice and recorded a gross noncash compensation expense of $26.6 million related to corrections of errors from 1997 to 2005."

France To Fine GLG, Deutsche Bank In Hedge Fund Case. The Wall Street Journal (12/28, C3, MacDonald) reports, "France's markets regulator will fine hedge fund GLG Partners LP and Deutsche Bank AG for abuses arising out of a convertible-bond offer for French telecommunications-equipment maker Alcatel SA, according to people familiar with the matter." The Journal continues, "The Autorité des Marchés Financiers, or AMF, is following the recommendations of a preliminary report it received in October that was compiled by one of its officials. … The AMF has decided to increase the fine levied on London-based GLG to €1.2 million ($1.6 million) from €1 million recommended in the report and reduce Deutsche Bank's fine to about €300,000 from €1.5 million, these people said." The Journal adds, "Alcatel SA, now Alcatel-Lucent, announced Dec. 12, 2002, that it would offer between $640 million and $835 million in bonds that would convert into shares. .. .The AMF was investigating whether hedge funds acted on information offered by Deutsche Bank before the bonds' issuance was publicly announced. .. While it is common practice by banks to preview deals to select clients ahead of their announcement, it is against market regulations in Europe to act on that information."

Former KLA-Tencor Chairman Resigns From Board. Bloomberg (12/28, King) reports, "Former KLA-Tencor Corp. Chairman Jon Tompkins resigned from the board, making him the fourth senior official to sever ties with the company since it discovered problems related to the backdating of stock option grants." Bloomberg continues, "Tompkins resigned on Dec. 21, San Jose, California-based KLA-Tencor said in a U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission filing today. Tompkins, who is also chairman of Electro Scientific Industries Inc., quit for personal reasons, KLA-Tencor spokeswoman Kyra Whitten said. She declined to comment further." Bloomberg adds, "Tompkins served as chief executive officer from May 1997 until July 1998, then as chairman until June 1999. The company said in September it would restate results from 1997 to 2002 after a special committee found incorrect dates were used in granting stock options to executives. … KLA-Tencor, the second-largest U.S. chip-equipment maker, said on Oct. 16 it found $400 million in costs related to backdated stock options and canceled grants to another former CEO, Kenneth Schroeder. … General Counsel Stuart J. Nichols resigned that day and KLA-Tencor said it terminated 'all aspects of its employment relationship' with Schroeder, who ran the company from 1999 to 2005, succeeding Tompkins. A day later, Chairman Kenneth Levy retired. The company said it would reprice options held by Levy and other executives. … KLA-Tencor is among more than 190 companies to disclose internal or federal investigations of stock-option practices to determine if grant dates were manipulated to enrich employees. The SEC, the Justice Department and Internal Revenue Service are looking for evidence that companies broke securities or tax laws by backdating grants to coincide with days when share prices were low."

Frank Criticizes New SEC Executive Pay Rules. The Wall Street Journal (12/28, A2, Hughes, 2.04M) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission's decision to reverse course and relax disclosure rules on executive pay isn't sitting well with the Democrat who will head the House Financial Services Committee in the new Congress." Rep. Barney Frank "said he is 'very disappointed with both the substance and the procedure' involved in the rule changes, which the SEC announced late Friday, just before the long Christmas weekend." The rules, "which apply to publicly held companies, would reduce the amount of top executives' compensation that many companies would be required to disclose next year." Frank's committee "has oversight of the SEC, and he could hold hearings on the executive-pay rules. He has already said he would push for legislation to allow shareholders to vote on executive compensation."

USA Today (12/28, 6B, 2.27M) quotes Frank saying, "Backtracking by the SEC on this important matter of stock options reinforces my determination that Congress must act to deal with the problem of executive compensation that is now unconstrained by anything except the self-restraint of top executives." The Washington Post (12/28, D1, Hilzenrath, 690K) runs a similar story headlined "New SEC Pay Rule To Benefit Executives," in which it mentions Frank's criticism and says "the SEC action reflects the confusion and criticism that surround stock options, which have created great wealth for many executives and have been criticized as contributing to some of the worst corporate scandals. In recent months, many companies have been examining whether option grants were improperly backdated to maximize their value to executives, and some corporate chiefs have lost their jobs."

Editorial Criticizes DOJ's "Thompson Memo" Tactics. The Harrisburg Patriot-News (PA) (12/28) editorializes, "Reacting to pressure by Arlen Specter and others on the 'Thompson Memorandum,' the Justice Department has proposed guidelines on what critics contend have been coercive and unconstitutional tactics used in investigations of corporations. … But the new guidelines still fall short of adequately protecting constitutional rights of employees. Specter and his allies, who include former Pennsylvania governor and U.S. Attorney General Dick Thornburgh and incoming Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., should continue pushing." The Patriot-News continues, "A memorandum issued in 2003 by then Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson issued a number of factors prosecutors should consider in deciding whether to bring criminal charges against a company. One of them took heavily into account the degree of a company's cooperation with investigators. … As a result, critics contend companies have gone too far and pressured employees to do such things as waive attorney-client privileges and other protections. While this may aid the company, it can expose individuals." The Patriot-News adds, "Specter has said he will re-introduce legislation in the next Congress that would prohibit the Justice Department from pressuring corporations to waive their rights to preserve conversations and other information shared with lawyers as confidential; allow corporations to continue paying employees' lawyers fees without threat of retribution from prosecutors; and bar the department from considering how cooperative a corporation has been in determining whether to file charges. … The Thompson Memorandum remains in effect, but investigators must show a 'legitimate need' to obtain privileged information and must obtain written approve from a deputy attorney general before pursuing them. … This is unsatisfactory in that we are talking about constitutional rights still being left to the discretion of too few in the Justice Department."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Probing Alleged Fraud In Detroit City Lease. The Detroit News (12/28, Egan) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department is investigating possible fraud in a building lease held by Detroit's Employment and Training Department after an audit identified $1.5 million in apparent overcharges, sources familiar with the investigation said." The News continues, "The Detroit City Council allocated $5.3 million at the end of 1999 to cover five years of lease payments on the building at 1300 Rosa Parks, but city payments totaled $10.7 million after 39 months, the audit said. … The building is owned by Hampton Ridge Properties LLC, which is controlled by Grosse Pointe Farms businessman Cullan Meathe, a major donor to several Detroit politicians and co-owner of Metro Cars Inc." The News adds, "Detroit lawyer Steve Fishman, who represents Meathe, said the case is essentially a landlord-tenant dispute. 'My understanding is that most, if not all, of the money in dispute has been paid back to the city,' Fishman said. … The city-commissioned audit, by the Whall Group of Auburn Hills, found in 2003 that Hampton Ridge charged the city for insurance and other expenses the company was supposed to pay; charged the property taxes for other buildings or for taxes it never paid; and submitted duplicate invoices for security, taxes, insurance and other expenses." The News notes, "Federal investigators also are reviewing allegations that a subcontractor supplied Hampton Ridge Properties two sets of invoices -- a lower one to be paid by Hampton Ridge and a higher one to be submitted to the city for reimbursement, sources familiar with the investigation said. … The inquiry is one of several investigations at Detroit City Hall that have led to the indictment of two former City Council members and scrutiny of city contracts at Cobo Center and elsewhere. Justice Department officials refused to confirm or deny the lease investigation."

Murders Up In Many US Cities. The AP (12/28, Matthews) reports, "After many years of decline, the number of murders climbed this year in New York and many other major U.S. cities, reaching their highest levels in a decade in some places." The AP continues, "Among the reasons given: gangs, drugs, the easy availability of illegal guns, a disturbing tendency among young people to pull guns when they do not get the respect they demand, and, in Houston at least, an influx of Hurricane Katrina evacuees." The AP adds, "In New York, where the city reported 579 homicides through Dec. 24 - a nearly 10 percent increase from the year before - the spike is mostly the result of an unusually large number of 'reclassified homicides,' or those involving victims who were shot or stabbed years ago but did not die until this year. Thirty-five such deaths have been added to this year's toll, compared with an annual average of about a dozen. … At the same time, Police Department spokesman Paul Browne noted that this year's total is only slightly higher than last year's 539 homicides - the city's lowest death toll in more than 40 years." The AP notes, 'Browne blamed the rise in part on the availability of guns, particularly weapons from out of state. The city this year sued dozens of out-of-state gun shops that it says are responsible for many of the illegal weapons on the streets of New York. … In Chicago, homicides through the first 11 months of the year were up 3.3 percent compared with the same period in 2005, reversing a four-year decline. A police spokeswoman said gang violence has been a contributing factor."

Ryan Sues To Force Payment Of State Pension. The Chicago Tribune (12/28, Higgins, 617K) reports, "Former Gov. George Ryan filed a lawsuit Wednesday against state retirement officials, battling to keep a pension of more than $60,000 a year that Ryan says he earned before the scandals that led to his wide-ranging fraud convictions in April." The General Assembly Retirement System board "voted unanimously last month to cancel Ryan's entire $197,000-a-year pension in light of the convictions. But that decision was 'erroneous,' Ryan's lawyers argued in the lawsuit filed in Cook County Circuit Court. They contend that Ryan's racketeering and fraud convictions dealt only with his actions as secretary of state and governor — not his 24 previous years in public office." The Tribune notes, "According to the retirement board, public officials who commit felonies relating to their "official duties" forfeit the right to receive any pension from the state."

Texas Couple Victims Of $2 Million Mortgage Fraud. WFAA-TV Dallas (12/27, Harris) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "Misfortune is not the only reason 3500 homes are posted for foreclosure next month in North Texas. The FBI says mortgage fraud has reached epidemic proportions. One couple, who found they were major property owners in North Texas without ever signing any papers, has felt the epidemic first-hand." Paul and Jackie Dyl "were victims of identity theft and mortgage fraud to the tune of more than $2 million. The checks and balances that might be expected to be in place when getting a mortgage failed, six times. … The Dyls contacted the FBI but nothing has happened. They ultimately took their case to the Cheyenne Wyoming Police Department, which took their complaint."

Credit Agencies Said To Take Only "Ineffectual" Action Against Fraud. The Boston Globe (12/28, Healy, 413K) reported on "the glacial and ineffectual response of the three giant keepers of consumer credit records -- Experian, Equifax, and TransUnion -- to any errors in their files, even those that appear to result from fraud. Until the errors are corrected, debt collectors will try again and again to squeeze out a payment. … The local, state, and federal law enforcement response to complaints of identity fraud is similarly passive, despite the huge volume of complaints -- 255,000 last year to the Federal Trade Commission alone. Consumers are left to fend for themselves -- a recipe for frustration and worse." The Globe notes that Boston resident Susan Litchfield was a victim of credit card fraud and "wrote to the three companies, telling them of the apparent fraud, to no avail. She said she filed a complaint with the FTC, and she called the FBI and US Secret Service," but she is yet to undo the damage to her credit.

Mississippi Women Ordered To Pay Restitution For Katrina Relief Fraud. The Scott County (MS) Times (12/27, Phillips) reported, "A federal court has ordered two Morton women to pay restitution fines and conduct community service for their part in a scam to secure FEMA funds following Hurricane Katrina. One of the women will also serve time in prison, the office of United States Attorney Dunn Lampton announced earlier this month. Stephanie Fontan was sentenced to serve eight months in prison and to pay restitution to FEMA in the amount of $6,000. Glenda Spangler was ordered to pay $4,358 in restitution to FEMA. In addition, both women were ordered to conduct 40 hours of community service."

Former Us Weekly Columnist Convicted Of Child Enticement. The AP (12/28) reports, "Former Us Weekly gossip columnist Timothy McDarrah has been found guilty of charges related to soliciting sex with a minor. McDarrah, a former reporter at the Las Vegas Sun, was arrested last year in New York after soliciting sex from an undercover federal agent posing as a 13-year-old girl." The

AP notes, "McDarrah, 44, responded in June 2005 to a posting on the craigslist.com Web site offering introductions to the "freshest, youngest" girls in New York, an FBI affidavit said. The gossip writer told an undercover FBI agent, who had posted the advertisement to lure pedophiles, that he would pay $200 for sex with a 13-year-old girl, the affidavit said."

Kansas Judge Won't Reinstate Charges Against Abortion Doctor. The Washington Post/AP (12/28, A18, Hanna) reports, "A judge refused Wednesday to reinstate criminal charges against a Wichita abortion doctor, only hours after the outgoing attorney general named a special prosecutor to handle the case. Last week, state Attorney General Phill Kline, a vocal abortion opponent, filed 30 charges against George Tiller, accusing him of performing 15 illegal late-term abortions in 2003 on patients ages 10 to 22 and not properly reporting details to the state." Sedgwick County Judge Paul W. Clark "dismissed the charges on jurisdictional grounds later the same day. Kline this week asked Clark to reinstate the charges, but the judge rejected that request during a hearing Wednesday." The Los Angeles Times (12/28, Simon, 850K) also reports the story.

Gibbons Won't Face Prosecution. The AP (12/28, Hennessey) reports, "Nevada Gov.-elect Jim Gibbons will not be prosecuted on allegations that he assaulted a cocktail waitress in a parking garage three weeks before the election, authorities said Wednesday. There was insufficient evidence to prove criminal charges against Gibbons beyond a reasonable doubt, Clark County District Attorney David Roger said." Said Roger, "You may consider the case against Gov.-elect Jim Gibbons closed."

Fairfax Police Eye Links Between Assault, Slayings. The Washington Times (12/28, Wagner) reports, "Fairfax County police are trying to determine whether the assault on a Springfield woman alone in her home on Christmas Eve is related to the unsolved killings of two women nearby." The Times continues, ""There's certainly a possibility of a linkage in the other cases," said Fairfax County police spokeswoman Officer Camille Neville, 'but there's nothing at this time to confirm it.' … Police said a man forced his way into a house near Frontier Drive on Sunday between 8 and 9:40 p.m. and assaulted a 62-year-old woman. Police have not disclosed the location of the house. … The woman, who was found by a relative, was hospitalized with a puncture wound to her arm and other injuries that were not life-threatening. Investigators interviewed the woman at Inova Fairfax Hospital. She described her attacker only as a man wearing white or gray clothing." The Times adds, "The assault occurred about a mile from houses where two women were killed in recent months. … Marion Newman, 74, was found dead inside her home in the 7100 block of Reservoir Road about 11:15 a.m. Nov. 21. A friend said she had missed a dinner appointment a day earlier. … Police found signs of a struggle but no forced entry. … At about 6:10 p.m. on Aug. 14, a friend found Marion Barbara Marshall, 72, slain inside her home two miles away in the 6600 block of Bostwick Drive. .. .Both women had been beaten to death."

Inmate Suicides Linked To Solitary Confinement. USA Today (12/28, 1A, Johnson) reports, "The number of suicides in the nation's two largest state prison systems is ticking upward, and authorities in California and Texas are linking the increase to the rising number of inmates kept in solitary confinement." USA continues, "In California, which has the largest state prison system with about 170,000 inmates, there have been 41 suicides this year, the most in at least six years and a 17% increase from 2005. Although an estimated 5% of California's inmates are housed in solitary confinement — also known as "administrative segregation" — 69% of last year's suicides occurred in units where inmates are isolated for 23 hours a day, according to state Department of Corrections records. About half the suicides this year were in such units." USA adds, "In Texas' prison system, which has 169,000 inmates, there have been 24 suicides this year, up from 22 in 2005. Most of the inmates who killed themselves were in some form of solitary confinement, says John Moriarty, inspector general for the prison system. .. .Texas prisons also are reporting a 17% increase in attempted suicides: 652 so far this year, compared with 559 in 2005. The number of attempted suicides this year is the most in nearly a decade, according to state prison records. Statistics on attempted suicides in California prisons were not immediately available." USA notes, "The figures from California and Texas are fueling a debate over whether solitary confinement is the best way to control or punish violent or dangerous inmates, particularly those who are mentally ill. .. .More than 70,000 of the 1.5 million inmates in state and federal prisons are kept in isolation, a reflection of get-tough policies designed to separate rival gang members and those who have gotten into fights while behind bars."

DC Police Chief Stepping Down Amid Praise, Criticism. The Washington Post (12/28, A1, Klein, Thompson) reports, "Charles H. Ramsey arrived in spring 1998 as the District's newly minted police chief with a mandate to cut spiraling crime, build stronger relations with the community and reform a department tainted by scandal." The Post continues, "Under his watch, crime has dropped, standards have become tighter and the public has received access to more public safety information than ever, due in part to a Web site that charts robberies, burglaries and other offenses by the block." The Post adds, "Ramsey, a career cop who got as much attention for his personality as his policies, leaves office today as the city's longest-serving chief in more than three decades. As a master of the sound bite, he often spouted off about crimes and railed about topics that were beyond his control, including irresponsible parents and failing schools. .. .His critics -- in the police union, on the D.C. Council and in some crime-ravaged neighborhoods -- view him as a showboat. In many parts of the city, residents say that they don't see enough officers on patrol and that crimes are not investigated quickly or thoroughly. Inside the agency, morale is low, with officers saying that Ramsey overworked them by declaring crime emergencies that took away days off and lasted for months. … But Michael A. Mason, executive assistant director of the FBI, said public relations is a 'huge part' of the job. 'What police do is the embodiment of public relations,' said Mason, who once headed the FBI's Washington Field Office."

The Washington Times (12/28, Cella) reports, "Chief Charles H. Ramsey says that he will leave the Metropolitan Police Department next week after eight years and eight months on the job confident that he has done what he was hired to do. … 'When other agencies look at the Metropolitan Police Department, it's a respected organization,' he said. 'That's what I'm most proud of.'" The Times continues, 'Chief Ramsey, 56, will step down Tuesday, the day Adrian M. Fenty is sworn in as mayor. … The District's only police chief to be hired from outside the city, Chief Ramsey reflected on his accomplishments during an interview last week in his office, which by then had been stripped of the mementos accumulated during a 38-year career in law enforcement." The Times adds, "Upon his arrival in 1998, the Metropolitan Police Department was mired in mismanagement and scandal. Top officials were under criminal investigation, poor recruiting and standards gave rise to second-rate officers, technology and information systems were substandard, facilities were crumbling, and officers were driving around in 10-year-old squad cars with used tires bought from the U.S. Park Police. … Chief Ramsey helped secure $100 million in federal funding to rebuild the department's infrastructure. He upgraded radios, started a mounted unit, equipped a bicycle unit, instituted uniform training standards, and restarted an aviation unit that had been shut down in 1996 and had its helicopters sold because of a budget shortfall."

CIVIL LAW:

Judge Vacates $6.5 Million Wrongful Prosecution Jury Award. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/28) reports, "A federal judge has thrown out a jury award of more than $6.5 million to a former policeman" in Chicago "who claimed two FBI agents framed him for murder and kidnapping. Steven Manning spent 14 years in prison - eight on death row - before the charges were dropped," and Manning claimed in his lawsuit that FBI Special Agents Robert Buchan and Gary Miller "framed him for the crimes after he tried to stop working as an FBI informant." However, "Manning has lost a separate civil lawsuit he had filed against the federal government on the same allegations," and yesterday, "U.S. District Judge Matthew Kennelly cited Manning's failure to win that second lawsuit as the reason for vacating the jury's award for damages." The AP notes, "Miller has retired from the FBI. Buchan was still working for the bureau."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Gonzales Considers Probe Of Duke Lacrosse Prosecution. WSOC-TV, Charlotte, NC (12/27, 5:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "Meanwhile US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales already said he's thinking about opening an investigation into Nifong's handling of the Duke Lacrosse rape case."

WGHP-TV, Greensboro, Winston, Salem, High Point, NC (12/27, 8:00 a.m.) broadcasted, "Defense attorneys are pushing for Federal involvement in the case asking Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to start a civil rights investigation."

FBI, Mississippi Authorities Investigating Alleged Prisoner Abuse. The AP (12/28) reports, "The FBI and the Mississippi Bureau of Investigation are looking into allegations of prisoner abuse in the Pearl River County jail. At least six inmates filed statements with Hancock County judges and as many as 10 or 11 told of beatings while making court appearances. They said they were beaten by jailers, attacked by other prisoners as corrections officers stood by, and they received slow medical treatment, among other complaints, a pair of Hancock County judges said." The AP notes, "Pearl River County Sheriff Joe Stuart confirmed the reports of abuse and the investigation. … In addition to the claims by prisoners, Stuart said residents of both counties have come to him with complaints, which he forwarded to the FBI to avoid the appearance of a conflict of interest. 'I have no problems with being investigated,' Stuart said."

Civilian Review Of Atlanta-Area Police Deaths Sought. The AP (12/28, Weber) reports, "Community activists on Wednesday called for the creation of civilian review boards to investigate police misconduct complaints, citing the fatal shooting of an elderly woman by Atlanta police and the killings of 12 other people by suburban DeKalb County officers this year. … 'The police, no matter how difficult their job, are not exempt from community scrutiny,' said the Rev. Joseph Lowery, co-founder of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference and chairman of the Coalition for The People's Agenda." The AP continues, "Lowery was joined by close to a dozen other activists. He said that the civilian review boards should have subpoena power and that Atlanta Mayor Shirley Franklin had told him she was not opposed to the idea." The AP adds, "DeKalb County Chief Executive Vernon Jones said he would take Lowery's suggestion under advisement. … The district attorney's office is already investigating the 12 lethal shootings by the DeKalb County Police Department. In addition, the Justice Department is 'gathering information' about the shootings, according to a letter from the agency to a community activist. … The call for the review boards comes in the wake of the Nov. 21 fatal shooting of Kathryn Johnston by Atlanta police during a raid in search of a drug suspect. Police say Johnston fired at them first, wounding three officers, and they shot back. Family members said Johnston was 92; a medical examiner said she was 88. … Johnston's death is being investigated by local agencies and the FBI."

The Los Angeles Times (12/28, Jarvie) reports, "A civilian review board, Lowery said, was vital in restoring trust in local law enforcement. … Atlanta already has a Civilian Review Board that examines allegations of excessive force, serious bodily injury or death resulting from the action of police officers. But the board, formed in 1996, has not reviewed a case since 2002. It has no subpoena power and requires citizens to file a complaint and waive their right to sue." The Times adds, "A number local and federal organizations are examining the recent shootings. In Atlanta, the FBI is already investigating the shooting of Johnston. In DeKalb, the district attorney's office is investigating the 12 lethal shootings by police officers. .. The Justice Department, along with the FBI, is also gathering information about the case, but has yet to open a federal investigation. According to the National Assn. for Civilian Oversight of Law Enforcement, 71 of the nation's 100 largest cities have citizen review mechanisms."

Massachusetts Court Will Not Force Gay Marriage Vote. The AP (12/28, Lindsay) reports, "Massachusetts' highest court said Wednesday it has no authority to force lawmakers to vote on a proposed constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage. But it rebuked the Legislature for its 'indifference to, or defiance of, its constitutional duties.'" The AP continues, "The unanimous 7-0 ruling - and the stinging reproach - leave the fate of the amendment up in the air in the only state that allows gay marriage." The AP adds, "Opponents of gay marriage have collected 170,000 signatures in favor of an amendment to end the practice. But the measure needs the Legislature's approval to appear on the 2008 ballot, and lawmakers refused to vote on the proposal last month. Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican expected to run for president in 2008, and other opponents of gay marriage responded by suing to try to force the lawmakers to act. … In its ruling, the Supreme Judicial Court - the same court that ruled in 2003 that the Massachusetts Constitution gives gays the right to marry - said it cannot force a vote. It said that the Legislature's obligation to vote was 'beyond serious debate,' but that the most the court could do was remind lawmakers of that duty. … The proposed amendment needs the approval of lawmakers in two consecutive two-year sessions to appear on the 2008 ballot. The last day of the current session is Tuesday. If lawmakers adjourn without taking up the amendment, the measure will die."

The Los Angeles Times (12/28, Barry, 850K) reports, "If the lawmakers adjourn Jan. 2 without a vote, as many predict they will, the measure to repeal gay marriage in Massachusetts will die. To appear on the ballot, a citizen initiative must be approved by at least a quarter of the legislature in two consecutive sessions." Romney "has been critical of the lawmakers' inaction. Romney was a lead plaintiff in the suit brought by opponents of gay marriage, which argued that lawmakers were stripping voters of their right to amend the state constitution."

Deputy In Mel Gibson Arrest Claims Harassment. The Los Angeles Times (12/28, Blankstein) reports, "Six months after he arrested Mel Gibson for drunk driving in Malibu, a Los Angeles County Sheriff's deputy claims he's being harassed for his action by officials who question whether he leaked a report detailing the actor's anti-Semitic rant to the news media." The Times continues, "Deputy James Mee's attorney said Wednesday his client was abruptly transferred from patrolling Malibu to another assignment in Agoura Hills and unfairly singled out for scrutiny by his supervisors. … Attorney Richard Shinee also said sheriff's officials subjected him to a three-hour-long interrogation and served a search warrant on his home last September, taking a home computer and phone records. … 'His life and career would be a lot different had he not made that arrest,' Shinee told The Times." The Times adds, "The Sheriff's Department has already come under fire for initially telling reporters that Gibson was arrested 'without incident' even though Mee's arrest report said the actor/director was belligerent, profane and unleashed a 'barrage of anti-Semitic remarks.' … Mee's report was leaked to TMZ.com, a celebrity news website." The Times notes, "Neal Tyler, the division chief who oversees the Sheriff's Department's Lost Hills station, where Gibson was booked, said he knew of no problems with Mee's treatment and said the deputy is in no way being singled out. … 'I disagree with the assessment that personnel in the department or at the station have been relating to him or supervising him in an unfair manner,' Tyler said."

ANTITRUST:

New Jersey Orders Muni Firms To Disclose Subpoenas. Bloomberg (12/28, Cataldo) reports, "New Jersey is demanding that financial firms seeking state business disclose whether they have been subpoenaed or audited by the government." Bloomberg continues, "Treasury officials told firms applying to work for the state by investing proceeds from a planned bond sale to describe pending litigation and 'federal or state investigations or audits, subpoenas or other information requests' since 2002, according to a Dec. 18 request for proposals. Similar documents in September and November didn't mention subpoenas or audits." Bloomberg adds, "The requirement comes one month after federal investigators raided three brokers in the widest-ever criminal probe of the municipal bond market. The Justice Department, the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Internal Revenue Service are probing whether bankers and brokers conspired to fix prices on financial products sold to local governments when they invested proceeds from bond sales. … Investigators last month demanded information from more than a dozen banks and insurers and raided the brokers as part of the probe, including CDR Financial Products Inc., New Jersey's adviser on interest-rate swaps. Earlier this month, the SEC asked officials in Jefferson County, Alabama, for records related to bond issues and derivatives since January 2002."

FTC Gives Antitrust Nod To Freeport Takeover Of Phelps Dodge. The AP (12/27) reports, "The Federal Trade Commission approved the $25.9 billion takeover of copper miner Phelps Dodge Corp. by Freeport-McMoran Copper & Gold, according to a notice posted Tuesday on the agency's Web site." The AP continues, "FTC clearance removes at least one obstacle to the proposed combination, which would create the world's largest copper miner. The deal still needs shareholder approval, and there is no certainty the companies will get it." The AP adds, "Earlier this month, a hedge fund with a 5.1 percent stake in Phelps Dodge said it would throw the weight of its 10.3 million shares against the takeover. SAC Capital Partners opposes the combination, saying that the cash-and-stock offer doesn't fairly value Phelps Dodge. … The FTC granted early termination of a mandatory antitrust waiting period on Dec. 22."

401(k) Industry Under Scrutiny For Alleged Collusion. In a column for the Wall Street Journal (12/28, C1), Tom Lauricella writes, "Americans' 401(k) retirement plans are starting to face scrutiny -- of a kind that previously helped to reshape the mutual-fund business and many practices on Wall Street." Lauricella continues, "In recent months, a series of lawsuits has raised questions that longstanding business practices in the industry may represent illegal forms of collusion. In the past few weeks, Congressional Democrats -- after winning the majority in November for the first time in years -- are calling for hearings into whether current laws do enough to protect 401(k) investors. A November report by the Congressional Government Accountability Office said some practices 'may not be in the best interest' of investors." Lauricella adds, "At the same time, the summer's landmark pension-reform law is encouraging employers to take a more active and even paternal role in their employees' 401(k) plans by offering in-depth investment advice and other tools designed to encourage people to save. Previously, companies were discouraged from taking these steps for fear of being sued should the investments go wrong. … As a result of these forces, 401(k) plans could receive their most significant overhaul since coming into existence a quarter-century ago. Fees to investors could be reduced, and companies could be forced to do a better job ensuring investors receive the most bang for their retirement dollar." Lauricella notes, "Since being created in 1981 as a way to sock away dollars tax-free for retirement, 401(k)s have supplanted traditional pension funds as the primary way most Americans save for retirement. Some 47 million participants have $2 trillion in money invested in the plans. … Critics increasingly are complaining about poorly disclosed financial arrangements -- known as 'pay-to-play' deals -- that not only have the potential to influence which investment options are offered in a given plan, but also have the potential to drive up fees charged to investors. … The pressure for change is occurring at every level of a complex industry: Employers have a legal obligation to run a plan in the best interest of its participants. The money manager has responsibility for the investments, but other companies might have a separate role in keeping investor records and holding the actual securities being bought and sold in the plan. On top of that, sometimes there are outside brokers or consultants paid to help decide which investments go into a plan."

Italy's Antitrust Regulators Orders Energy Competition Measures. The AP (12/28) reports, "Italy's antitrust watchdog said Wednesday that Enel SpA must sell 1,000 megawatts of capacity next year, and if necessary 700 more megawatts in 2008 to promote competition in the country's power market." The AP continues, "The regulator said in a statement that the sale will be at 'competitive conditions,' at which point the antitrust body will close its inquiry, started in April 2005, into possible anticompetitive behavior by Enel, Italy's former electricity monopoly. … The regulator said Enel will sell the capacity under a mechanism that allows a company to keep ownership of generation facilities while selling its output to competitors."

Administration Says Global Warming May Be A Threat To Polar Bears. ABC World News (12/27, story 6, 2:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In Washington, a victory for environmentalists and a stunning about-face by the Bush Administration. It is proposing that polar bears should be listed as a threatened species because the animals' habitat is disappearing fast. That acknowledgement that their habitat is disappearing is seen as a tacit recognition of global warming." ABC (Blakemore) added, "Today, the Bush Administration admitted that all this, disappearing in the heat of global warming, could take one of earth's most powerful creatures with it. The problem is, polar bears must have the vast, frozen Arctic Sea as a platform to hunt for sales. And that sea ice is disappearing so fast scientists calculate it could all be gone in less than 40 years. In a teleconference today, government officials explained why they are seeking to protect polar bears under the Endangered Species Act."

NBC Nightly News (12/27, story 7, 1:20, Williams, 9.87M) also reported, "The Bush Administration acknowledged that global warming is melting the polar ice cap and may be threatening the very existence of the polar bear." And the CBS Evening News (12/27, story 6, 1:05, Assura, 7.66M) said "the designation" of polar bears and endangered "would ensure Arctic operations like oil exploration or commercial shipping would not jeopardize the bears or their habitat. Environmentalists hope the designation will push the government to cut back on greenhouse gases that they claim contribute to global warming."

USA Today (12/28, Davis, 2.27M) reports Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne "says polar bears appear to be dying because their habitat -- ice in the Arctic Ocean -- is melting. 'Polar bears are one of nature's ultimate survivors,' Kempthorne says. But their 'habitat may literally be melting.'" The Endangered Species Act "puts the responsibility on the federal government to avoid authorizing any activities that might jeopardize an endangered species or the habitat where it lives." The Wall Street Journal (12/28, Randall, 2.04M), New York Times (12/28, Barringer, Revkin, 1.16M), Washington Times/AP (12/28) and Financial Times (12/28, Kirchgaessner), among other newspapers, also reports the story.

Energy Conservation Programs Make Comeback Amid Global Warming Fears. USA Today (12/28, 1B, Davidson, 2.27M) reports that "power companies these days are increasingly being told by regulators to pump hundreds of millions of dollars into selling less electricity. Energy-efficiency programs, which first caught fire in the 1970s before fading in recent years, are making a big comeback spurred by global-warming fears and the public's aversion to more pollution-belching power plants." Conservation "has shifted into high gear with global-warming fears and the federal Energy Policy Act of 2005. The legislation provides tax credits of up to $2,000 per home to builders of new homes that exceed international energy-saving standards by at least 50% and up to $500 to improve efficiency on existing homes." USA Today adds, "The Natural Resources Defense Council sued the Energy Department for failing to update energy-efficiency standards for 22 appliances ... . Under a recent settlement, standards will be set over the next four years. Energy Department spokesman Craig Stevens says clearing the backlog has been a priority for Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman."

Democrats Pledge To Reinvigorate Superfund Program. The Christian Science Monitor (12/28, Clayton, 59K) reports that although "1 in 4 Americans lives within four miles of a designated toxic-waste site, the federal program to clean up the sites has slowed." Key congressional Democrats "are looking to push the program, known as Superfund, back into the spotlight. They're looking not only at its funding levels but also its funding sources. A central issue: whether to restore 'polluter pay' taxes on industry to help fund cleanups." Sen. Barbara Boxer "says she's making Superfund, along with global warming, focal points of her environmental agenda. She has tapped presumed presidential aspirant Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D) of New York to chair the Superfund subcommittee."

Water Battle Rages In Colorado's Black Canyon. The Grand Junction (CO) Sentinel (12/27, Magill) reports, "Before the dams were built, the Gunnison River raged through Black Canyon each spring with such ferocity that it carved through the volcanic rock Colorado's deepest and most sheer abyss. … More than 2,000 feet above the river on the south rim of Black Canyon of the Gunnison National Park, there's no running water, no grand lodge inviting tourists to luxuriate, no concession stand feeding the masses." The Sentinel continues, "Black Canyon may be Colorado's most controversial national park —not necessarily because of how it was created or how its government caretakers manage its formidable land, but because of the water in the Gunnison River, which not only imbues the canyon with life, but supplies water and electricity to thousands of people in central Colorado. … But the amount of water released below the dams would forever change the ecology of the river through Black Canyon National Park. … The dams eliminated the Gunnison River's natural hydrograph through the canyon, evening out flows during spring runoff, when the river should be raging with floodwater, said Ken Stahlnecker, chief of resource stewardship and science at Black Canyon." The Sentinel notes that "a 2003 agreement between the National Park Service, the U.S. Department of Interior and the State of Colorado threatened to starve the canyon of its flows, reducing it to a year-round minimum of 300 cubic feet per second. .. .To maintain the vitality of the Gunnison River through Black Canyon, water would ideally need to flow at a volume well above 300 cubic feet per second, especially during spring runoff when the river naturally runs highest, Stahlnecker said. … The agreement relinquished Black Canyon National Park's water right to peak and shoulder flows during the spring, a right dating to 1933 when President Hoover declared Black Canyon a national monument. … The agreement was 'nonsensical,' said U.S. District Court Judge Clarence A. Brimmer in his September decision to set aside the pact. The National Park Service ignored the needs of the public in a decision that would profoundly effect the canyon's ecology and human environment, he wrote. … He declared that because Black Canyon is a wilderness area and a national park, the National Park Service must maintain enough water in the river to leave the canyon's ecology and scenic beauty unimpaired. The agreement, he said, protected the canyon's competitors and not the canyon itself. … After being given until Dec. 18 — the court granted a one month extension to the government's original deadline — to appeal Brimmer's decision, the U.S. Department of Justice filed a notice of appeal that day, which preserves the government's right to file its appeal beyond the deadline. … Cynthia Magnuson, spokeswoman for the Justice Department in Washington, said the appeal would likely be filed by the beginning of January."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Senior FBI Officials Honing Management Skills In Business School Program. Under the headline "The New FBI Means Business," the Los Angeles Times (12/28, Schmitt, 850K) reports in a generally positive light on the senior FBI officials who are attending management classes at Northwestern University's business school. "In an effort to change the famously insular and hidebound organization, the FBI has sent more than 2,000 of its top agents and supervisors — including this group of spy-catchers, cyber-sleuths and terrorist-hunters — to management school at Northwestern," where "they explore how large corporations have shifted their missions." The Times notes, "The program was started three years ago by FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III," who "is an ardent student of management science. He has sought the views of successful chief executives…and has looked to outsiders to fill high positions. The training has been one of Mueller's main efforts to bring fresh thinking into the bureau, though some FBI officials at first found the idea puzzling." The Times goes on to report in detail on its reporter's shadowing of agents through a day of courses in the program.

Court Rules Federal Investigators Can Use MLB Test Results In Drug Probe. There are more than 500 media references to a court decision that would give the government access to baseball players' drug-test results as an investigation of illegal drug distribution among athletes continues. The AP (12/27) reported, "The names and urine samples of about 100 Major League Baseball players who tested positive three years ago can be used by federal investigators, a court ruled Wednesday." The ruling from the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals "could bolster the government's perjury case against [Barry] Bonds if investigators are able to link his name to a positive test from baseball's anonymous testing in 2003. The San Francisco Giants slugger has been the target of a perjury investigation since he testified before a 2004 grand jury that he didn't knowingly use illegal drugs." Baseball players and owners "agreed in their 2002 labor contract that the [test] results would be confidential, and each player was assigned a code number to be matched with his name." The New York Times, Wall Street Journal, Los Angeles Times, San Diego Union-Tribune, Houston Chronicle, and Forbes are among the many news outlets that used the AP story.

The San Francisco Chronicle (12/27) reported the appeals court "revealed…that more than 100 major league baseball players tested positive for steroids in 2003, and ruled that the government could use their tests in its investigation of illegal drug distribution to athletes. … The government has expressed no intention of prosecuting any athlete for illegal drug use. The court quoted government lawyers as saying athletes who tested positive could be called before a grand jury and asked about their suppliers."

In the New York Times (12/28), Murray Chass writes, "By a vote of 2 to 1, the three-judge panel overturned lower court decisions in Los Angeles, San Francisco and Nevada. The [Players Association] had no immediate public reaction to the decision, preferring to take time to digest the 120-page opinion before commenting. However, the union is certain to go further with the case."

The Washington Post (12/28, E5, Shipley) reports the decision "means additional major league players could get swept up in the probe into sports doping that began in 2003 when a raid of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative (BALCO) in Burlingame, Calif., yielded information that tied dozens of elite and professional athletes to steroids and other drugs."

USA Today (12/28, Ortiz) writes that the tests "were conducted in 2003 as part of baseball's survey to determine whether to implement a stricter policy, which began in 2004 after more than 100 of the approximately 1,200 players had positive results. Federal investigators raided testing labs in California and Nevada, seeking the results of 10 players — among them Bonds, Jason Giambi and Gary Sheffield— who were subpoenaed to testify in front of the grand jury probing BALCO."

The San Jose Mercury News (12/27) reported a "divided panel of the San Francisco-based 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals rejected the privacy arguments of the players' union, raising the possibility the names of baseball players who tested positive for steroids in the league's 2003 anonymous testing program could become public as the government continues to probe the fallout from the BALCO steroids case."

The New York Sun (12/28) reports one judge on the appeals court panel, Sidney Thomas, "filed a scathing dissent warning that computer-based files were being opened to wholesale rummaging by the government."

Bloomberg (12/27) also reported on the ruling.

On its Web site, ESPN (12/28) reports the attorney for Barry Bonds "downplayed the significance of a court ruling Wednesday allowing federal investigators access to confidential Major League Baseball drug-testing data from the 2003 season, suggesting that the San Francisco Giants slugger was not among the 100 or so players who tested positive for performance-enhancing drugs. … In its ruling, the court provided that the names of the players who tested positive remain sealed. … The players' association, which sued to keep the government from accessing the records, has not decided whether to appeal the ruling."

Network TV Coverage. NBC Nightly News (12/27, story 8, 0:30, Williams) aired, "A bombshell in baseball's ongoing steroid investigation. A federal court of appeals ruled the names and urine samples of 100 baseball players who tested positive three years ago could be used by federal authorities. This could help the government's case against Barry Bonds, who has testified that he never knowingly used steroids."

Cable TV Coverage. CNN's The Situation Room (12/27, 7:00 p.m.) aired, "A U.S. appeals court ruling today could affect more than 100 Major League Baseball players tested for potential steroid use. The court says lower courts wrongly blocked government access to confidential blood tests conducted by two labs. Investigators are still investigating whether some lied to a federal grand jury. Barry Bonds…has declined comment so far, saying the lawyers must first review the court's decision."

FOX's O'Reilly Factor (12/27, 8:00 p.m.) aired, "A federal appeals court says the names and urine samples of Major League Baseball players tested for steroids three years ago can be used. Among them, Barry Bonds. He has maintained he never tested positive."

Judge Rules Against Arizona Church Founders Who Use Marijuana, Trial Date Set. The AP (12/27) reported a federal judge "has ruled against the founders of an Arizona church that deifies marijuana and uses it as a sacrament. U.S. District Judge Judith C. Herrera in Albuquerque, N.M., refused to dismiss charges against Dan and Mary Quaintance, saying they don't have a 'sincere' religious belief. … Herrera's order means the government's criminal case against the Quaintances will proceed in the new year. The couple is scheduled to go to trial on Jan. 16 on criminal charges of possessing more than 100 pounds of marijuana, as well as conspiracy charges."

Convicted Cocaine-Ring Supplier Sentenced In Connecticut. The Connecticut Post (12/28) reports a Bridgeport man, who police "said was supplying drugs to dealers in the greater New Haven area, was sentenced Wednesday to eight years in prison. Johnny Rolon…pleaded guilty to possession of narcotics with intent to sell and criminal possession of a weapon. … According to police, in March agents of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration infiltrated a cocaine distribution ring operating in the greater New Haven area. … Police said they subsequently learned that Rolon was supplying the ring with cocaine."

New York Authorities Say Gambling Ring Also Smuggled Marijuana. The New York Times (12/28, Cotroneo) reports a Long Island gambling ring that "took in $8.6 million a year was broken up with the arrest of 14 people," according to the Suffolk County district attorney. District Attorney Thomas J. Spota "said that the 14-month investigation also uncovered lucrative marijuana and fireworks smuggling rackets that were run by the chief bookmaker, Salvatore Gerrato, 45, of Seaford. In addition, three people were charged in the drug case."

Long Island Newsday (12/28, Castillo) reports police "arrested 17 suspects on assorted gambling and conspiracy charges, and continue to search for one more -- a Freeport attorney charged with helping run 'hundreds of pounds' of pot from California to Long Island."

The AP (12/28) reports police "investigating a lucrative bookmaking operation came across a related drug-smuggling ring and busted both, arresting 17 and seizing $1 million, authorities said Wednesday. Thirteen men and a woman were arrested on gambling charges, while three men were arrested on charges of conspiracy to possess marijuana."

Internet Operation Accused Of Selling Millions In Illegally Prescribed Drugs, Four Arrested. USA Today (12/28, 3A, Leinwand) reports federal agents "say they have shut down an Internet pharmacy operation and arrested four people who allegedly sold millions of dollars of illegally prescribed drugs to customers across the nation. Drug Enforcement Administration agents are still seeking four doctors from Puerto Rico who allegedly wrote the prescriptions based on Internet health questionnaires, DEA spokeswoman Erin Mulvey said Wednesday. … The sites, in operation for at least three years, did about $50,000 a day in business, she said. … Agents earlier closed two pharmacies in Georgia and one in Maryland that allegedly supplied the ring, Mulvey said."

US Indicts New Mexico Man On Drug Charges. The Carlsbad (NM) Current-Argus (12/28, Bowen) reports, "A grand jury has indicted Ricky Green of Carlsbad on federal drug and firearm charges stemming from the seizure of illegal drugs and a gun at his home on Townsend Road in August." The Current-Argus continues, "Green, 45, also known as Ricky Barksdale, was arrested during the early morning hours of Aug. 31, when agents of the Pecos Valley Drug Task Force served a search warrant at his home in the 4300 block of Townsend Road." The Current-Argus adds, "On Dec. 21, a federal grand jury indicted him on three charges possession of crack cocaine with intent to distribute, possession of methamphetamine with intent to distribute and possession of a firearm in the furtherance of a drug trafficking crime. … Green was originally charged in state court, but those charges were dismissed after authorities sought federal charges against him, hoping for a more severe, longer sentence. … 'We pushed for the indictment because he has a long history of selling narcotics and we wanted a stiffer penalty on the drug crimes,' Commander David Edmondson of the Pecos Valley Drug Task Force said on Wednesday. … Edmondson said pursuing federal charges was the only way to ensure a stiffer penalty. He said because Green has at least three prior drug crime convictions he is eligible"

Nearly 500 Assassinations Reported This Year In Nuevo Laredo. The San Bernardino Sun (12/28) reports street violence in Nuevo Laredo "has become a way of life for the nearly 380,000 residents of Mexico's most violent border city. According to law-enforcement officials in Mexico and U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration officials, more than 500 people were assassinated in Nuevo Laredo in 2005. Official estimates, in news reports, put the 2005 death toll at 186. This year, there have been nearly 500 assassinations, and the death toll continues to rise. … The violence has also changed the lives of American citizens living in Laredo, on the Texas side of the border, where kidnappings, narcotics trafficking and corruption have become common."

In a separate story, the San Bernardino Sun (12/28) reports the government "announced a new operation - Northern Border - in mid-March 2006. Under the program, 600 to 800 Federal Protective Police officers were deployed to Nuevo Laredo, according to the U.S. Office of National Drug Control Policy. In a July interview, a Mexican police official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said many of the agents under the Northern Border initiative have either left the city or are working for the cartels."

IMMIGRATION:

Illegal Migrant Arrests Drop After Guard Troops Sent To Border. The AP (12/28, Rodriguez) reports, "Arrests of illegal migrants along the U.S.-Mexico border have dropped by more than a third since U.S. National Guard troops started helping with border security, hinting at a drop in attempted crossings, the U.S. Border Patrol said Tuesday." The AP continues, "U.S. Border Patrol agents arrested 149,238 fewer people from the start of July through November, down 34 percent from the same period last year, according to monthly figures provided by U.S. Border Patrol spokesman Mario Martinez." The AP adds, '"Arrests also had dropped by 9 percent for the same period from 2004 to 2005. If the downward trend continues, it would be the first sustained decrease in illegal immigrant arrests since shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. … Border Patrol officials usually attribute a drop in arrests to fewer people crossing. … National Guard troops started arriving along the border June 15, and 6,000 were in place by August."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats' Agenda Targets GOP Corporate Allies. The Christian Science Monitor (12/28, Chaddock, 59K) reports that with their new majority in Congress, Democrats "are targeting some of the GOP's strongest corporate allies - Big Oil, big pharmaceutical companies, and, in all likelihood, defense contractors." In their "first 100 legislative hours, Democrats aim to negotiate lower drug prices for seniors, roll back subsidies for oil and gas companies, and reduce the cost of student loans. They're also quickly gearing up to investigate allegations of corruption in war contracting." University of Virginia political analyst Larry Sabato said, "Parties reward their constituency groups, and they go after the other party's constituency groups. Parties are never stronger than in the first few days, so they do it early."

Part B Premiums To Go Up For Some Beneficiaries. The Washington Post (12/28, A15, Kaufman, 690K) reports, "When new income-based premiums for Medicare's Part B program go into effect next month, some seniors will get an unwelcome surprise: Their monthly costs will be going up considerably more than expected because of the government's method of counting their income." The Times adds, "In addition to income from investments, pensions and wages, seniors will find that big but unusual windfalls -- from house sales, for instance, or from taking cash from an individual retirement account -- will also be included in government calculations. As a result, an advocacy group for seniors says, tens of thousands of people will be counted as wealthy even though their continuing yearly income is modest." Mark Hinkle, a spokesman for the Social Security Administration, "said that a small number of people will indeed have to pay more for their 2007 premiums because of large 2005 capital gains reported on their income tax returns. But he said that the premiums would go down in future years once the capital gains are no longer part of a recipient's tax return."

Pelosi To Visit Childhood Home In Baltimore. The Washington Times/AP (12/28, Wyatt) reports incoming House speaker Nancy Pelosi plans a visit to Baltimore's Little Italy, her childhood home, before arriving in Washington for the start of the 110th Congress. The "youngest of six, Mrs. Pelosi was born into a political family in a house always full of strangers asking for help. Thirty years before going to Congress, Nancy D'Alesandro was brokering political deals for constituents of her father, Thomas D'Alesandro Jr., who served as Baltimore mayor from 1947 to 1959 and as a congressman from 1939 to 1947." But childhood friends "said they never imagined Mrs. Pelosi's political career eclipsing those of her father and her brother, Thomas D'Alesandro III, who served one term as mayor from 1967 to 1971." So proud "is Little Italy of Mrs. Pelosi's political ascension that the city will name part of Mrs. Pelosi's childhood street for her."

Housing Vouchers Under "Moving To Opportunity" Said To Have Limited Value. The Wall Street Journal (12/28, Hilsenrath, Gerena-Morales, 2.04M) profiles Lydia Grayson, a mother who moved her family to North Carolina to escape "her drug-addled, East Harlem housing project," a decade ago, citing her as emblematic of "a question society has wrestled with for years: Can a family escape poverty by getting out of the neighborhood where it takes root? It also sheds light on the government's shifting efforts to use housing policy as a solution to poverty." The Journal notes the increased use of Section 8 vouchers supplanting the formerly prevalent urban housing project, and the impact of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita on poverty-level housing. "Ms. Grayson's move was part of a government test designed to study the effects of a new neighborhood on poverty in the way a researcher studies the effects of a new drug." The Journal continues to detail Moving to Opportunity, a federal program begun in 1994 in which one group of housing project residents were "offered a lottery for housing vouchers," and a second group was not given such an offer. "Researchers have since tracked and compared the fortunes of the two groups." The study's results were mixed, with certain demographics impacted differently, and the Journal portrays simply moving families out of poverty-stricken areas as being ill-suited to cure the complexities of poverty.

Author Says Charities Won't Benefit From Greater Government Subsidies. In a Wall Street Journal (12/28, A14, 2.04M) op-ed, Arthur C. Brooks, author of "Who Really Cares: The Surprising Truth About Compassionate Conservatism," writes about the uncertainty of whether the incoming Democratic majority in Congress will move to boos government funding of nonprofit charities, adding that "even less clear is whether greater government subsidies are in the interest of the charities themselves." Brooks cites the example of a "large nonprofit organization that helps the poor in New York state," which received a temporary influx of state money, which hindered the group's operations by first requiring staff to manage the money, and then by reducing the group's fundraising acumen. Moreover, Brooks argues, "the problem with government money goes beyond just its volatility: Studies by economists over the past decade have demonstrated that government spending on nonprofit activities actually lowers private charitable giving. … The bottom line is that there is nothing free about cash from the government."

Congress Urged Not To Acquiesce To Union "Card Check" Demands. In a piece in the Wall Street Journal (12/28, A15, 2.04M), Detroit freelance journalist Thomas J. Bray writes about the steady decline in union membership in the US, noting that organized labor groups are "scrambling for new ways to beef up [their] membership rolls. The latest hot idea is 'card check,' in which unions demand to be recognized as the bargaining unit for a workplace if a majority of the workers merely sign a card indicating their support. Under current law, companies are required to recognize a union only after a secret ballot of the workers -- and unions have been losing an increasing number of those elections. Now that Congress is back under Democratic control, unions sniff a win." The Journal notes that union lobbyists have tied Democratic legislators' support of card-check bills to future political support, but that "Republicans still have the strength to filibuster such a measure to death, and President Bush might veto it." However, "The fact that unions now call card-check their No. 1 legislative priority should be seen as a sign of weakness rather than strength," and "Republicans could be making a serious miscalculation if they bow to union demands for card check."

Home Sales Data Suggests Housing Slump May Be Ending. USA Today (12/28, Knox, 2.27M) reports, "Sales of newly built homes rose a surprising 3.4% from October to November, the Commerce Department said Wednesday, as more builders offered special deals to attract buyers, and buyers took advantage of declining interest rates and mild weather to visit model homes." This is "the third increase in four months and a sign that the housing correction may be ending. Builder confidence levels, which hit bottom in September, are also slowly beginning to rise, according to December's Housing Market Index."

The Wall Street Journal (12/28, Conkey, 2.04M) also says "recent firmness in mortgage applications and an increase in new-home sales suggest the housing slump may be nearly over, limiting the risk of wider damage to the overall economy. One indication that home-buying demand has leveled off after a yearlong decline comes from the Mortgage Bankers Association, which conducts a weekly mortgage-application survey." Yesterday, "the group said mortgage applications fell sharply last week from the week before. Even so, its indexes of applications for home purchases and refinancings have been rising steadily since summer. The four-week moving average for the MBA's purchase index, which offers a less-volatile picture of the trend, has risen 12% since August, while the four-week average for the group's refinancing index has soared more than 41% since July."

The New York Times (12/28, Peters, 1.16M) says "many economists said the report, rather than foreshadowing a quick rebound, highlighted how fragile residential construction remained and suggested that the downturn now rattling the housing market had not yet run its course."

Dow Hits New Record. Another New York Times (12/28, Peters, 1.16M) story reports the news about the housing market "helped propel stocks on Wall Street to another all-time high, with the Dow Jones industrial average rising more than 100 points to finish the day above 12,500 for the first time." NBC Nightly News (12/27, story 9, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) also reported on the "record session" in Wall Street, and notes "NASDAQ gained almost 18 points [to close at 2,431.22]." The Wall Street Journal (12/28, C1, Browning, 2.04M), Washington Post/AP (12/28, D4) and USA Today (12/28, 5B, 2.27M) also report the stock numbers.

Retail Sales Appear On Track For "Low End Of Expectations." The Wall Street Journal (12/28, Covert, 2.04M) reports, "Retailers posted a disappointing 1.7% increase in comparable sales for the week ended Dec. 23, putting holiday sales on track to hit the low end of expectations, according to the International Council of Shopping Centers." The Journal adds, "A surge of last-minute purchases by consumers fueled a 2% rise in same-store sales, or sales at stores open at least a year, from the previous week's levels, with sales on Friday and Saturday particularly strong." But "the 1.7% same-store increase from year-ago spending was the weakest such gain recorded by the New York-based trade group since the week ended Feb. 12, 2005."

Cyber Sex Scandal Heads To Trial. USA Today/AP (12/28) reports, "When Robert Steinbuch discovered his girlfriend had discussed intimate details about their sex life in her online diary, the Capitol Hill staffer didn't just get mad. He got a lawyer. … Soon, though, the racy tidbits about the sex lives of the two Senate aides faded from the front pages and the gossip pages. Steinbuch accepted a teaching job in Arkansas, leaving Washington and Jessica Cutler's Washingtonienne Web log behind." The AP continues, "While sex scandals turn over quickly in this city, lawsuits do not. Steinbuch's case over the embarrassing, sexually charged blog appears headed for an embarrassing, sexually charged trial. … Lurid testimony about spanking, handcuffs and prostitution aside, the Washingtonienne case could help establish whether people who keep online diaries are obligated to protect the privacy of the people they interact with offline." The AP adds, "Cutler, a former aide to Sen. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio, says she created the blog in 2004 to keep a few friends up to date on her social life. Like a digital version of the sex-themed banter from a Sex and the City episode, Cutler described the thrill and tribulations of juggling sexual relationships with six men. … One of those men was Steinbuch, a counsel to DeWine on the Judiciary Committee. … When Ana Marie Cox, then the editor of the popular gossip website Wonkette.com, discovered and linked to Cutler's blog, the story spun out of control. Cutler was fired and Steinbuch says he was publicly humiliated. He went to court seeking more than $20 million in damages. … The case is embroiled in thorny pretrial issues, with each side demanding personal information from the other. Steinbuch wants to know how much money Cutler received from the man she called her 'sugar daddy.' Cutler demanded Steinbuch's student evaluations from the University of Arkansas at Little Rock Law School, where he teaches. … Steinbuch also recently added Cox as a defendant in the case, though he has not served her with court papers. A trial date has not been set, but Matthew Billips, Cutler's attorney, said there are no settlement talks that might head off a trial."

Ford "Very Strongly" Disagreed With Iraq War Decision. The death of former President Gerald Ford dominated TV and print coverage last night and this morning. The coverage overwhelmingly focuses on Ford's likeability and honesty, as well as on his decision to pardon President Nixon after the Watergate scandal. But some of the tributes also include veiled (and not so veiled) criticisms of the current occupant of the White House. Most significantly, the Washington Post (12/28, A1, Woodward, 690K) runs a front-page story titled "Ford Disagreed With Bush About Invading Iraq," reports that Ford "said in an embargoed interview in July 2004 that the Iraq war was not justified. 'I don't think I would have gone to war,' he said a little more than a year after President Bush launched the invasion advocated and carried out by prominent veterans of Ford's own administration." In "a four-hour conversation at his house in Beaver Creek, Colo., Ford 'very strongly' disagreed with the current president's justifications for invading Iraq and said he would have pushed alternatives, such as sanctions, much more vigorously. In the tape-recorded interview, Ford was critical not only of Bush but also of Vice President Cheney -- Ford's White House chief of staff -- and then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who served as Ford's chief of staff and then his Pentagon chief." Ford also "took issue with the notion of the United States entering a conflict in service of the idea of spreading democracy."

Another aspect of the Ford presidency that is being widely noted is its impact on the current White House team. CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (12/27, Greenfield) reported Ford's "legacy is measured not so much in policy, as policy-makers. … Some of the political fallout from the Ford years continues to this day in very significant ways," as Vice President Dick Cheney was Ford's chief of staff, and that former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld held the same post in Ford's administration. The Wall Street Journal (12/28, A8, Dreazen, 2.04M) also says Ford's "tenure is felt through the ranks of aides -- most notably…Cheney -- who became pivotal figures in the Bush administration. They have used their years in office to restore powers of the presidency they felt were lost after Mr. Nixon's resignation and the Vietnam War. The Bush White House's assertion of presidential power in areas such as the war on terror may be Mr. Ford's most surprising legacy." In the New York Times (12/28, 1.16M), Barry Werth writes, "President Ford believed that by pardoning Mr. Nixon, he was putting Watergate and the imperial presidency in the past. But by sacrificing his popularity, he also lost much of his mandate" and was "forced to the right." As a result, "his administration spawned many of the core attitudes and key players of the…Bush White House." David Broder, in the Washington Post (12/28, A27, 690K), says that "for all that he has borrowed from Ronald Reagan, President Bush owes the greatest debt to three stalwarts of economic and national security policy inherited from Ford," Cheney, Rumsfed and former Federal Reserve chairman Alan Greenspan, Ford's chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers.

Some stories praising Ford's management style are also critical of Bush. Under the headline "Similar Personnel, Different Approaches," the Washington Post (12/28, A8, Baker, 690K) reports that "if the Ford administration proved an incubator for future Republican talent after the demise of Richard M. Nixon's presidency, it turned out not to be much of a model for the current Bush administration in terms of style and ideology. Where Ford governed close to the political center, working with congressional Democrats and presenting a pragmatic, cautious domestic and foreign policy agenda, Bush has styled himself as more of a crusader for change at home and abroad -- bold in the eyes of his admirers but reckless in the view of his critics." Bush "has led the nation in a more polarized time and more polarized fashion."

The Washington Post (12/28, A1, Baker, 690K) also says "Ford's legacy…dominated the discussion in Washington and across the country yesterday, standing in contrast to a time when leaders in both parties often seem unable to join hands on the big issues of the day. During his final years, mostly privately but sometimes publicly, Ford often expressed regret at what he saw as a coarsening political environment that personalizes policy differences and undermines national unity."

The Los Angeles Times (12/28, Spiegel, 850K), for example says Ford "was comfortable with being less knowledgeable than his advisors and was unthreatened by strongly voiced disagreements. Unlike almost any subsequent president, Ford was able to create a White House that was open to dissent. … The comparisons with Bush's style first broke into the public debate two years ago. Paul O'Neill, a senior official in the Ford White House's budget office who three decades later became Bush's Treasury secretary, cooperated with author Ron Suskind on a book that made critical contrasts between the two presidents. … Other Ford White House veterans, many of whom asked not to be named because they did not want to appear critical of Bush, say they share O'Neill's view of the contrasts."

USA Today (12/28, 1A, Kiely, 2.27M) notes Ford "got one appointment to the Supreme Court, in 1975, and he is still there. John Paul Stevens, 86, is now the oldest justice. … The fact that Ford alumni include Cheney and Rumsfeld, now viewed as arch-conservatives, as well as Stevens, one of the court's most liberal members, speaks volumes about the former president, according to those who knew him." Ford "served as 'a balance point between the increasingly conservative wing of the Republican Party and the more liberal wing,' said presidential historian Carl Sferrazza Anthony. 'He was always seeking middle ground.'"

The Los Angeles Times (12/28, Neuman, Alonso-Zaldivar, 850K) reports that yesterday, "many praised Ford for his moderate views and consensus approach to governance." Log Cabin Republicans, "the nation's largest gay GOP organization, said that Ford always believe in inclusiveness in welcoming gays into the party and advocating equal rights for them. … And former first lady Nancy Reagan, in a statement, said that Ford's support for stem cell research his early support of stem cell research was important 'in getting the US Congress to debate the potential lifesaving cures and treatments that may result.'"

Drawing contrasts between Ford presidency and those that ensued, the Christian Science Monitor (12/28, 59K) editorializes that "Ford's candor and amicability are sorely needed in Washington politics today, given the steadily rising shrill, partisan tone." USA Today (12/28, 11A, 2.27M), also in an editorial, says Ford's "down-to-earth ways…stack up well against some of the more ego-driven and polished presidencies that preceded and followed his."

Funeral Services Will Begin Friday. The New York Times (12/28, Stout, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports, "Services for Mr. Ford, the 38th president, who died late Tuesday, will begin Friday in Palm Desert, Calif., with private prayers for the family at St. Margaret's Episcopal Church, Gregory D. Willard, a Ford family spokesman, said at a news conference. The next day, his body will be flown to Washington. The hearse is to pause at the World War II Memorial on the National Mall in recognition of Mr. Ford's naval service in the Pacific. His state funeral is to be conducted on Saturday evening in the Capitol Rotunda, after which the public will be allowed to file by the coffin." A service "will be held next Tuesday in the Washington National Cathedral." Plans for Ford's funeral are also described by the AP (12/28, Woodward), The Los Angeles Times (12/28, 850K), USA Today (12/28, 5A, Parker, 2.27M) and Washington Post (12/28, A8, Vogel, 690K).

Ford Survived Two Assassinations Attempts. The CBS Evening News (12/27, story 3, 2:35, Mitchell, 7.66M) recounted the two assassination attempts against Ford, " In September, 1975 Lynnette 'Squeaky' Fromm, a follower of Charles Manson aimed a pistol at the President. 17 days later in San Francisco, another woman, Sarah Jane Moore fired a shot at him. Both women are serving life in prison." The AP (12/28) runs a similar story.

"Drop Dead" Quote Was Apocryphal. The New York Times (12/28, Roberts, 1.16M) reports, "Ford and Marie Antoinette did not have much in common, but being misquoted cost both of them their jobs. In Hollywood's latest biography of the French queen, she denies having callously suggested that breadless peasants eat cake instead." Ford, on Oct. 29, 1975, "gave a speech denying federal assistance to spare New York from bankruptcy. The front page of The Daily News the next day read: 'FORD TO CITY: DROP DEAD.'" Ford "never explicitly said 'drop dead.' Yet those two words, arguably the essence of his remarks as encapsulated in the immortal headline, would, as he later acknowledged, cost him the presidency the following year, after Jimmy Carter, nominated by the Democrats in New York, narrowly carried the state."

Ford's Economic Policies Were Object Of Ridicule. The Washington Post (12/28, D1, Birnbaum, 690K) analyzes Ford's economic record, saying his policies in that area "are usually remembered as a joke. Soon after he took over as president, in August 1974, he tried to tame runaway price increases by urging Americans to wear round red lapel pins emblazoned with the initials WIN, for 'whip inflation now.' That didn't work, of course, and the pins soon disappeared amid public ridicule." But "Ford didn't give up the fight against what was then called stagflation: a debilitating mix of rapid inflation, high unemployment and slow economic growth. In fact, before his 30-month administration ended, he discarded his original plans and cobbled together an unconventional set of programs that succeeded, at least for a while, in slowing the country's financial slide." The US economy "was in sad shape when Ford replaced the disgraced Richard M. Nixon to become the nation's 38th president. Then it got worse. The economy fell into the steepest recession since World War II, coupled with an upward price spiral that was faster than at any time in modern memory." The Post reports economy didn't recover until the Reagan years.

Ford's Contribution To Conservatism Noted. In the Washington Times (12/28, 88K), Alvin S. Felzenberg writes, "[C]onservatives of the era misjudged Mr. Ford as much as had the liberals. As they rallied behind the rising star of Mr. Reagan, who personified bold color conservatism as opposed to one shaped in pastels, they overlooked the 50 vetoes Mr. Ford unfurled against spending bills the Democrats sent him. … That Mr. Reagan had a case to make, which proved essential to his own ascendancy, and conservatism's future triumphs have long clear. That Mr. Ford provided service to his country in ways that went beyond his cleaning up for his predecessor is becoming increasingly apparent with the passage of time."

Writers Recount Ford Experience In World War II. In the New York Times (12/28, 1.16M) op-ed contributors Robert Drury and Tom Clavin call Ford a "war hero." They recount his World War II experience aboard the aircraft carrier Monterey. On Dec. 18, the carrier was trapped in a "vicious Pacific cyclone later designated Typhoon Cobra. They write, "Admiral Halsey had ordered Captain Ingersoll to abandon ship, and the Monterey was ablaze from stem to stern as Lieutenant Ford stood near the helm, awaiting his orders. 'We can fix this,' Captain Ingersoll said, and with a nod from his skipper, Lieutenant Ford donned a gas mask and led a fire brigade below. Aircraft-gas tanks exploded as hose handlers slid across the burning decks. Into this furnace Lieutenant Ford led his men, his first order of business to carry out the dead and injured. Hours later he and his team emerged burned and exhausted, but they had put out the fire." Drury and Clavin conclude, "[I]n contrast to the public's image of him as a clumsy nonentity, Mr. Ford was a man whose grace under pressure saved his ship and hundreds of men on it."

NYTimes, WPost, WSJournal, WTimes Positively Assess Ford's Pardon Of Nixon. In their unsigned editorials, major newspapers echo the praises of Ford, but also turn attention to the criticism that erupted after Ford pardoned Nixon. However, they offer a generally positive assessment of his legacy., depicting Ford as an honest president who sacrificed his own popularity so the nation could better heal after the Watergate scandal. The New York Times (12/28, 1.16M) calls Ford "the right man summoned at the right time to begin the necessary process of healing a country exhausted by war abroad and scandal at home," but adds, "History has been more sympathetic to Mr. Ford's argument that to allow Mr. Nixon's prosecution to go forward, perhaps all the way to a trial, would have been profoundly destabilizing to a nation that was already in shaky health. … Our own bottom line continues to be the same: that the nation is strong enough to endure almost anything but burying the truth. Still, Mr. Ford deserves to be remembered for more than the pardon. Marking the end of a national nightmare is no small thing."

The Washington Post (12/28, A26, 690K) writes, "[I]n the period between Richard M. Nixon's resignation and Jimmy Carter's inauguration -- just under 2 1/2 years -- Gerald R. Ford did the main thing that needed doing, even though there were some in the Nixon White House who had thought him unqualified for the presidency: He reassured the people about the nature and quality of their government." The Post adds, "Today, with the passions of the period greatly diminished, it's hard to recall how much discord that decision created, even among those who believed Mr. Ford to be a trustworthy successor to Mr. Nixon. It's also hard, from today's vantage point, to see how an indictment and trial would have done the country much good. The pardon may have come too soon and been too broad, but it was basically the right thing to do."

The Wall Street Journal (12/28, 2.04M) writes, "The abiding cliché about Gerald Ford -- who died Tuesday at age 93 -- is that he was a decent man who steadied the country but held the White House too briefly to leave a major imprint. We've always thought that view of his Presidency is too diminishing, not least because he led the nation at a dangerous time and resisted political furies that could have done the U.S. far more harm." The Journal continues, "He made a particular contribution in pardoning Nixon, though he knew Nixon's enemies would accuse him of a quid pro quo. The decision cost him dearly in the polls and may have cost him the election in 1976, but it also spared the country from years of division over a criminal trial that special prosecutor Leon Jaworski seemed determined to pursue."

The Washington Times (12/28, 88K) writes, "Some argue still that the pardon deprived the nation of a 'full telling' or the nation of an opportunity to 'fully heal.' This is nonsense."

Ford's Decency, Integrity Widely Praised. ABC World News (12/27, lead story, 3:50, Gibson, 8.78M) said Ford "assumed the Presidency in its darkest days and brought it into the light." On the CBS Evening News (12/27, lead story, 3:45, 7.66M), Bob Schieffer said, "In all my years as a reporter…Ford it was nicest and most decent public figure I ever covered." And NBC Nightly News (12/27, lead story, 2:45, Mitchell, 9.87M) noted "Ford's decency and his ability to lead the nation through one of its worst crises."

Bob Woodward, in the Washington Post (12/28, A5, Woodward, 690K) recounts that "on Sunday, Sept. 8, 1974…Ford attended church alone. He sat by himself in a pew at St. John's Episcopal Church on Lafayette Square. He took Holy Communion. Back at the White House at 11:05 a.m., he went on television to announce that he had decided to pardon Richard Nixon for any crimes he committed during Watergate. … The reverberations from that decision may well have cost Ford his presidency in the next election." Woodward goes on to quote from interviews he conducted with the former president in which he commented on his pardon decision.

The AP (12/28, Riechmann) reports President Bush "remembered former President Gerald Ford as a 'man of complete integrity who led our country with common sense and kind instincts' and helped restore faith in the presidency after the Watergate scandal." The President "personally expressed his condolences in a phone call late Tuesday night with former first lady Betty Ford." The Financial Times (12/28, Sevastopulo) also reports on Bush's remarks, while the Washington Times (12/28, Pfeiffer, 88K) notes Cheney "praised his former boss in a statement, calling him a 'dear friend and mentor.'"

The CBS Evening News (12/27, story 2, 2:40, Mitchell, 7.66M) showed President Bush saying, "The American people came to know President Ford as a man of complete integrity who led our country with common sense and kind instincts," and ABC World News (12/27, story 2, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Donald Rumsfeld, who was Ford's chief of staff, today said, 'Our nation has a way of finding leaders that are needed in tough time. Gerald Ford was just the President our country needed back in 1974.' Even Jimmy Carter, the man who defeated Ford by a razor-thin margin in 1976, today hailed Jerry Ford as 'one most admirable public servants and human beings I have ever known.' Carter will eulogize Ford at one of the services to be held next week."

ABC World News (12/27, story 4, 2:55, Gibson, 8.78M) ran a segment on Ford's legacy, which Cokie Roberts described as "that of a healer." ABC World News (12/27, story 3, 3:15, Gibson, 8.78M) later noted Ford "entitled his memoirs 'A Time to Heal.'" And NBC Nightly News (12/27, story 2, 5:10, Williams, 9.87M) showed Ford saying, "When historians 50 years from now objectively write about the Ford Administration, I hope they will say that President Ford healed the wounds of Watergate, ended the tragedy of the war in Vietnam and restored public confidence in the White House itself."

On MSNBC's Scarborough Country (12/27), host Joe Scarborough said, "30 years after leaving Washington, Gerald Ford is being remembered tonight as the man who ended America's long national nightmare and brought honor back to the presidency." Fox News' Special Report (12/27, Wallace), which devoted most of its broadcast to Ford's life and legacy, said Ford was a "man who helped heal a nation torn apart by Watergate and Vietnam." During his report on Special Report, correspondent Wendell Goler described Ford as an "everyman" who "made his own breakfast his first morning in the White House." CNN's 360 Degrees (12/27, Cooper) said, "He never wanted to be president, but he helped redeem the office, just when the presidency and the country needed it most. … This accidental president had anything but an incidental presidency."

Politicians and journalists who worked with Ford also remarked on Ford's personality. On MSNBC's Scarborough Country (12/27, Scarborough), Pat Buchanan said, "While I do disagree with President Ford, I do believe he was the pivot on which the country turned out of a horrible time into a better time." On Fox News' Your World (12/27, Asman), former Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole (R), who was Ford's 1996 running mate, said Ford had a "sort of an amiable way about him" and averred that history will treat Ford "very well." On Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (12/27, Gallagher), Robert McFarlane, who was a special assistant for national security during the Ford administration, said, "I think the outstanding quality of Gerald Ford has been character and integrity…. I mean, almost every politician you and I watch in Washington views what they say and do in terms of how it affects their personal political self-interest. Not Gerry Ford." On MSNBC's Countdown (12/27, Olbermann), Andrea Mitchell said, "He really believe din the goodness of people." On MSNBC's Hardball (12/27, Matthews), former NBC Nightly News anchor Tom Brokaw said, "People keeping asking me today what it was like covering Gerald Ford as president after covering Nixon. Metaphorically and truly, it was the difference between night, the darkness of Richard Nixon, and day, the Gerald Ford administration. He was open, candid. When he told us something, we generally could believe it." Brokaw also noted that Ford came from a "different Republican Party" than today's.

The Chicago Tribune (12/28, Neikirk, 617K) praises Ford for bringing "a calming presence to the highest office in the land, shunning the imperial atmosphere fostered by Nixon." The Christian Science Monitor (12/28, Grier, 59K) says he was "decent, fair, modest, and -- truth be told -- shrewd, he made Washington seem normal again." The Washington Post (12/28, C1, Haygood, 690K) and USA Today (12/28, 5A, Ritter, 2.27M) run equally laudatory pieces about the Fords.

In a brief op-ed appearing in the Washington Post (12/28, A27, 690K), former Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole praises Ford as a "principled partisan…who worked diligently for Republican causes but who knew the limits of partisanship." In the New York Times (12/28, 1.16M), David Hume Kennerly, Ford's personal photographer, writes, "The man I came to know and admire had a quiet and very powerful sense of self. He had the least guile of anyone I've ever met and a total lack of vanity." In an op-ed in the Washington Post (12/28, A27, 690K), Ron Nessen writes, "Unlike politicians who carefully calculate for decades how their every word and deed will sound and look when they eventually run for the White House, Ford moved into the Oval Office without having his persona distorted by lust for the presidency. And the public sensed this genuineness. What a relief to have a regular person as president, particularly after the imperial presidencies of Nixon and Lyndon B. Johnson." Melvin R. Laird, secretary of defense under Nixon and an eight-term congressman from Wisconsin, also praises Ford in the Wall Street Journal (12/28, 2.04M).

Contrasting Ford's seemingly accidental accession to the presidency with his actions, particularly after the Watergate scandal, commentators also refer to Ford's as the "right person" to hold the presidency. In an op-ed appearing in Financial Times (12/28), Ar Cyr, Clausen Distinguished professor at Carthage College in Wisconsin, describes Ford as "right president at one particular moment in history." In an op-ed appearing in the Wall Street Journal (12/28, A14, 2.04M), Melvin Laird writes, "He was our Accidental President. … It was a happy accident for America, and in many ways it was no accident. It was years in the making and required hard work, planning and good fortune." After recounting Ford's accomplishments reforming the CIA and fighting inflation, Laird writes, "Of greatest importance…was his righting of the ship of state," including his pardon of Nixon.

In his Washington Post (12/28, A27, 690K) column, George Will writes, "Ford was an 'accidental president,' but there are reasons accidents happen as they do. Call it the cunning of history or an irony of American life, but this underestimated graduate of Yale Law School served a purpose Richard Nixon did not have in mind when he nominated him to replace the disgraced Vice President Spiro Agnew."

There are other stories in this morning's papers on Ford's life and career. The Washington Post (12/28, E1, Gildea, 690K) describes Ford's love of sports, while the Los Angeles Times (12/28, Martin, Abrams, Powers, 850K) reports on Ford's activities in Palm Desert, CA where he "helped open and fund such charitable endeavors as a domestic violence shelter, a children's museum, a teenage outreach program and a bighorn sheep preserve. Betty Ford is best known for establishing the alcohol and drug treatment clinic in Rancho Mirage that bears her name. It has treated more than 60,000 people since opening in 1982." The Times adds, "Although Ford represented Grand Rapids, Mich. for 25 years in Congress, he and Betty were hometown heroes in the Coachella Valley." The Washington Post (12/28, B1, Shapira, 690K) also notes that the former president's home in Alexandria, VA, has long been on the market, and the New York Times (12/28, Stanley, 1.16M) muses about how the media should approach covering Ford's passing.

Wealth Of New York Presidential Aspirants May Foretell National Political Shift. The Washington Post (12/28, A3, Powell, 690K) reports on the abundance of New York politicians with presidential aspirations, ranging from the "instantly identifiable," like New York Sen. Hillary Clinton (D) or former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani (R), to the less universally known, like current New York mayor Michael Bloomberg (R) and New York Gov. George Pataki (R). "New York may not challenge Virginia for its title as 'Mother of Presidents,' but the state could produce four presidential candidates in 2008 -- not to mention new Gov. Eliot L. Spitzer (D), who has harbored presidential dreams since he was in fourth grade and is already rumored to have an eye on 2012." The Post suggests this could indicate a national trend in which the South is "played out," and is "a curious turnabout for a state and a city" with which "Americans have long had a love-loathe relationship." The piece continues to detail New York's political history and to profile its current batch of 2008 hopefuls.

Edwards Enters Race For White House. Former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards (D), the 2004 Democratic vice presidential nominee, on Wednesday joined the 2008 race for president. The CBS Evening News (12/27, story 8, 0:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported that Edwards "says he will make a second run for president. Officially the announcement comes tomorrow in New Orleans. Edwards arrived there today. The campaign actually got ahead of itself, breaking the story today on its Website. An advisor says better a day earlier than a day late."

Fox News' Big Story (12/27, Gibson) reported that Edwards will announce his decision to run for president in 2008 from New Orleans' Ninth Ward. Fox News added, "Today, he helped clean up a New Orleans home that was badly damaged by Katrina." On MSNBC's Hardball (12/27), host Chris Matthews commented, "I think he's a guy to watch."

The AP (12/28, Pickler) reports that Edwards "jumped into the presidential race Wednesday a day earlier than he'd planned, prodded by an Internet glitch to launch a candidacy focused on health care, taxes and other domestic issues." Edwards' "campaign accidentally went live with his election Web site a day before an announcement Thursday that was supposed to use Hurricane-ravaged New Orleans as a backdrop. The slip-up gave an unintended double-meaning to his campaign slogan on the John Edwards '08 Web site: 'Tomorrow begins today.' Aides quickly shut down the errant Web site but could not contain news of the obvious, even in the shadows of former President Ford's death." The AP notes, "Earlier Wednesday, Edwards visited the site of his planned announcement for a photo opportunity," doing "yard work at the home of Orelia Tyler, 54, whose house was gutted by Hurricane Katrina and is close to being rebuilt."

The New Orleans Times-Picayune (12/28, Nolan) reports that in New Orleans Wednesday, Edwards "limited his remarks," saying that "his candidacy would emphasize Americans helping Americans, New Orleans being the most spectacular current example of the opportunities that offers. Edwards did speak briefly to the recovery, faulting the White House for providing too little help. 'The president should've said, 'I want someone in my office every morning, telling me what was happening in New Orleans yesterday,'' he said."

Bloomberg (12/28, Johnston) notes that during his first run for president, Edwards "spoke often about two Americas, one rich and one poor. He will use New Orleans tomorrow as a backdrop to highlight that disparity."

The Wall Street Journal (12/28, A4, Calmes, 2.04M) reports, "For the roughly two dozen candidates considering a run for the White House, it is perhaps the jackpot question: What might be the winning message in a contest whose first nominating vote is still more than a year away?" On Thursday, Edwards "begins testing his hunch that Americans, though focused now on the war in Iraq, can be won over to a campaign built on what he calls 'the great moral issue of our time' -- fighting poverty at home." The Journal notes that though Edwards' "theme of ending the 'Two Americas' of haves and have-nots dates to his 2004 presidential bid," Edwards "argues that the disparity between the richest Americans and the working class has widened since then. 'When I talked about poverty in the 2004 campaign, political types said it was futile,' he said in a speech this year. 'They said nobody cares about poverty except for the poor. Not true, and we saw it with Katrina.'" The Journal notes, however, "Many Democratic political operatives remain skeptical that the Edwards message will resonate among either Democratic or independent voters when antiwar talk is the rage, and could continue to be into 2008."

Edwards' Second Bid For President Will Face New Challenges. The Raleigh News & Observer (12/28, Christensen) reports that that as Edwards kicks off his second run for president, he "faces a different political landscape than he did three years ago when he was a little-known freshman senator from North Carolina." Now, Edwards is "an established national political figure," meaning that "the pressure is on for him to perform well in the early caucus and primary states in 2008, as well as in the money-raising chase in 2007." He "must contend with widespread assumptions that New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton is the odds-on favorite to capture the nomination and that Edwards' fresh-faced appeal has been eclipsed by Illinois Sen. Barack Obama. 'Before Barack Obama, it was clear Edwards was going to be the biggest hurdle for Hillary to overcome and had the best shot at stopping her,' said Chuck Todd, editor-in-chief of the Political Hotline, an Internet newsletter. 'Obama complicates his run. … If it wasn't for Obama, I think we'd say this is a two-person race.'" McClatchy lists as Edwards' key assets: name recognition, the likely "solid financial support" of "many of the nation's trial lawyers," the likely "support of a significant portion of organized labor," the new Democratic nominating calendar, and the fact that Edwards is "the only Southerner in the race, with the possible exception of retired Gen. Wesley Clark."

CQ Politics (12/27, Horrigan, Benenson) reported that although the possible presidential bids of Sens. Clinton and Obama have received more attention from the media, "the handsome and personable Edwards has an opportunity to pursue a sizable niche as an alternative for Democratic voters worried about the electability of Clinton -- who carries the baggage of controversies that surrounded her and her husband during their White House years -- or Obama, who bears the burden of proof that the nation is prepared to elect a black president, and whose mere two years in the Senate would raise questions about whether he had sufficient experience."

The New York Sun (12/28, Gerstein) reports, "By focusing on social justice and the poor, Mr. Edwards, 53, hopes to court Democratic Party activists and pose a challenge from the left to other likely presidential contenders, such as Senator Clinton. 'I don't think there's any question that by talking about labor, the minimum wage, and poverty, his strategy has been to run as the progressive alternative,' a Democratic operative and lobbyist, Steven Elmendorf, said in an interview." The Sun notes, "Democratic strategists said Mr. Edwards has made good use of his time since leaving the Senate in 2004. … In addition to staking out the poverty issue and boosting his foreign affairs resume with international travel," Edwards "has moved aggressively to win the support of labor unions, particularly those for service workers. 'He's made an effort. He's worked it hard,' Mr. Elmendorf said. However, he said, he doubts many unions will be willing to endorse Mr. Edwards in the primary, in part because Mrs. Clinton will be seeking those same endorsements, or a pledge from labor groups to stay neutral."

News Coverage Of Ford's Death Expected To Overshadow Edwards' Announcement. The Washington Post (12/28, A3, Balz, 690K) reports that Edwards chose "the week between Christmas and New Year's Day to announce his candidacy in large part because he and his advisers thought it would attract more attention during what is traditionally a slow news period. But the death of former president Gerald R. Ford was by far the dominant news on Wednesday and probably will continue to be for several more days. Edwards issued a statement mourning the death of the 38th president. 'President Ford was a true leader -- he made decisions based on what he believed was right, not what was politically expedient,' the statement said. 'He called on us to never lose faith that we can change America.' He said Americans could honor Ford's memory by 'lifting ourselves above partisan politics and acting with the courage and conviction of our ideals.'"

Edwards Set To Launch Announcement Tour Of Key Early Presidential States. The Winston-Salem Journal (12/28, Romoser) reports that following a news conference Thursday in New Orleans, Edwards "is expected to begin a whirlwind, three-day tour in which he will visit Iowa, Nevada, New Hampshire and South Carolina -- the first four states in the 2008 Democratic primary season. On Saturday night, Edwards will conclude the tour with a rally in Chapel Hill."

Carlson Says "Nice Guy" Edwards "Candidate Most Reminiscent" Of Ford. In a piece for Bloomberg (12/28), columnist Margaret Carlson writes that "Edwards's pitch that there are two Americas is, if anything, truer today than when he first took it out for a spin. … He favors an expansion of the earned income tax credit, better lending practices, housing vouchers, sprinkling low-income housing amid McMansions and a program to rehabilitate Louisiana after Katrina. And it isn't only the Ninth Ward that bears Edwards out. Wages are stagnant. There has been no increase in the minimum wage. More people are without health insurance than before." Carlson adds, "It could be that in 2004, Edwards suffered from first-time jitters, too much message discipline about a divided America and the handicap of playing second banana to a waffling, windsurfing stiff. There could be a hunger now for a quieter man after eight years of taking our enemies dead or alive. Edwards is the candidate most reminiscent of the late Gerald Ford," who "was a fine president in a difficult moment, so decent he couldn't win the presidency on his own. We are a schizophrenic electorate. We prefer the likeable candidate over the sourpuss, but we also want a tough guy. Edwards has a chance only if nice guys don't finish last."

Ohio Supreme Court Reprimands Taft. The AP (12/28, Welsh-Huggins) reports, "The state Supreme Court on Wednesday publicly reprimanded Ohio Gov. Bob Taft for his ethics violations in office, a black mark that will stay on his permanent record as an attorney." Taft, "a Republican and great-grandson of President William Howard Taft, pleaded no contest in 2005 to failing to report golf outings and other gifts worth nearly $6,000 during his four-year term. He was fined $4,000. Taft could not seek re-election because of term limits and leaves office in less than two weeks." The New York Times (12/28, Driehaus, 1.16M) also reports the story.

Schwarzenegger Plans Boost In Government Spending On "Cutting Edge Research." The Los Angeles Times (12/28, Halper, 850K) reports, "A plan announced by Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger on Wednesday to boost public funding for cutting-edge research could prove to be a boon to some of the state's top universities -- and to private companies that leverage their breakthroughs into big profits." The proposal, which is "to be included in the budget unveiled by the governor early next month, calls for investing $95 million in four research projects based at the state's public universities. The projects designated for funding, at least one of which would be developed in partnership with a major oil company, are mostly geared toward the creation of cleaner burning fuels." The Times adds "some advocacy groups questioned whether the state would get a proper return on its investment. They urged the administration to put safeguards in place that would assure that taxpayers -- and not just private companies -- reap some of the profits created by publicly funded innovations."

High Energy Prices Lift Houston's Economy. The Los Angeles Times (12/28, Bustillo, 850K) reports from Houston, "High oil, natural gas and electricity prices may bring pain to families and business owners elsewhere, but in America's energy capital, they bring prosperity. Two out of every five Houstonians owe their jobs to energy — many big oil and gas companies have their world or American headquarters in Houston — and the industry's spectacular profits in recent years have helped the nation's fourth-largest city outdistance the country as a whole in economic growth." But "veterans of Houston's boom-and-bust energy economy are mindful that fortunes could turn quickly, like they did in the 1980s, when a sudden swoon in crude oil prices sent the city's economy crashing." The current "boom is tied not only to short-term spikes in energy prices, but to forecasts for global energy demand that are leading many companies to make ambitious long-term bets."

Shell Hires Norton As Counsel. The Wall Street Journal (12/28, B5, 2.04M) reports, "Royal Dutch Shell PLC said it hired former U.S. Interior Secretary Gale Norton to serve as a counsel for the Anglo-Dutch oil company. The move comes amid rising scrutiny in Washington of the department's dealings with the oil industry." Norton "will serve as general counsel for the firm's unconventional-resources division, Shell said. The oil company is developing and testing proprietary technology designed to enhance oil recovery from certain unconventional sources, such as oil shale and extra-heavy oil, Shell said."

Fleishman-Hillard Launches PH Boom Initiative. The Washington Post's Judy Sarasohn reports in her "Special Interests" column, "In Washington, where every special interest has a lobbyist or at least a spokesman, baby boomers now have their own practice group. Public relations biggie Fleishman-Hillard Inc. has launched what it calls FH Boom, a practice that targets baby boomers, those folks roughly between 42 and 60 years old. The demographic is about 78 million people." The Post adds, "The practice is heavy on commercial marketing and public relations, but FH Boom also figures to advise public affairs clients on coalitions and advocacy issues involving baby boomers. Think legislative and administration issues dealing with taxes, health care, Medicare costs, Social Security and college costs." Paul Johnson, president of public affairs for Fleishman, "said that the firm's work for AARP has given it a 'ringside seat' to see how boomers affect politics and government."

Harlem Church Seeks Housing Improvements Without Displacing Elderly. The Wall Street Journal (12/28, Lagnado, 2.04M) reports on the strategy used by Abyssinian Development Corp., "the 17-year-old not-for-porfit real-estate arm of the famed nearly 200-year-old Abyssinian Baptist Church," to "keep the elderly—and particularly the elderly poor—at home, where they want to be, and out of institutions. Abyssinian's unusual answer is real estate." The group, which "controls $299 million in property assets in booming central Harlem,…is using its resources to create a social, psychological and economic sanctuary for the community's elderly and poor residents, pumping proceeds into social-service projects while enabling tenants in Abyssinian-owned housing to pay low rents."

Police Charity Abandons Fundraising Scheme. The Wall Street Journal (12/28, B1, Anders, 2.04M) reports on the efforts of Robert Teal, who "recently became chairman of the CHP 11-99 Foundation," to end a fundraising practice which critics say could result in drivers improperly avoiding speeding tickets. The organization provides college scholarships and other benefits to members of the California Highway Patrol. "For years, the foundation had been selling 'Life Memberships' to motorists for $1,800 apiece. Lots of people with Ferraris, BMWs and other fast cars snapped them up, mounting the foundation's hard-to-miss license-plate holders on their vehicles' rear bumpers. … Buying a membership was seen by many as protection against speeding tickets." Mindful of the perception of impropriety, "Teal led a push to revamp the way the 8,000-member foundation raises money." Teal's strategy involved boosting the price of memberships to make them inaccessible to most, and "tapping into big new sources of money. He urged colleagues to approach some of California's leading corporations and wealthiest people, asking them to donate $100,000 or more to create endowed scholarships in their name, which could run in perpetuity."

WPost Accuses Virginia Republicans For Blocking Transportation Funding. An editorial in the Washington Post (12/28, A26, 690K) titled, "The Snooker Strategy," scolds Virginia Republicans for failing to adequately fund the state's "aging transportation network," noting that Gov. Tim Kaine (D) "did the sensible thing by proposing a tax package that would yield $1 billion annually for transportation statewide. The Republican-dominated state Senate backed him. But Republicans who control the House of Delegates would have none of it. Instead, after a generation of neglect, they have decided to attack the problem of Virginia's roads with press releases" which "are masterpieces of omission, obfuscation and budgetary shenanigans designed to snooker voters. Rather than proposing a long-term fix for a long-term problem, they proudly announce that they favor spending what amounts to a pittance -- half of the state's current $500 million surplus -- on one-time transportation projects."

Islamists Retreat As Ethiopian-Backed Troops Near Mogadishu. The New York Times (12/28, A1, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports on its front page that Islamist forces who have controlled much of Somalia in recent months have "suddenly vanished from the streets of the capital, Mogadishu, residents said Wednesday night," as thousands of Ethiopian-back troops massed outside the city. In recent days, Ethiopian-backed forces, "with tacit approval from the United States, have unleashed tanks, helicopter gunships and jet fighters on the Islamists, decimating their military and paving the way for the internationally recognized transitional government of Somalia to assert control." The Washington Post (12/28, A22, McCrummen, 690K) reports the situation in Mogadishu "appeared confused, with witnesses reporting thousands of Somalis…fleeing the capital, and those who remained unsure who might next control the city." Meanwhile, a draft UN Security Council statement calling for a cease-fire "remained stalled, while African Union officials asked for a meeting of regional leaders in the Ethiopian capital, Addis Ababa, and called on Ethiopian forces to withdraw."

The Washington Times/AP (12/28, Hassan) reports the transitional Somali government "predicted that the capital and stronghold of the radical Islamists would fall without a fight." However, the Financial Times (12/28, England, Sevastopulo) reports officials from the Islamist movement "have said they are planning for a 'new phase' in the conflict, suggesting they are preparing to mount a guerrilla campaign against the better-equipped Ethiopian forces."

The Los Angeles Times (12/28, Sanders, Albadri, 850K) reports US military officials "acknowledged they have been conducting operations to interdict terrorists in the seas surrounding the Horn of Africa but noted those missions have been in place for several years." One military official said there is "a Navy presence off the coast of Somalia, but it is aimed primarily at anti-piracy efforts and has been in place for some time."

More Commentary. In an editorial, the New York Times (12/28, 1.16M) writes, "It is tempting to wink at Ethiopia's stunningly successful offensive in Somalia. … But if there's anything we should have learned over the past few sad years, it is that this kind of unilateral pre-emptive attack seldom solves anything, particularly when the country doing the invading is regarded as a longstanding enemy." Although "there was little international outcry…moderate forces in Somalia have been appalled by the brutal intolerance of Islamist leaders who have threatened to behead people for not praying five times a day, they are unlikely to embrace Ethiopian soldiers as a good alternative." Therefore, the Times argues that "rather than trying to marginalize the Islamic militias and the huge clan they represent, the international community should try to harness this moment to push for unity talks while the Islamists are weak and the transitional government has attained a more equal standing."

The Wall Street Journal (12/28, A14, 2.04M) editorializes, "The armed conflicts that so often roil Africa rarely engage US interests except in a humanitarian sense. But that cannot be said of the war that has now broken out between Ethiopia and the Islamists who seized control of much of Somalia in June. Here America's strategic interests are very much engaged, even if the actors in the fight range, morally speaking, from the unpalatable to the unacceptable." However, the Journal concedes, "There is a material limit to what the US can do for East Africa, and expectations for what the region can and will do it for itself cannot be high. Still, the Ethiopian offensive against Islamic Courts is an act of regional hygiene that we can hope is able to contain radical Islam from spreading to a far larger swath of Africa."

Iran's Ties With Syria Complicate US Plans. The New York Times (12/28, A14, Slackman, 1.16M) reports, "As the White House begins to rethink its strategy for dealing with the Middle East, particularly how to calm the chaos in Iraq, pressure to try to re-engage Syria has grown." Some Western analysts contend that Syria "can be pried away from Iran's influence and convinced that its long-term interests lie instead with the West. But Washington has spent years trying to isolate Syria, while Iran has for decades moved to entwine itself with Syria on many levels -- political, military, economic and religious." Iran, it notes, has "pools of money" to "help promote Iranian influence in Syria," which some Western diplomats in Iran "say that, even if the United States tried, it might be impossible to extricate Syria from Iran's orbit."

Iranian Parliament Backs "Revision" Of IAEA Cooperation. The New York Times (12/28, A3, Fathi, 1.16M) reports the Iranian Parliament, "by an overwhelming vote," approved legislation "that could limit Iran's cooperation with the" IAEA. The Times says the bill "was a response to" Saturday's UNSCR, and notes it "asserts that the government should 'revise its cooperation with the [IAEA] based on the interests of Iran and its people.'" The Guardian Council's quick endorsement of the measure was "a gesture that suggested that religious authorities are united behind the bill."

Author Says Ahmadinejad Trying To Appeal To All Muslims. Author Roya Hakakian writes in a Wall Street Journal (12/28, A14, 2.04M) op-ed that Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's "existential mission is to recast the ethos of being Iranian," by "peddling a pan-Islamism." Hakakian says that Ahmadinejad's "numerous spectacles, most recently the Holocaust conference, are meant to bring a sense of transcultural and transethnic unity through a common political purpose. On the domestic scene, this is an old act -- a familiar blunder to annihilate Iranian nationalism, or to force it to become subordinate to the Muslim, with Arab undertones."

State Department Rebukes Israel For Settlement Building Plan. The AP (12/28, Schweid) reports, "In a rare criticism, the Bush administration said Wednesday if Israel proceeds with construction of a settlement on the West Bank it would violate its peacemaking obligations." State Department spokesman Gonzalo Gallegos said, "The US calls on Israel to meet its roadmap obligations and avoid taking steps that could be viewed as predetermining the outcome of future negotiations. The establishment of a new settlement or the expansion of any existing settlement would violate Israel's obligations under the roadmap." The AP says the Administration "rarely criticizes Israel's actions and has gained Israel's support for establishment of a Palestinian state." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "is expected to go to the Middle East next month to try to spur peacemaking between Israel and the Palestinians," however, "it was not clear whether she had approved [Gallegos'] statement."

The New York Times (12/28, A6, Cooper, 1.16M) calls the statement "a rare public rebuke to Israel," adding, "For the Bush administration, which has shied away from criticizing Israel, the rebuke was so unusual that State Department officials took pains to assure reporters that it represented official policy and had been cleared by senior members of the administration." Tel Aviv's announced planned to proceed with construction "has particularly confounded American diplomats because it appears to run counter to the prevailing effort by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who offered a series of gestures to the Palestinians several days ago, after meeting with [Palestinian President Mahmoud] Abbas."

Israel To Resume Efforts To Stem Rocket Attacks. The Financial Times (12/28, Morris) reports Tel Aviv "on Wednesday ordered the military to resume targeting militants spotted firing rockets from the Gaza Strip but said its month-long ceasefire with the Palestinians would otherwise remain in force." The IDF "ended its policy of restraint in the face of ceasefire violations after one of eight rockets fired at Israel on Tuesday wounded two youths in the southern town of Sderot, one of them seriously." The Times says Olmert "had been under pressure from inside and outside his cabinet to end the policy of restraint in the face of continuing rocket attacks, many of them claimed by the Islamic Jihad movement, which has no political role in the Palestinian Authority." Tel Aviv said it does plan to "continue its policy of liaising with Palestinian security officials as part of efforts to stem the rocket fire." The New York Times (12/28, A6, Erlanger, 1.16M) adds Olmert "had ordered the military not to respond, but political pressure to do so was growing." Olmert was also "being criticized from the left by his own defense minister, Amir Peretz of the Labor Party, and from the right by Benjamin Netanyahu." The AP (12/28, Federman) says that "a new round of fighting in Gaza could undermine Israel's efforts to bolster the moderate Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, in his standoff with the Islamic militants of Hamas who control the Palestinian government and legislature."

Abbas Asks For "Closed-Door Talks" On "Most Difficult Disputes." The AP (12/28, Nasrawi) reports Abbas "proposed Wednesday that he start closed-door talks with Israel on some of their most difficult disputes including the status of Jerusalem and the fate of Palestinian refugees." Abbas "did not spell out why he was proposing that the negotiations with Israel be 'backdoor.' But as one of the architects of the 1993 Oslo peace accord between Israel and the Palestinians, he is known to champion quiet, informal diplomacy." He "said he proposed backdoor negotiations to Olmert at their weekend meeting, and that the Israeli leader promised to consider the suggestion. He also said he planned to discuss the idea with [Secretary Rice] when she comes to the Middle East next month." The AP says "recent weeks have seen a growing momentum toward reviving Israeli-Palestinian peace talks."

US Intensifies Crackdown On Hezbollah Funding. The Wall Street Journal (12/28, A1, Higgins, 2.04M) reports in a front page article that "until war erupted in July, Washington hailed Lebanon as a beacon for its vision of the 'new Middle East' -- a region committed to democracy, aligned with the West and eager to root out militant groups." But today, the country is "a showcase for the growing clout of forces that America wants eclipsed: Hezbollah, Iran and Syria." While cracking down on terrorist financing "has been a key front in America's 'war on terror' since al Qaeda's 2001 attacks," efforts "initially focused on Osama bin Laden's network but has struck hard in recent months at Hezbollah." For example, the Treasury Department has "targeted an Iranian state bank it says channeled funds to Hezbollah and a host of organizations and companies." The Bush administration "argues that all Hezbollah-related money must be stopped, whether it is used to buy weapons, fund microcredits or run the group's network of clinics, schools and other services." Pat O'Brien, assistant Treasury secretary for terrorist financing, said, "We don't buy into the frame of mind that you can distinguish between the military and social arms." However, this approach "carries a risk: It has strengthened the view of Hezbollah's supporters, many of whom come from Lebanon's most-impoverished areas, that America wants to keep them poor, not fight terrorism. Even Hezbollah's rivals say the US strategy plays into the hands of Islamist propagandists, who blame America and Israel for economic and other woes."

Turkey Acquits 13 In Attack On US Troops. The AP (12/28) reports thirteen Turkish villagers were acquitted Wednesday "of attacking US troops with stones and eggs after an errant US Tomahawk missile fell near their village three years ago." A Turkish court ruled the villagers' actions "did not constitute a crime" after defense lawyer Seyhmus Ulek said the incident was "a democratic reaction against American soldiers."

Israeli Tourists Heed Terror Warning In India. The Washington Times (12/28, Mitnick, 88K) reports, "Israeli backpackers in India are heeding a government warning of an al Qaeda terrorist attack over the New Year's holiday on beach resorts and rave parties in the state of Goa." The two-week-old warning from Israel's Headquarters for the War on Terror "has raised concern that al Qaeda wants to repeat the 2002 bombing in the Indonesian resort island of Bali that killed 202 persons." It also marked the first time Israel warned of a "concrete threat" of an al Qaeda attack in India, however, "Indian defense and police officials rejected the warning."

Sudan's Position On UN Darfur Force Remains Unclear. The AP (12/28, Lederer) notes Khartoum "raised new questions Wednesday about its commitment to a U.N. peace effort in the violence-wracked Darfur region as its ambassador ruled out any U.N. peacekeeping troops — an element of the world body's proposal." PermRep Abdalmahmood Abdalhaleem's "surprise statement came just minutes after the [UNSC] announced that it welcomed the Sudanese president's acceptance of the U.N. plan to help end the escalating conflict — a plan that includes deployment of a hybrid African Union-United Nations force." He told the media "that the hybrid force must be smaller and have no U.N. peacekeepers, only U.N. technical and logistical experts supporting African troops."

In more positive tones, the New York Times (12/28, A13, Gootman, 1.16M) reports UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan "said Wednesday that the Security Council was 'encouraged' that a recent message from the Sudanese government could pave the way for a large-scale peacekeeping operation in the country's war-ravaged Darfur region." Annan did add "that some diplomats remained skeptical of Sudan's overtures, and he urged the [UNSC] to press ahead quickly with its plans to test the government's intentions." The Times adds that a letter from Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir to Anna "seems to welcome a joint United Nations-African Union peacekeeping force for Darfur, it also suggests that Sudan should have veto power over how the effort is carried out."

UK's Atomic Weapons Hunters Remain Hot On Trail Of Spy's Killers. Under the headline, "Atomic Alliance: UK Village Is Home To Secretive Agency; Aldermaston Adopts Policy Of Peaceful Coexistence With Weapons Facility," the Wall Street Journal (12/28, Bryan-Low, Mollenkamp, 2.04M) reports from the village, that the "Atomic Weapons Establishment – [is] Britain's nuclear-weapons agency that, for the most part, peacefully coexists with residents here." The Journal adds that recently "though, the super-secretive agency has given the public a glimpse of what its labs do. AWE's specialists identified polonium 210 as the radioactive poison that killed former Russian intelligence agent Alexander Litvinenko on Nov. 23. Now, AWE's scientists are playing a vital role in Scotland Yard's investigation into the suspected murder by testing for radiation in places that Mr. Litvinenko or his associates went in the weeks before."

Efforts To Combat Malnutrition In Africa Improving. In a front page article, the New York Times

(12/28, A1, Wines, 1.16M) reports on "sub-Saharan Africa's curse" of malnutrition, which contributed to nearly half of the deaths of five million African children under age 5 died last year. However, "the outlook for malnourished children in sub-Saharan Africa is better than in decades, thanks to an awakening to the issue -- by selected governments, anyway." Ethiopia, it notes, has "the most comprehensive program in all Africa -- a joint venture with United Nations agencies that regularly screens nearly half of its 14 million children under 5 for health and nutrition problems." Unicef's Ethiopia representative, Bjorn Ljungqvist, said the program "may be a model for Africa."

Russian Investigators Link Poisoning Probe To Yukos Case. The New York Times (12/28, A3, Myers, 1.16M) reports Russia's Prosecutor General's Office Wednesday "produced a startling new twist in the investigation of the killing of Alexander V. Litvinenko" by announcing that it was investigating "the possible involvement of former executives of Yukos Oil." In a statement, the prosecutor's office said its investigation "indicated a link between the poisoning of Mr. Litvinenko and criminal cases under way against Yukos executives," singling out "Leonid B. Nevzlin, a major shareholder and partner of the company's jailed chief executive, Mikhail B. Khodorkovsky." The statement, however, "did not elaborate on any evidence that might link Mr. Nevzlin and others to Mr. Litvinenko's death." AFP (12/28) reports Litvinenko's former spokesman, Alex Godfarb, called the allegations "an attempt to deflect responsibility from the true perpetrators." Meanwhile, the AP (12/28, Meyer) notes that Russia has "unsuccessfully pressed for the extradition of a number of Kremlin critics in recent years, including Nevzlin and tycoon Boris Berezovsky, who lives in Britain." The Washington Post (12/28, A22, Finn, 690K) runs a similar report.

Gazprom Dispute With Belarus Could Disrupt European Gas Supply. The New York Times (12/28, Kramer, 1.16M) reports Gazprom "reacted fiercely on Wednesday to a suggestion from Belarus that it would pull natural gas out of export pipelines rather than pay a higher price for the fuel. Reversing course from its assurances of Tuesday, Gazprom warned Poland, Lithuania and Germany of possible supply disruptions. About 8 percent of the European Union's gas imports pass through Belarus." The Times adds, "As in the dispute with Ukraine, the bargaining has become a test of Belarus's leverage as a transit country for Russian energy and its willingness to risk the energy supplies of its neighbors farther down the pipelines."

The Wall Street Journal (12/28, 2.04M) reports, "Gazprom, which is demanding Belarus pay more than twice the current price for gas next year and hand over a 50% stake in its gas distribution system, refused to back down after Minsk threatened to siphon off Russian natural gas bound for Europe in the event of a suspension of supplies to Belarus. 'If a gas supply contract for next year is not reached, Gazprom will have no grounds for deliveries of gas to Belarus as of 10 a.m. Moscow time on Jan. 1, 2007,' Gazprom Chief Executive Alexei Miller said."

The Financial Times (12/28, Ostrovsky) reports analysts "said Gazprom's reputation could suffer further from the dispute." Gazprom "admitted it would not be able to fully compensate its European customers if Belarus started siphoning off gas from the pipeline, which transports 20 per cent of its gas to Europe." Gazprom "is in a difficult position, partly induced by its own policies towards Ukraine and other former Soviet republics over the past year. If Gazprom turns off gas supplies to Belarus, disrupting supplies to Europe, its reputation for unreliability would suffer further. If it caves in to Belarus's demands, however, it would lose face at home, while also displaying a selective approach to different political regimes in the former Soviet Union."

US, China Increase Maritime-Security Exchanges. The Washington Times (12/28, Halloran, 88K) reports, "The US Coast Guard is quietly expanding exchanges with Chinese maritime-security agencies in a move that reflects the boom in seaborne trade between the two countries." Coast Guard officials say the cooperation, which includes Chinese law-enforcement officers on Coast Guard cutters in the North Pacific and officers from China and America examining port security on each other's coasts, "is justified by growing trade links in spite of often uneasy political relations between the United States and China." The Times adds that the exchanges are also "part of a broader US effort to rebuild military exchanges with China," and "Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates indicated to the Senate Armed Services Committee ahead of his confirmation that he would continue" the effort.

Chinese Hydrogen-Power Entrepreneurs Struggle As System Hampers Innovation. The Washington Post (12/28, A22, Cody, 690K) reports, "As the economy matures, China's government has warned, it must rely increasingly on new technology invented by the Chinese themselves, who are being urged to turn assembly plants into laboratories blooming with a hundred flowers of new ideas. But the experiences of...companies with ambitions to market hydrogen power suggest that China's one-party system and pervasive controls hamper innovation in many fields, from arts to sciences." The Post adds, "Although the need for pollution-free vehicles and renewable energy is clear in China's increasingly choked cities, the future of hydrogen power has remained in the grasp of a powerful officialdom that decides on budget allocations. The government's senior levels repeatedly have endorsed alternative forms of energy but have yet to take decisive steps toward getting hydrogen-powered vehicles onto the streets."

Author Praises Annan's Service At UN. Author William Shawcross writes in the Washington Post (12/28, A27, 690K) that out-going UN Secretary General Kofi Annan "deserves a good sendoff. For 10 years he has persevered with unfailing grace in what really is 'a job from hell.'" Shawcross notes that "tragically for Annan and the United Nations, more than 20 of his best people were brutally murdered in Baghdad by al-Qaeda in August 2003. This assault, together with the political divisions, have crippled the United Nations in Iraq ever since." The U.N. role in Iraq has been "further complicated, if not diminished, by the oil-for-food scandal," he notes. However, Shawcross says it is "wrong to blame all this on Annan -- members of the Security Council, particularly France, Russia and China, were all busily corrupting the program for their own ends. Even the United States and Britain turned a blind eye to sanctions-busting when it helped their ally Jordan." Annan, he concludes, has dealt with problems "with more skill, patience and decency than any recent secretary general. If he was unable to create the decent, reformed, efficient and humane organization he sought, that is because far too few of its members want any such thing."

TERRORISM NEWS:

AP: Ex-Guantanamo Detainee Held Again (AP)

By Sadaqat Jan

AP, December 28, 2006

In his chronicle of life as an inmate at Guantanamo Bay, Afghan writer Abdul Rahim Muslim Dost describes his three years of humiliating detention for alleged ties to al-Qaida.

Now, he has lost his liberty again — this time believed jailed by the Pakistani intelligence service for the book's fierce criticism of the agency's role in the U.S.-led war on terrorist groups.

Just weeks after the Sept. 3 release of "The Broken Shackles of Guantanamo," co-written with his brother and fellow Guantanamo detainee Badruz Zaman Badar, Dost was taken away as he left a mosque after prayers in the northwest Pakistan city of Peshawar, where the family has lived for nearly 30 years.

Badar, 36, hasn't seen Dost since and thinks he was detained by Pakistan's Inter-Services Intelligence. In the book, the brothers condemn the agency as a "black institution" and accuse it of selling them into American custody.

There is no official word on Dost's whereabouts, although the rights group Amnesty International also thinks he is held by the government. Pakistan's military and ISI officials did not respond to requests for comment on Dost's case or the brothers' comments on the agency's conduct.

The brothers are both journalists and run a gemstone business. Dost has written more than 30 books, including poetry, and has edited magazines sympathetic to militant Islam, dating back to support for the Muslim guerrillas who fought Soviet troops occupying Afghanistan in the 1980s.

The brothers were both arrested in Peshawar in November 2001 and transferred to the U.S. military in Afghanistan before being taken to Guantanamo.

According to the book and details from "enemy combatant" review hearings at Guantanamo, the brothers were suspected of having links with Islamic extremists. Dost was accused of running a liaison office for al-Qaida in Herat, Afghanistan. He denied that, and the brothers were eventually freed a few months apart in 2005.

During detention, they were repeatedly questioned about Osama bin Laden and Taliban chief Mullah Omar but insist they never met the two leaders.

"We are not fighters. We are men of letters," Badar told The Associated Press in an interview. "We have criticized the American government for their overseas policies but we do not hate the American public, for they are innocent like us."

The 450-page book alleges guards at Guantanamo committed sexual improprieties, physical abuse and mistreatment of the Quran — reiterating charges made by other freed detainees and denied by the U.S. military.

But with a poetic flourish, the book also offers a look at daily life inside the prison at the U.S. Navy base, where hundreds of suspected Taliban and al-Qaida members have been held since the Sept. 11 terror attacks on America.

Dost grumbles about the prison food and says inmates were not fed chicken joints with big bones in case they could be used as weapons against guards.

He recounts giving lessons on Islam to other inmates using a secret communication system, passing words from cell to cell. He writes that captivity deepened prisoners' Muslim faith and some learned the Quran by heart, which he says helped them endure the indignity of detention.

"Life in Guantanamo jail is close to life in a grave," the book says. "That is because the prisoners in Cuba are neither dead nor alive. They are not dead because they have souls ... (but) they have been deprived of all the rights of living people."

Yet the brothers' bitterest criticism is reserved for the Inter-Services Intelligence agency.

Dost and Badar call its agents "criminals," accusing the ISI of selling the brothers into American custody and of confiscating tens of thousands of dollars worth of jewelry, cash and other goods from their business.

DOJ_NMG_0109510

"We have such a strong views against ISI because they are our neighbors, they speak our languages and they claim to share the same religion as we do," Badar told AP.

Pakistani intelligence has been instrumental in arresting hundreds of al-Qaida suspects since 2001, including Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11 attack, but human rights campaigners often accuse it of acting above the law.

Dost says ISI agents twice visited the brothers' home in Peshawar trying to prevent them from publishing "The Broken Shackles of Guantanamo." The brothers refused, and it was published on Sept. 3 in Pakistan in their native Pashto language.

On Sept. 29, unidentified men took Dost away from the mosque, bundling him into a jeep and driving off as one of Dost's sons looked on. Dost, who has nine children, hasn't been heard from, and his family fear for his safety.

In a recent report, Amnesty International said Pakistani authorities have violated "custodial safeguards" by not producing Dost in court or allowing him access to a lawyer or his family.

Badar, who has three children, now keeps a low profile running the family business. But he is keen the book is more widely read. He wants to issue translations in English, Arabic, Persian, French and Urdu.

"We want the world to know the facts and so that others don't suffer like us," he said.

Military: Abu Sayyaf Chief Remains Found (AP)

By Paul Alexander, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 28, 2006

Remains believed to be from the chief of the al-Qaida-linked Abu Sayyaf group, who was the target of a monthslong U.S.-backed manhunt, have been found in the southern Philippines, the military said Wednesday.

Khaddafy Janjalani is on a U.S. list of wanted terrorists with a $5 million bounty on his head for a series of beheadings, bombings and mass abductions. He has proven elusive in the dense jungles of the southern Philippines, and earlier reports of his demise have proven to be premature.

Lt. Col. Ariel Caculitan, the Philippine marines spokesman, said the decomposing remains were found buried in a remote part of Jolo island. Janjalani was believed to have been killed in a Sept. 4 clash with marines, Caculitan said, but DNA tests would be needed for confirmation.

"We are not yet officially confirming that it's him. We are still waiting for the results of the DNA examination," Caculitan said. He added the U.S. was providing help in forensic tests.

Caculitan said former Abu Sayyaf members who had surrendered helped troops find the site and claimed Janjalani had been shot in the neck. They said he had been carried dying from the area where he was shot to the burial location more than a mile away.

"If you look at the terrain ... it would not be easy to locate the site without reliable information," Caculitan said.

U.S.-backed Philippine troops launched an offensive on southern Jolo island in August, searching for Janjalani and two cohorts, top Indonesian terror suspects Dulmatin and Umar Patek.

Dulmatin, who goes by one name, and Patek are suspects in the 2002 Bali nightclub bombings that killed 202 people. They are also suspected of providing bomb-making training to Indonesian and Filipino guerrillas.

Janjalani and his key commanders have been charged with several deadly attacks in the Philippines, including a 2004 bombing that gutted a ferry and killed 116 people.

They also abducted three Americans and 17 Filipinos from a resort in May 2001, sparking a yearlong kidnapping spree that eventually involved 102 hostages. Eighteen, including one American, were beheaded or hacked to death.

U.S. military counterterrorism experts were dispatched to the Philippines in response to the abductions, and they are credited with helping decimate the terror group. The military currently estimates the Abu Sayyaf to have only 400 armed men left in Jolo and outlying provinces.

Still, Abu Sayyaf has shown itself to be resilient. Guerrillas were suspected of carrying out three recent bombings in the southern Philippines, including one that killed six people on Oct. 10.

DOJ_NMG_0109511

Abu Sayyaf says it is fighting to create a Muslim state in the southern Philippines, which has a large Muslim population. The government calls them bandits who survive on the ransom money they are able to extract from abductions.

Abu Sayyaf's founder is Janjalani's brother, Abdurajak Abubakar Janjalani, who fought in Afghanistan before he was killed in a clash with Filipino police in late 1998. A third brother, Hector, was sentenced to life in prison two years ago for abducting American Jeffrey Schilling in August 2000. Schilling managed to escape eight months later.

US, Philippine Military Check On Death Of Abu Sayyaf Leader (AFP)

AFP, December 28, 2006

The United States is helping the Philippine government identify the remains of a man said to be the elusive leader of the Al Qaeda-linked Abu Sayyaf terror group, the Philippine military chief has said.

General Hermogenes Esperon said US and Filipino forensics experts were now working on DNA samples to establish whether the body was that of Khadaffy Janjalani.

He told reporters in Manila the DNA would be checked against that of Khadaffy's older brother Hector Janjalani, now in jail in Manila.

The decomposing body was recovered from a shallow grave outside Patikul town on the southern island of Jolo Wednesday, Marine spokesman Lieutenant Colonel Ariel Caculitan said.

"Our counterparts, the American forces that are there have also taken a sample (tissue) so that they could make their own DNA tests," Esperon told reporters in Manila.

Janjalani's death would be a severe blow to the Abu Sayyaf, a small gang of self-styled Islamic militants that once received funding from Osama bin Laden, he said.

Janjalani has been reported killed several times in the past, only to embarrass the government by launching deadly terror attacks.

Caculitan said reports that Janjalani had been killed surfaced in September as troops launched a massive manhunt on Jolo involving more than 5,000 soldiers.

He would not say why the body was only recovered Wednesday.

Troops meanwhile are continuing to hunt down Jemaah Islamiyah (JI) militants Umar Patek and Dulmatin, whom Abu Sayyaf militants are believed to be protecting on the island.

Both men are wanted for the October 2002 night club bombings in Bali, Indonesia, in which 202 mostly foreign tourists were killed.

JI and Abu Sayyaf are both on the US government's list of foreign terrorist organizations. Under Janjalani, the Abu Sayyaf launched kidnapping raids targetting American, European and Asian tourists earlier in the decade.

Two of three American hostages kidnapped in 2001 were killed in captivity.

The US government has offered a five million dollar reward for any information leading to the killing or arrest of Janjalani.

Khadaffy Janjalani took over command of the Abu Sayyaf when his brother, Afghan-trained Islamic firebrand Abubakar Abdurajak Janjalani, who founded the group, was killed in a gunfight with police in 1998.

Austin Lawyer's Afghani Client Released (AAS)

By Chuck Lindell, AMERICAN-STATESMAN STAFF

Austin American-Statesman, December 28, 2006

Once called an enemy combatant, man freed from Guantánamo after 3 1/2 years

The news arrived in cloak-and-dagger fashion, but for Austin lawyer Dicky Grigg, it was welcome nonetheless.

Mohammad Akhtiar, his Afghani client who was held as an enemy combatant for 3 1/2 years at the U.S. Naval Station at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, was back in his homeland and traveling toward a reunion with his wife and nine children.

DOJ_NMG_0109512

"One, I'm very pleased and excited that he's released and back to his family," Grigg said. "But then, you have to consider that 3 1/2 years were taken out of his life. I'm glad he's home, but it makes you frustrated."

Grigg was among a loose-knit group of lawyers who represented, at no charge, many of the imprisoned enemy combatants in the belief that detention without review by a civilian court violated a basic principle of the U.S. system of justice.

The "Guantánamo Bar Association" clashed with the Bush administration over where to draw the line between combating terrorism and safeguarding constitutional rights — producing a U.S. Supreme Court ruling in June that allowed detainees to petition for writs of habeas corpus, which challenge the legality of detentions, in federal court.

The Republican-led Congress, saying classified information could be placed at risk in federal court proceedings, followed with legislation stripping federal courts of authority to hear cases from Guantánamo. Detainee cases instead will be heard by military commissions, where an officer acts as judge and at least three officers serve as jurors.

Grigg's first inkling that he and his client were no longer part of the ongoing legal battle came in a cryptic Nov. 15 e-mail from a U.S. Justice Department lawyer.

Protected information on Akhtiar's case had been filed with a federal court in Washington, D.C., Grigg was told. After returning a signed verification that he wouldn't disclose its contents, Grigg was provided with a notice saying Akhtiar would be returned to Afghanistan in about 30 days for whatever action that country deemed appropriate. No further explanation was given for his release.

Grigg also received permission to discuss the notice with Akhtiar — accused of launching a rocket attack against a U.S. base in Afghanistan in 2003 — to see if he would fight the transfer.

The Dec. 13 telephone call was monitored by a government lawyer to make sure no classified information was discussed in the three-way conversation among Grigg, Akhtiar and a Virginia translator who spoke the Pashto language.

Grigg, who did some checking and learned that every transferred detainee had been released by the Afghan government, got the answer he was expecting.

"He definitely wanted to go home," Grigg said. "But since it was protected information, I could not tell anyone, even his family, until the government made it public."

Grigg heard no more until Dec. 16 media reports from Kabul indicated that seven men had been transferred from Guantánamo and released by the Afghan government. He asked the Justice Department if Akhtiar was among the seven. In response, he received permission to discuss Akhtiar's release.

A quick e-mail to Akhtiar's relatives revealed that the Afghan government had already informed them of Akhtiar's arrival and freedom.

"They were en route to get him. Then they were taking him to Pakistan," where his wife and children are living in a refugee camp, Grigg said.

Akhtiar was among 17 Guantánamo detainees transferred Dec. 16 to five nations based on recommendations from U.S. military review boards, the Defense Department said. This year, 114 detainees have been returned to their home nations, leaving 395 still in custody at Guantánamo.

Another 85 detainees are eligible for transfer, Pentagon records show.

Grigg, a personal injury lawyer who typically sues insurance companies, has yet to hear from Akhtiar, whom he met only once during an intense visit to Guantánamo in March.

Akhtiar, 56 at the time, was seated in a folding chair and chained to the floor. Grigg had to remove all staples and paper clips from his papers before the meeting, and his notes were sealed and sent to a secure court facility in Virginia, where Grigg had to travel to review the classified information compiled about his client. Details of his conversation with Akhtiar remain classified.

Grigg, who said working for Akhtiar was the most moving experience of his 33-year career, is ready for more.

He already has a security clearance obtained after an FBI investigation. And he has been schooled in habeas law by the Center for Constitutional Rights, a New York nonprofit group that is coordinating representation for the detainees.

"I notified the Center for Constitutional Rights that if they got another one, I will take it. I think the more pressure you get, the more you get done," he said.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Airport Tries To Get Handle On Bag Theft (HC)

By Rad Sallee, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, December 28, 2006

A team of thieves or inside job at Bush could be to blame for dumped luggage

The 68 pieces of baggage that turned up in a trash bin Tuesday near George Bush Intercontinental Airport were probably stolen by a team of thieves in a single day's work while airline staffers were stretched thin by the demands of holiday travel, a Texas travel adviser theorized Wednesday.

"It sounds like a hit-or-miss holiday grab bag," said Tom Parsons, of Arlington, who operates Bestfares.com. "They probably grabbed enough to fill up a little van, then went off somewhere and rifled through it."

Another possibility — an inside job, with somebody taking the luggage on its way from the airplanes to the baggage-claim area — was not something investigators would talk about.

Meanwhile, it looked like business as usual at Bush on Wednesday. In Terminal C, the airport's busiest, hurried travelers whisked their bags off the carousel and headed for exits without anyone in authority checking whether the numbers on the ticket matched those on the bags.

Parsons said it is costly for the airlines to pay tag-checkers. It is a job that neither the Houston Airport System, which oversees operations at Bush and Hobby, nor the federal Transportation Security Administration performs.

Continental Airlines spokeswoman Mary Clark said many travelers would object to the delay that checking would cause. The airline does not check tags against bags, she said.

Not checking is standard practice at most U.S. airports, Parsons said, but checks are more frequent elsewhere. He said his bags were checked recently when he picked them up in San Juan, Puerto Rico.

Although 68 bags may seem "an amazing number" to steal from carousels, it's not that hard to do for a gang, he said.

"We had something like that in Dallas. A group of guys would go from one terminal to another and pick up a couple of bags each place and throw them into their car," he said. The group would later hold garage sales to sell their loot, including the luggage, he said.

At Bush, Parsons speculated, "Those guys were working at different terminals, they took their time and then moved on.

"When you look at the number of terminals and the number of places where you can pick up your bags, it doesn't take that many stops before you've got 70."

"Some bags will sit there on the carousel and go around for three or four laps, and that's a good sign of a missed connection. It doesn't take a rocket scientist to figure out that maybe nobody is going to claim this bag," he said.

Airlines have personnel to remove those bags to prevent theft, but sometimes they're busy elsewhere, Parsons said.

Houston Police Department spokesman Gabe Ortiz said investigators have returned all the bags to Continental after gathering what evidence they could. "We were trying to fingerprint, but not all surfaces will hold prints," he said.

Clark said Continental will distribute the bags to the airlines involved and will deliver them free of charge to Continental passengers as soon as they can be identified and located. Those who are missing luggage should file a complaint with their airline, she said.

9 airlines involvedInvestigators and Continental released few details about the investigation and did not disclose the airlines, flight origins and destinations involved.

An HPD news release said the luggage, found at 230 Bammel Westfield in north Harris County, came from "as many as nine different airlines."

The statement said police are working with customs officials and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, but an FBI spokesman said the agency is no longer on the case.

Although the Houston Airport System has security cameras throughout the airport, investigators declined to say whether they are checking the videotapes.

DOJ_NMG_0109514

Some of the bags reportedly came through Terminal D, which handles most international flights. There, arriving passengers pick up their baggage in a customs area closed to the public. It was not clear how thieves obtained access there, if they did.

FBI spokesman Orlando Muñoz said there is no evidence that the incident exposed any national security or terrorism vulnerabilities.

Federal officials and Parsons agreed that so few bags are stolen across the country that it is difficult to compare baggage security among airports and airlines.

In October, the last month for which U.S. Department of Transportation statistics are available, Continental reported 6.09 "mishandled" bags per 1,000 passengers, or one bag per 164 passengers.

But almost all of those complaints involve late-arriving baggage, often caused by missed connecting flights, Clark said.

"Of all the baggage that we carry, less than 1 percent doesn't arrive with the customer, and of that, 98 percent is returned to the customer within 24 hours," she said.

Baggage theft is rare, said Clark, who has worked with Continental for 15 years.

To make sure that your recovered baggage gets back to you, Clark advised, "have your name, address and phone on the inside as well as the outside, in case the (identification) tag is removed."

Parsons added that it's also a good idea to put your destination hotel address in the bag.

Clark said she doesn't know how long the Bush passengers will have to wait to retrieve their bags.

Corzine's Chemical Security Stance Draws Scrutiny A Year Into His New Job (NYT)

By David Kocieniewski

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

As a United States senator, Jon S. Corzine was relentless in warning that the nation's chemical plants, and the railways that carry their potentially dangerous cargo, are vulnerable to a devastating terror attack.

He traveled the country promoting legislation to force many manufacturers to use fewer toxic chemicals. In 2004, he even stood outside a chlorine plant in northern New Jersey, pointing out its flimsy security to a camera crew from "60 Minutes."

But in the 11 months since he was sworn in as New Jersey's governor, Mr. Corzine has taken a far more measured approach to the issue, disappointing some of the chemical security experts who helped him form his proposals in the Senate. These advocates say that the Corzine administration has made little tangible progress on increasing security at the 15 New Jersey chemical plants, and that each plant poses a threat to 100,000 people or more. They accuse the governor of being too intent on appeasing the chemical industry, which provides more than 80,000 jobs in the state.

"We have no indication that he's changed his mind on this issue, so it's a matter of him not being very effective," said Rick Hind, legislative director of the Greenpeace Toxics Campaign. "At this rate it will take, literally, 40 years to get the problem solved, and you just hope that that's not too late."

Governor Corzine and his staff say that they have quietly pressured companies and railroads to beef up plant security and switch to safer technology.

The administration says two dozen utility plants and three chemical plants have switched to technology that reduces or eliminates the use of the most dangerous chemicals.

These are results that Mr. Corzine calls encouraging, especially given the state's limited ability to regulate railways. He has also proposed more training programs and background checks for chemical employees, as well as terror preparation drills. And he said that he might double the number of companies subject to the strictest regulations, which now includes 45 plants.

"We've taken a whole series of steps," Mr. Corzine said in a recent interview, "from simplistic things like walls and perimeter security in the places of highest concentration of chemicals, to a greater understanding of what's in parked rail cars and greater cooperation in storing and moving of the rail cars. What we're doing is very close to what we wanted to do right from the beginning."

Mr. Corzine's approach to domestic security illustrates a basic reality of government: sweeping changes are sometimes easier to propose as a legislator in the minority party than to carry out as an executive in power.

As the nation scrambled to fend off possible terrorist attacks in the wake of the 9/11 attacks, Mr. Corzine quickly emerged as a leading advocate on chemical security. Coming from a state with so many chemical plants — the F.B.I. called one stretch in New Jersey "the most dangerous two miles in America" — Mr. Corzine argued that voluntary efforts by industry and stronger perimeter security at plants were not enough. He wanted government to push manufacturers to switch to "inherently safer technology" and to eliminate the use of toxic chemicals wherever feasible.

That aggressive stance won him praise in Washington, even though legislation championed by Mr. Corzine, a Democrat, stood little chance of becoming law at a time when Republicans controlled Congress and the White House. In his state, the chemical lobby posted billboards along the New Jersey Turnpike reminding residents of the jobs in the industry, conservative editorials called Mr. Corzine a radical environmentalist, and some business groups questioned his patriotism.

Hal Bozarth, executive director of the Chemical Industry Council of New Jersey, said that when Mr. Corzine was sworn in as governor last January, industry officials greeted him with a reminder that companies across the state had already spent more than $100 million on security — and with a promise of cooperation.

During much of Mr. Corzine's first year in office, that cooperation has centered on following up on an initiative started by his predecessor, Acting Gov. Richard J. Codey, who mandated that all chemical companies identify what safer processes might be available in their industry.

Elaine Makatura, a spokeswoman for the State Department of Environmental Protection, said inspectors have found that virtually every company has completed its safety plan. She said the state expected to issue its report on the issue early next year, several months after initially promised.

But those rules do not require the companies to adopt the safer processes if they deem them too expensive. And chemical safety advocates, like Rick Engler of the Work Environment Council, say it is often hard to know how much progress has been made because the state has been unwilling to release much information.

State environmental officials have acknowledged that many of the state's most dangerous plants continue to use and store stockpiles of toxic chemicals near major population centers. That would include the chlorine plant in Kearny, in Hudson County, only about 10 miles from Midtown Manhattan, which Mr. Corzine toured with the "60 Minutes" crew.

Richard Cañas, director of the New Jersey Office of Homeland Security and Preparedness, said the Corzine administration has had difficulty convincing businesses that switching to safer technology is worth the price, which can run into tens of millions of dollars at a single plant. "To the extent that replacing technology is going to break the bank, they're not willing to go that far," Mr. Cañas said. "It's always money that impedes what you'd like to do."

Dealing with the railroads has been an even trickier challenge for the administration because the railways are regulated by the federal government. Mr. Corzine said state regulators have had discussions with railroad executives, who have agreed to use more decoy cars, store fewer toxic chemicals on unguarded railway sidings and keep closer track of chemicals throughout the shipping process.

The state is also considering building a 10-foot fence along a 2.6-mile stretch of the turnpike to shield the railway siding from autos and potential terrorists on the roadway. But Mr. Cañas said that the $6 million fence might not be necessary if the railroads follow through on their pledge not to store the tanker cars full of potentially dangerous gases near the highway.

Though Governor Corzine is now entrenched in Trenton, he once again finds himself lobbying Congress for stricter regulations on the rail shipment of toxic chemicals. He has also urged the federal government not to override New Jersey's tougher chemical security measures if Congress enacts a new law on the issue.

But the governor said that he did not believe it was necessary to further strengthen state laws by mandating a switch to safer technology.

"I think people in the industry are worried that if we don't get results we may use the super hammer," he said, referring to such a mandate. "So we've gotten much better response because we've done this in a sensible, realistic manner."

Privileges Found Not To Apply In Sept. 11-Related Insurance Case (LAW)

By Beth Bar, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, December 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0109516

The insurance broker representing Century 21 Department Stores in its efforts to regain compensation for millions in damages it sustained to its lower Manhattan store following the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks has won a partial attempt to force the insurer overseeing the claim to produce documents it said were privileged.

Southern District of New York Judge Robert W. Sweet, in OneBeacon Insurance Co. v. Forman International, 04 Civ. 2271, held that OneBeacon Insurance Co. and its attorneys at Cozen O'Connor failed to prove that the attorney-client or work product privileges should be applied in connection with the documents in dispute.

Sweet also held that, because neither OneBeacon nor its counsel selectively withheld documents based on content, the fairness doctrine could not be applied to this case.

OneBeacon reached a settlement with Century 21 in March 2003 to pay the store $143 million to fully release claims. The insurer later asserted it overpaid the retailer by $52.4 million because Century 21's broker, Forman International, improperly agreed on the retailer's behalf to delete a standard business interruption provision in favor of the business interruption provision proposed by Century 21.

Katrina Evacuees On The Clock To Appeal (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, December 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Thousands of Hurricane Katrina evacuees whose federal housing funding was cut off this summer may be eligible for renewed payments, but face a tight deadline to seek them.

Under a court order, the Federal Emergency Management Agency sent letters to about 4,000 storm victims in Texas last week, explaining why they were deemed no longer eligible for aid. A federal judge ruled the original letters unconstitutional because they contained only hard-to-decipher computer codes and agency jargon.

With the new letters, storm victims can appeal the decision to FEMA and may be eligible for renewed housing payments of about $750 a month.

But the program is set to expire at the end of February and the appeal process can take up to three months. U.S. District Judge Richard Leon, who has called the agency's housing program a "legal disaster" said Wednesday that he wanted to speed up the appeals.

"This is not going to be a run-out-the-clock operation," Leon said. "I have no reason to believe FEMA wants that, but if this court gets the impression for one second that FEMA is trying to run the clock out, this court is not going to tolerate that."

First, the agency must locate the victims. After the housing aid was cut off, many families moved or were evicted. So far, only 32 letters were confirmed received and 174 were returned as undeliverable.

Leon gave FEMA until Thursday morning to come up with a way for local governments and social services groups to use the federal aid database to notify victims that they might be eligible for housing assistance.

"It's not enough to have FEMA doing this. We need others helping," Leon said.

Leon originally ordered FEMA to immediately restore the housing program and provide back pay to people who were denied it but a federal appeals court put that ruling on hold last week.

Michael Kirkpatrick, an attorney for the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now said families should appeal as quickly as possible because, if FEMA extends the housing assistance past the end of February, only those families already in the program will receive money.

FEMA has said it appropriately denied aid to ineligible families, such as those whose houses are livable or those who have other homes to live in.

WAR NEWS:

Bush And Security Advisers To Meet Today On Iraq Strategy (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Josh White

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0109517

CRAWFORD, Tex., Dec. 27 -- President Bush's top national security advisers arrived here to hone a new Iraq strategy that administration officials said seems increasingly likely to include a surge of additional troops to try to help stabilize the country.

Although officials have said no decisions will be made in the Crawford meeting, Bush seems to be laying the groundwork for one more sustained effort to defeat the Iraq insurgency and stabilize the country politically. Two defense officials said Wednesday that some sort of troop increase appears likely in an effort to contain the violence but that the specific size and nature of such a surge still has to be worked out.

White House spokesman Scott Stanzel took a swipe at Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), the incoming chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, for his comment Tuesday that ordering more troops to Iraq would do little to address the underlying political problems fostering violence.

"I would hope that Senator Biden would wait to hear what the president has to say before announcing what he's opposed to," Stanzel told reporters here.

The president arrived in Crawford this week for a working holiday that includes a meeting Thursday morning with his top national security advisers, including Vice President Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates. Rice and Gates conferred informally with Bush at his Texas ranch Wednesday afternoon, a White House official said.

Top military officials have said that they are open to sending more U.S. troops to Iraq if there is a specific strategic mission for them, though there are doubts whether a small increase, or one that is short in duration, can accomplish much. Another reason for a surge would be to accelerate the buildup of U.S. trainers helping Iraqi forces.

The Pentagon announced Wednesday that Gates has approved the deployment of an Army brigade to Kuwait to stand by as the U.S. Central Command's theater reserve force, which means that more than 3,000 U.S. troops will probably move to the region early next month. Although those forces could be used to effect a surge, they are replacing a smaller Marine unit that moved into Iraq this fall and is usually ready for use anywhere in the region.

Officials said Gates is bringing to Crawford suggestions for a comprehensive approach to the problem, emphasizing the need for economic and diplomatic components alongside any military action. One idea that has been picking up steam in recent weeks is a new jobs plan as officials push to open as many as 10 state-owned factories around Iraq by the end of January. Commanders believe putting young Iraqi men to work could make a serious dent in sectarian violence, and an official familiar with the program said Gates plans to brief the president on it.

The idea that Bush would increase troop levels in Iraq after elections in which Republicans lost control of both chambers of Congress, partly because of his Iraq policy, appears to be creating some restiveness among Democrats.

Rep. Chris Van Hollen (Md.), the new chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said that other than the removal of Donald H. Rumsfeld as defense secretary, there's "very little sign that the president got the message the voters were sending when it comes to Iraq," adding: "Any decision to escalate in Iraq would suggest that the president is either politically tone deaf or deliberately ignoring the will of the vast majority of the American people."

But Gary Schmitt of the conservative American Enterprise Institute, which has close ties to the administration, said he believes Bush is unhappy with the advice he has been getting, especially from the Iraq Study Group, which has proposed trying to remove combat troops by early 2008. "All he was getting was various options for getting out," Schmitt said.

"No president wants to be remembered as the guy who lost a war," he said. "Who knows whether this is a day late and a dollar short, but it is a striking example of presidential will trying to bend the system to what he wants."

The White House has said that Bush will formally unveil his plans for Iraq sometime after the first of the year.

Bush Staff Bristles At Troop Level Criticism (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 28, 2006

CRAWFORD, Texas — The White House responded sharply today to a senior Democratic senator's criticism of possible increases in the U.S. military deployment in Iraq, ahead of President Bush's meeting on Thursday with senior national security advisors at his ranch.

DOJ_NMG_0109518

The session was called to review one more time the options available to Bush as he nears the launching of a new strategy in Iraq, a course that is widely believed to include the possibility of sending additional troops there.

Deputy White House press secretary Scott Stanzel took issue with Sen. Joseph R. Biden, Jr. (D-Del.), the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, who said on Tuesday that any troop increase would be "the absolute wrong strategy."

Bush has not said whether he will announce an increase in the approximately 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq, when he presents his plans in a speech to the nation as early as next week.

But officials have said he is considering such a course, and leading U.S. military officials in Iraq have backed away from their earlier skepticism that sending more troops would stem the sectarian and insurgent violence that continues to take a heavy toll on Iraqi citizens and the U.S. military.

"I hope that Sen. Biden would wait to hear what the president has to say before announcing what he's opposed to," Stanzel said.

Bush plans to meet with most of the members of the National Security Council this morning. Stanzel said that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates were headed here today. They would be joined on Thursday at Bush's ranch by Vice President Dick Cheney, Marine Corps Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Stephen Hadley, the president's national security advisor, and J.D. Crouch, the deputy national security advisor.

The spokesman said they would be considering "all the potential options, making sure that due consideration is given to the next steps, making sure that we're thinking through the new way forward in Iraq, to take into account all of the differing views."

He reiterated earlier White House declarations that the meeting would not produce specific decisions on Iraq war policy.

The White House has said Bush was likely to deliver a speech on his new plans in early January, a timetable that remains in effect, Stanzel said.

But the timing of the president's announcement, the spokesman said, "largely depends on how comfortable he is with the information he's receiving, making sure that we've thought through all the parameters of any options."

On a related matter, Stanzel played down the potential impact that the execution of Saddam Hussein could have on security in Iraq. An appeals court there said Tuesday his death sentence must be carried out within 30 days.

"That is a matter for the Iraqi people and we are observers to that process," the spokesman said on the execution's timing. Asked whether the execution would have an impact on the preparation of a new policy, if it leads to increased violence, he said:

"The enemy has always used just about any excuse they could find to foment violence, and that is not new."

Latest Blue-Ribbon Panel Awaits Its Own Fate (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

For every impossible problem that official Washington faces, there is a blue-ribbon panel, and for every panel there is a predictable life cycle, which the Iraq Study Group has so far followed to a fault.

First, the unrealistic expectations, fueled by feverish news coverage, including speculation and leaks about just what might be proposed. Next, the report's grand unveiling, complete with White House photo op, this time featuring President Bush with the co-chairmen, James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton.

And then, inevitably, the letdown.

Remember, for example, the Social Security commission of 2001? Neither do most Americans. The question now is whether a similar demise awaits the report of the Iraq Study Group — impeccably researched, comprehensive, bipartisan and having no legal authority beyond that of friendly advice.

One of its main proposals, the idea of talking to Iran and Syria, was swiftly brushed off by Mr. Bush. Now the administration seems to be leaning toward a temporary increase in American troops, an option the group said it "could support" if requested by commanders but did not endorse.

But whether this group, too, ends up as a footnote to history, or becomes the framework for a new war policy, is unlikely to be settled until well into the new year.

"I don't think it's dead at all," said Warren B. Rudman, the former Republican senator from New Hampshire and a veteran of such panels himself. "Whether its recommendations will ultimately be followed is another question. But with the Democrats in charge of Congress, its findings will certainly get a hearing."

National commissions have been a staple of Washington tradecraft since at least 1908, when the National Monetary Commission began setting out proposals that led to the Federal Reserve System. Others, too, have had substantive results. The National Screw Thread Commission of 1925 helped solve a problem that now seems obscure but once was quite critical — the mismatch of nonstandard hardware, including hoses with fire hydrants and nuts with bolts.

In more recent years, commissions have investigated presidential assassinations, space shuttle disasters and intelligence failures. Robert A. Dallek, the presidential historian, has studied how President Lyndon B. Johnson ignored the recommendations of his own commission on the urban riots of the 1960s. In the current debate over Iraq, Mr. Dallek sees that history repeating itself.

"The impression I have is the Iraq Study Group's report is slowly being eclipsed, fading to the margins, because there's no indication that President Bush will accept its recommendations," he said.

Unlike many such panels, the Iraq Study Group was appointed not by the president but by Congress; the White House only later lent its support, offering additional government financing for the group's visit to Iraq in August.

Mr. Baker's status as a top adviser to Mr. Bush's father has led to speculation that the current president may not want to appear too eager to accept the group's recommendations, particularly on Iran and Syria, which have been roundly criticized on the Republican right.

On Tuesday, Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. , the Delaware Democrat who will become chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee next month, repeatedly cited the Iraq Study Group as a touchstone for Iraq hearings he plans beginning Jan. 9. But the study group rejected Mr. Biden's central idea for the Iraqi future, a division of the country into separately administered Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish regions. Still, it is too early to write an obituary for the panel.

Mr. Bush, who will preside over a National Security Council meeting on Iraq at his Texas ranch on Thursday, has promised to announce a new war strategy next month. Even if he rejects the most prominent of the group's 79 proposals, they may remain relevant options for the future.

Mr. Rudman keenly understands that possibility. He served as co-chairman with former Senator Gary Hart of Colorado of a commission on national security whose 1999 report predicted terrorist attacks, saying "Americans will die on American soil, possibly in large numbers." Its recommendations were duly ignored — until the 2001 attacks, when many were put into effect.

Daniel P. Serwer, the former diplomat who served as the Iraq Study Group's executive director, argues that whatever Mr. Bush decides, the panel has already had a profound effect on the policy debate, particularly by declaring its candid judgment that the situation in Iraq is "grave and deteriorating."

"The government went from saying, 'We've got this under control,' to ordering new assessments left, right and center," said Mr. Serwer, vice president for peace and stability operations at the United States Institute of Peace.

He said the administration was likely to accept dozens of the 79 recommendations, including "milestones" it sets for the Iraqi government over the next year.

"I'm quite convinced that when you get the administration's new assessments, along with Congress's hearings and evaluations, what you come up with may be very much like the Iraq Study Group's recommendations," Mr. Serwer said.

The national 9/11 commission had perhaps the greatest impact of any such inquiry in recent years, producing a best-selling book and recommendations that have reshaped the government. Emulating the 9/11 report, the Iraq Study Group issued a commercial paperback of its report that has topped nonfiction best-seller lists this month.

Between the book, with 250,000 copies in print, and more than 1.5 million downloads of the report from the group's main Web site and many thousands elsewhere, staff members estimate that at least three million Americans have seen the report. But there are no plans to campaign for the proposals as the 9/11 commission did, said Ian Larsen, a spokesman for the study group.

"No sales job, no road show," Mr. Larsen said.

DOJ_NMG_0109520

Still, the group's work has been far more public than that of the so-called Wise Men who advised President Johnson at a similar crisis in the conduct of the Vietnam War. A dozen distinguished elder statesmen and military commanders who were gathered by Clark M. Clifford in March 1968, just after he was named secretary of defense, they gave their advice largely in private.

In a parallel move, Mr. Bush has also switched defense secretaries at a critical moment in a war that many Americans believe has gone wrong. His choice was a member of the Iraq Study Group, Robert M. Gates, who, Mr. Serwer recalled, "did a whole lot of reading" on Iraq in the months he served on the panel.

To Win In Iraq (WT)

By Fred Gedrich And Paul E. Vallely

The Washington Times, December 28, 2006

Most Americans desire an effective change in current Iraq war strategy and the wider global war against Islamic extremists and nations supporting them. President Bush and the new U.S. defense secretary, Robert Gates, could deliver it by placing experienced unconventional warfare leaders in charge of the war effort.

Since forcibly removing Saddam Hussein from power in 2003, the U.S.-led coalition has been unable to quell insurgent-, terrorist- and sectarian-generated violence concentrated mostly in four of 18 provinces and Greater Baghdad which are dominated by majority-Sunni populations. About 150,000 Iraqis and nearly 3,000 Americans have died during continuing hostilities.

While many Americans recognize that the conflict in Iraq is not going well and changes need to be made, there is substantial disagreement at the national level on a military strategy. The United States is seriously considering adding several combat brigades from outside Iraq to "purge" Baghdad and several provinces infested with local and foreign troublemakers. Sending an additional 20,000 U.S. troops to Iraq under current military strategies and rules of engagement will be unlikely to make much difference.

Unlike U.S.-led coalition troops, the adversaries in this war do not carry arms openly, wear uniforms or insignias and abide by other laws and customs of wars specified in Geneva Conventions and protocols. They instill fear in military opponents and local populations through use of suicide bombings, improvised explosive devices, kidnappings and beheadings. And they disguise themselves as civilians and hide among civilian populations with weapons stored and discharged from mosques, schools, hospitals, marketplaces, private residences and public roads.

To prevail, the United States has to transition from a conventional to an unconventional war footing and make the enemy pay a heavy price for its despicable tactics. In Iraq and elsewhere, traditional troops, weapons and tactics are less useful than tools of influence, covert operations and intelligence brought to the battlefield by special operators working harmoniously with indigenous forces and local populations. The prime objective is to create a climate of fear within enemy ranks that breaks its will to continue the armed insurrection against the freely elected Iraqi government.

Special Operations Forces (Rangers, Seals, Delta Force and other special units) leaders and troops are uniquely qualified for this mission. Special operators played prominent and successful roles in removing Afghanistan's Taliban regime from power and disrupting al Qaeda's terror base. In Iraq, they have spent most of their time searching for the infamous "deck of cards," the elusive WMD arsenal, and high-value insurgents and terrorists.

Joint special operators (from all military branches) are also trained in local cultures and languages, making it easier for them to embed in local populations and Iraqi security forces and collect information which in turn may be used to "hunt and kill" hostile forces. In addition, they can win "hearts and minds" of local populations through civil affairs work and performance of psychological operations against enemies of the freely elected Iraqi Government.

In January 2003, former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld designated the U.S. Special Operations Command (USSOCOM) as the lead military organization to prosecute the global war on terror but unfortunately that has not materialized. Although stellar Army commanding Gens. John Abizaid (retiring early next year) and George Casey continue to lead Middle East war operations and troops in Iraq respectively, they are products of the traditional warfare school. Moreover, nearly all of the 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq are, too.

It's time to alter U.S. strategy by putting USSOCOM generals and admirals truly in command of the global war. And in Iraq, conventional forces could best serve by providing ground, air and sea support to USSOCOM and Iraqi security forces and sealing Iraq's porous borders with hostile and/or dubious neighbors in Iran, Syria, Jordan and Saudi Arabia to prevent foreign jihadists, arms and sophisticated munitions from entering the country.

The action will surely meet resistance throughout DoD's conventional warfare ranks, their industry partners and congressional allies. The U.S. active-duty military force consists of 1.4 million troops, of which only about 50,000 are elite special operators, with only several thousand deployed to Iraq. Many military professionals prefer to have special operators continue in a supporting, not leading, role.

Immediately after recently assuming his new post, Mr. Gates correctly stated that the United States must win in Iraq or face a "calamity" that would "endanger Americans for decades to come." Since the fall of Baghdad, the United States has had the will to win but not the right strategy. It's imperative that the United States transition quickly to an unconventional war strategy with USSOCOM generals and/or admirals in charge, or the war will be lost.

Army Brigade Headed To Kuwait (WP)

By Josh White And Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

A brigade of U.S. Army troops is scheduled to deploy to Kuwait early next month to take over as the U.S. Central Command's theater reserve force, which means more than 3,000 additional U.S. troops will move into the region and could be used to support combat in Iraq, Pentagon officials announced yesterday.

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates approved sending the 2nd Brigade, 82nd Airborne Division overseas after Gen. John P. Abizaid, who leads Central Command, requested the forces to replace the 15th Marine Expeditionary Unit, which was sent into the western province of Anbar this fall. Abizaid requested a brigade -- which is significantly larger than the Marine unit -- to allow for greater flexibility in the region.

While defense officials have said the move is not part of an orchestrated "surge" of forces into Iraq, should such a surge become part of U.S. strategy for the war, the Army brigade could be used as the leading edge of a troop increase.

Also yesterday, the U.S. military announced the deaths of three more U.S. service members.

A Marine assigned to Regimental Combat Team 5 died yesterday during fighting in Anbar. A soldier died in a vehicle rollover during a combat reconnaissance mission south of the capital Tuesday. And a soldier with the 13th Sustainment Command died as a result of noncombat injuries on a U.S. military base about 50 miles north of Baghdad on Saturday.

Meanwhile, two Iranians remained in custody after being detained during a raid by U.S.-led forces on Dec. 21. Ten people were captured in that raid, which occurred in Baghdad, according to Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, the top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq.

Caldwell said troops found documents, maps, photographs and videos indicating that some of the detainees were involved in illegal activities. He did not specify what those activities were. Three other Iranians were detained on Dec. 20 but were released to the Iraqi government. The incident had sparked a flurry of diplomatic activity by Iraqi officials to secure the Iranians' release.

Close Adviser To Sadr Dies In U.S.-Iraqi Raid (WP)

By Nancy Trejos And Sudarsan Raghavan, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 27 -- A top deputy of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr was killed Wednesday during a raid by U.S. and Iraqi troops in the southern holy city of Najaf, sparking protests from Sadr's followers and complicating an already tense relationship with the powerful anti-American leader.

DOJ_NMG_0109522

Hurling rocks and shouting expletives, thousands of angry Sadr loyalists marched through the streets of Najaf after Sahib al-Amiri was shot and killed by a U.S. soldier during an early morning raid. "Agents and stooges!" protesters shouted at Iraqi soldiers and local authorities.

U.S. military officials declined to confirm that Amiri was a Sadr aide, saying only that he had provided explosives for use against Iraqi and American forces. Sadr officials said Amiri was an aide and a lawyer who ran an educational organization that helped orphans and impoverished children. They said he had no connections to illegal activity.

In a statement, the U.S. military said Iraqi and American forces were trying to detain Amiri and shot him only when he pointed an assault rifle at an Iraqi soldier.

The incident comes at a delicate time for the Iraqi political process. Sadr, who runs one of the country's most feared militias, is also a potent political force; his allies control 30 seats in parliament and four key ministries. Last month, influential politicians linked with Sadr suspended their participation in the government to protest a meeting between Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and President Bush in Jordan. Unable to pass legislation without Sadr's support, and fearing Iraq's government could collapse, other Shiite leaders have been appealing for an end to the boycott.

Bahaa al-Araji, a senior legislator with Sadr's Shiite Muslim party, said discussions about a return to government had been scheduled for Wednesday but were delayed by Amiri's death. "Because of this problem, we'll leave everything for a few days," he said.

The raid also complicates matters for Maliki, a Shiite who is politically beholden to Sadr and has been criticized by U.S. officials for not doing enough to rein in Sadr's Mahdi Army militia. Two Maliki advisers said that in recent weeks the prime minister has been trying to persuade Sadr to rejoin the political process and disarm his militia, which launched two major uprisings against U.S. forces in Najaf in 2004. The killing of Amiri, they worried, could hinder those efforts.

"We need calm. We don't need more troubles," said Sami al-Askari, a member of parliament and a close Maliki adviser.

On Wednesday, Maliki asked senior U.S. commanders to explain the motive for Wednesday's raid, advisers to the prime minister said. One adviser, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Maliki has set up a committee to investigate the incident, underscoring his concern that the raid could trigger further violence and dissuade Sadr from political engagement.

Within Maliki's circle, some advisers questioned whether Amiri was deliberately killed, said a senior Maliki adviser who spoke on condition of anonymity.

A raid involving American forces in Najaf is particularly embarrassing for Maliki. Last week, in an elaborate ceremony, the U.S.-led coalition handed over control of Najaf to Iraqi forces.

"The agreement between the two sides when the security profile was transferred to the Iraqi side is that the Iraqi side should know about any operations or actions done by the multinational forces," said Sadiq al-Rikabi, a political adviser to Maliki.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, the top U.S military spokesman in Iraq, told reporters in Baghdad that the raid was led by 35 soldiers from the 8th Iraqi Army Division Forces, with eight U.S. troops serving as advisers.

"It was an Iraqi-led, planned operation consistent with the fact that Najaf now has been passed to provincial Iraqi control and that the U.S. forces don't operate there independently," he said.

Caldwell, who declined to confirm Amiri's link to Sadr, said U.S.-led coalition forces had been gathering intelligence on him for a long time. He said Amiri was implicated in a roadside bomb attack on a police chief in Najaf this year.

"The purpose for going after him is because of the illegal activities that he was conducting, not because he was associated with any particular organization," Caldwell said.

Amiri's friends and associates called him an honorable man. "He never participated in any kind of violence in all his life for as long as I've known him," said Nasar al-Rubaie, head of Sadr's parliamentary bloc.

More than 6,000 mourners followed Amiri's coffin as it was carried to a cemetery in Najaf, about 90 miles south of Baghdad.

Sadr asked his followers to "calm down, observe self-restraint and not do anything that could inflict harm or damage on the country and the people, especially since maintaining calm and security is the responsibility of all sides."

U.S. officials and Sadr loyalists gave conflicting versions of the events that led to Amiri's death.

DOJ_NMG_0109523

Amiri's 19-year-old son, Karrar Sahib al-Amiri, said Iraqi and U.S. troops knocked on the family's door at 6 a.m. When he answered it, he asked the soldiers what they wanted, he recalled. They pushed him aside and stormed into the house, he said. His mother shouted at them while his father ran to the roof. Amiri said his father tried jumping to the roof of the next house but could not.

The soldiers followed him upstairs, the son said. He said his mother asked an Iraqi soldier why they were there. "We want to question him," Amiri recalled the soldier saying.

A few minutes later, the son heard four gunshots. He found his father on the roof with a bullet in his head and three bullets in his chest, he said.

The U.S. military said the elder Amiri ran upstairs when the troops arrived to detain him, ignoring repeated warnings to stop. An Iraqi soldier and an American adviser followed him to the roof, where Amiri confronted one of them with a rifle, the military said in a statement.

Sectarian Ties Weaken Duty's Call For Iraq Forces (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 27 — The car parked outside was almost certainly a tool of the Sunni insurgency. It was pocked with bullet holes and bore fake license plates. The trunk had cases of unused sniper bullets and a notice to a Shiite family telling them to abandon their home.

"Otherwise, your rotten heads will be cut off," the note read.

The soldiers who came upon the car in a Sunni neighborhood in Baghdad were part of a joint American and Iraqi patrol, and the Americans were ready to take action. The Iraqi commander, however, taking orders by cellphone from the office of a top Sunni politician, said to back off: the car's owner was known and protected at a high level.

For Maj. William Voorhies, the American commander of the military training unit at the scene, the moment encapsulated his increasingly frustrating task — trying to build up Iraqi security forces who themselves are being used as proxies in a spreading sectarian war. This time, it was a Sunni politician — Vice Prime Minister Salam al-Zubaie — but the more powerful Shiites interfered even more often.

"I have come to the conclusion that this is no longer America's war in Iraq, but the Iraqi civil war where America is fighting," Major Voorhies said.

A two-day reporting trip accompanying Major Voorhies's unit and combat troops seemed to back his statement, as did other commanding officers expressing similar frustration.

"I have personally witnessed about a half-dozen of these incidents of what I would call political pressure, where a minister or someone from a minister's office contacts one of these Iraqi commanders," said Lt. Col. Steven Miska, the deputy commander for the Dagger Brigade Combat Team, First Infantry Division, who oversees combat operations in a wide swath of western Baghdad.

"These politicians are connected with either the militias or Sunni insurgents."

Whatever plan the Bush administration unveils — a large force increase, a withdrawal or something in between — this country's security is going to be left in the hands of Iraqi forces. Those forces, already struggling with corruption and infiltration, have shown little willingness to stand up to political pressure, especially when the Americans are not there to support them. That suggests, the commanders say, that if the Americans leave soon, violence will redouble. And that makes their mission, Major Voorhies and Colonel Miska say, more important than ever.

They added that while political pressure on the Iraqi Army is great, the influence exerted on the police force, which is much more heavily infiltrated by Shiite militia groups, is even greater.

Shiites, led by militia forces and often aided by the local police, are clearly ascendant, Colonel Miska said.

"It seems very controlled and deliberate and concentrated on expanding the area they control," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0109524

The Sunni forces are being bolstered by support from insurgent strongholds in the West. The Shiite militias are using neighborhoods in the north, specifically Shuala and Sadr City, as bases of operation. There is also increasing evidence that militia members from southern cities like Basra are coming to Baghdad to join the fight.

"I believe everyone, to some extent, is influenced by the militias," Colonel Miska said. "While some Iraqi security forces may be complicit with the militias, others fear for their families when confronting the militia, and that is the more pervasive threat."

Looking at a map he had his intelligence officers create, which highlights current battle zones and details the changing religious makeup of neighborhoods, Colonel Miska noted just how many different forces, each answering to different bosses, currently occupied the battlefield.

"Who would design this mess?" he said. "It is like an orchestra where everyone is playing a different song."

His main focus, he said, is trying to establish some kind of unity of command.

As it stands, the police and military answer to different ministries, and within the police force the bureaucracy is divided even further between the regular police and the national police. On top of that are about 145,000 armed men who work as protection detail for the Facilities Protection Services, with minimal oversight, according to United States military officials.

There are also thousands of Shiite militia members and Sunni insurgents posing as security forces.

Colonel Miska tried to define where American forces fit in the tangle of competing interests, which is only further complicated by the complicity and direct participation of top government officials.

"When they are conducting armed aggression against the population, that is where we try and step in and stop it," he said, adding that when the groups fight one another, "We sit back and watch because that can only benefit us."

Some days, the line between militia and insurgent clashes and attacks on the population is a blurry one.

Nowhere can the current battle be seen more starkly than on the border between the Shiite district of Shuala and the Sunni controlled Ghazaliya.

Major Voorhies briefed his men before dawn last Thursday morning about the day's mission, code-named Operation Thunderball. They were to join with Lt. Col. Sabah Kadam Fadily and his command unit and direct a joint search of houses in Ghazaliya. There were 300 American troops and 200 Iraqis involved in the operation.

The sun was just rising as the team set out, and daylight revealed an apocalyptic landscape, trash everywhere, open sewers emitting a revolting smell and scores of buildings damaged in recent clashes. A mosque on the side of the road had a massive hole blown in its once ornate blue dome.

Major Voorhies got a call on his radio. The Iraqi soldiers had spotted a body.

It was a man, dead, tossed on the side of the road, piled with the garbage. His hands were bound behind his back and his shoes were off. His head was turned to the right, revealing a single bullet hole covered in blood that still appeared wet.

As the Iraqi soldiers called the police, who pick up dozens of similarly abused bodies around the city daily, an American soldier spotted a pair of legs. Major Voorhies walked over and, with a stick, flipped a piece of plastic foam off the body.

It was another man, his neck slit, his head almost completely severed. He was lying on his back, eyes open looking vacantly to nowhere, arms bound behind him and torn from their sockets.

Major Voorhies asked Colonel Sabah if he could tell if the man was Shiite or Sunni, but the answer was obvious to the colonel.

"He is Shiite," Colonel Sabah said absently.

"How do you know?" asked the American major.

"Because this is the Sunni sector," Colonel Sabah said.

There would be little investigation and no chance that anyone would ever be arrested for the murders, Major Voorhies said. In fact, he said, Colonel Sabah's assessment might not even be right since the Sunnis and the Mahdi militia, called JAM for Jaish al-Mahdi by American troops, had been fighting for control of this forlorn ground.

"This is either a warning from the Sunni here" to the Shiites to get out, he said. "Or a message sent by JAM that we are winning."

For the American soldiers, it was just another morning in Baghdad, where Americans are trying to protect people on both sides while being attacked by people on both sides, trying not to take a side themselves.

DOJ_NMG_0109525

Major Voorhies thought about what he had just seen and the cycle of killing it would inspire.

"I don't know what the answer is," he said, almost to himself.

But he said he would push forward with his mission regardless.

Last week, a search of a house led to the discovery of 23 men being held captive, likely to be killed. He could take pride in helping save their lives, even if some of them might be shooting at him tomorrow.

Colonel Sabah, in glaring contrast to his efficient and focused American partners, did not seem to display a sense of urgency. He paid a visit to a house that belonged to a former Army colleague, a general, who had to flee the area. There he drank tea.

Then he went to see another past colleague, an admiral, and drank more tea. The two discussed what fun they had getting drunk and going to brothels.

Major Voorhies struggled to keep his patience.

"Sometimes I feel like I work for the Iraqi government," he said.

Outside, neighbors gathered, telling strikingly similar accounts of having their lives threatened by Shiite militiamen, who forced them from their homes. They were angry about the searches.

"Anyone leaving Ghazaliya will get killed because they know you are Sunni," said Fadhel A. Zaidan, who had lived in nearby Huriya for 50 years. "Now the Americans are taking our weapons, and when they leave, the Mahdi militia will attack."

American commanders say they are aware of this danger. In part, that is why residents are allowed one AK-47 and two cartridges.

Among Sunnis, there is absolutely no faith in the ability, or desire, of the Iraqi Army or police to provide protection. Colonel Sabah, who is Shiite but who had to leave his own home because of threats by the militia, is viewed as a collaborator.

Major Voorhies acknowledged that it was easier to persuade Colonel Sabah to search Sunni neighborhoods. Still, he said the colonel was one of Iraq's better army officers.

"When we have his back, he will fight anyone," said Major Voorhies. "When we don't, he will cut deals."

American soldiers seemed to appreciate the difficult position of officers like Colonel Sabah. His brother was murdered on Sept. 12, and just working in the Iraqi Army puts his life in danger.

Facing such stark challenges already, it makes the actions of Iraqi political leaders who try to manipulate the security forces that much more galling, Major Voorhies said.

"Colonel Sabah gets in a very political predicament sometimes," Major Voorhies said. "He will detain someone and then gets a call and is told not to take them away, so he has no choice."

Letter By Hussein, Written After Conviction, Urges Iraqis To Renounce Hatred (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 27 — Saddam Hussein, who is expected to make the short walk up the gallows stairs to his death here sometime in the next 30 days, said he was prepared to die and sure of his place in heaven as a martyr, and he called on Iraqis to unite, according to a letter that his lawyers said Wednesday had been composed by the former dictator.

Fears that the announcement upholding his death penalty on Tuesday would set off violence appeared not to be immediately borne out. But officials were still concerned about possible public reaction to the execution itself, and some speculated that the hanging would take place in secret and be announced only after the fact. American and Iraqi officials said nothing definitive about the execution's details on Wednesday.

Mr. Hussein is being held at Camp Cropper, an American base near the Baghdad Airport. Although the site of the hanging has yet to be announced, the main execution center in Baghdad is near his cell. In a drab concrete building, a set of steel stairs leads to a platform, about 15 feet above the ground. There, nooses fashioned from hemp ropes are slipped around the necks of the condemned before a steel trapdoor swings down.

In his latest letter, Mr. Hussein displayed none of the bombast that had defined his court appearances. He was convicted Nov. 5 of crimes against humanity for his part in the execution of 148 men and boys in the northern town of Dujail, and he wrote his farewell letter at the time of his conviction, his lawyers said.

"I say goodbye to you, but I will be with the merciful God who helps those who take refuge in him and who will never disappoint any honest believer," the letter said. "I call on you not to hate, because hate does not leave space for a person to be fair and it makes you blind and closes all doors of thinking." The letter, which was posted on a Baath Party Web site and received extensive coverage on Arabic TV news stations, seemed to cause little public stir here.

American forces continued Wednesday to focus on the Mahdi Army militia, loyal to the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr. In Najaf, which is the second holiest city for Shiite Muslims, American and Iraqi forces raided the home of a Sadr loyalist, Sahib al-Amiri, and shot him dead.

Mr. Amiri led a well-known social organization in Najaf called the Shahid Allah Foundation and was personally close to Mr. Sadr, Iraqi officials in Najaf said. While thousands of angry supporters marched in Mr. Amiri's funeral procession, Mr. Sadr urged his followers in the city to remain calm. At the same time, he released a statement that praised attacks on American forces.

"We heard that Bush, the enemy of God, is crying over the killing of American soldiers in Iraq," the statement said. "We ask God to extend his crying. We tell him that the killing of any Iraqi by the hands of his Army is a source of pride for us."

Americans handed control of security in Najaf Province to the Iraqis in an elaborate ceremony last week, but local leaders questioned the significance of the transfer if Americans could still direct raids there.

"When Iraqis were feeling happy about the approval of the execution of the dictator Saddam Hussein, they were surprised today with the raid on the house of Sahab al-Amiri and killing him in front of the eyes of his family and his children," said Abdul Hussein al-Musawi, the head of Najaf's governorate council. "This horrible act shows how reckless the raiding forces are."

American military officials said Mr. Amiri was responsible for planning and directing attacks using improvised explosive devices. They said that the raid was conducted with the Iraqi Eighth Army Division and that Mr. Amiri tried to flee when soldiers entered the house. He ran to the roof, was pursued and then aimed an assault rifle at an Iraqi officer. At that point, a soldier shot him dead, the military said in a statement.

There was also increased pressure on Sadr loyalists in Baghdad on Wednesday. Throughout the day, American and Iraqi troops engaged in actions against militia members around the Sadr City district in the capital, according to witnesses and Iraqi officials. Clashes between Iraqi security forces and militiamen were reported in a half dozen other Baghdad neighborhoods. Government forces killed at least 32 people and arrested 39 more, Iraqi officials said.

Separately, around 2:30 p.m., a car bomb exploded near a restaurant downtown and killed at least 10 civilians, an Iraqi official said. One hour later, another car bomb exploded near a bridge, killing four more people, the official said. The bodies of 50 people, many apparently tortured, were found around the city.

In Anbar Province, where American forces are battling Sunni Arab insurgents, a marine was killed in fighting, according to the military.

In Washington on Wednesday, a District Court judge refused to intervene in the death-penalty case for Mr. Hussein, turning down a request by American defense lawyers to temporarily block the execution. Lawyers for Awad al-Bandar, a former Iraqi judge sentenced to death along with Mr. Hussein, had filed a writ of habeas corpus on his behalf in United States District Court seeking to halt the execution on the grounds that he did not receive a fair trial.

The lawyers, including Ramsey Clark, the former United States attorney general who served on the defense team in the Baghdad trial, maintained that the federal court had jurisdiction because Mr. Bandar was effectively being held in American military custody in Iraq.

The judge, Reggie B. Walton, rejected the claim, saying he did not have jurisdiction. But he did allow the defense lawyers to appeal the issue in hopes of persuading the American courts to intervene.

Noting that the Iraqis had set up the tribunals by which Mr. Hussein and Mr. Bandar were tried, Judge Walton asked, "Why should I step in and interfere with the operations of a sovereign nation?"

Mr. Clark said in an interview that he had filed the petition at the request of Mr. Bandar's son after Mr. Hussein refused to allow him to do so. In a conversation in Iraq at the time of Mr. Hussein's sentencing last month, Mr. Clark said he tried to persuade the deposed leader to appeal to the American courts to block the execution. “He said it would be interpreted as his seeking mercy from the United States,” Mr. Clark said, “and he would never permit it.”

Hussein Bids Farewell To Iraqis In Note On Web (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 27 -- A farewell letter posted on the Internet Wednesday in the name of Saddam Hussein declared the former president to be victimized by foreign armies but ready to die and "be with the merciful God." The letter urged Iraqis not to hate the foreign peoples whose armies invaded the country, just their leaders.

Released a day after Iraq's highest court upheld his death sentence and opened the way for his execution within 30 days, the letter said: "I call you now and invite you not to hate, because hatred does not leave space for a person to be fair and it will blind your vision and close all doors of thinking."

Published on several Iraqi Web sites, the letter was written in ancient Arabic verse. Though Hussein took power a generation ago as a secular leader, in later years he mirrored the rise of religious fundamentalism in the Middle East, depicting himself as devoted to Islam. Much of the letter reflects that tone.

In interviews on Wednesday, two of Hussein's defense lawyers based in Amman, Jordan, said the letter was authentic and written by Hussein on Nov. 5. That was the day he was sentenced to death by hanging for the killings of 148 Shiite residents of the town of Dujail following an attempt on his life there in 1982.

"Yes, it is true," said Khalil al-Dulaimi, one of his lawyers.

The second lawyer, Saleh al-Armouti, said the letter was Hussein's way of expressing contempt for his sentence and for the Bush administration. "He's not an enemy of the American forces. He's an enemy of Bush," said Armouti. "There are a lot free people in the United States who are against the American occupation, and who should be respected for their opinions."

There was no independent way to verify that the letter was written by Hussein.

In the letter, Hussein said he was expressing his sentiments because the Iraqi High Tribunal and its chief judge "did not give us a chance to say what we want to say." The court, the letter continued, "issued its verdict without any explanation and read us the sentence -- according to orders of the invaders -- without presenting the evidence."

Turning to the future, the letter says: "Here, I offer my soul to God as a sacrifice, and if God wants he will lift it up to where the first believers and martyrs are and if his decision is postponed, then He is the most merciful. . . . So be patient and depend on Him against the unjust nations."

Addressing the "generous, loyal people," the letter bids them farewell. "I say goodbye to you, but I will be with the merciful God who helps those who take refuge in him and God won't disappoint any honest believer."

Portions of the letter praised Americans who assisted Hussein in his trial, an apparent reference to former U.S. attorney general Ramsey Clark, who joined Hussein's defense team.

"You should know that among the aggressors, there are people who support your struggle against the invaders, and some of them volunteered for the legal defense of detainees, and one of them is Saddam Hussein," the letter said. "Others exposed the scandals of the invaders or condemned them.

"Some of these people cried profusely and honestly when they said goodbye to me," the letter added.

Armouti, acknowledging that Hussein was referring to Clark, said that his team had met many American judges and lawyers who supported its view that the trial was unfair and improperly conducted. "We met Americans who are condemning this American intrusion in Iraq," he said.

Iraqi government officials have said that the nine-month trial was conducted properly. They disputed allegations that the court was politicized and dispensed victor's justice.

The letter was posted on the same day that loyalists warned, through a posting on a Web site of Hussein's former Baath Party, that they "are determined to retaliate, with all means and everywhere, to harm America and its interests if it commits this crime," referring to his execution.

DOJ_NMG_0109528

According to Iraq's constitution, President Jalal Talabani and two vice presidents must ratify the court's decision if Hussein is to go to the gallows. On Tuesday, a spokesman for Talabani said his approval may not be legally necessary. An Iraqi High Tribunal provision that requires the implementation of the death sentence could outweigh the constitution, said the spokesman, Hiwa Osman.

"Some people believe there is no need for his approval," Osman told the Associated Press. "We still have to hear from the court as to how the procedure can be carried out."

On Wednesday, a New York-based human rights group accused the Iraqi High Tribunal of bowing to political pressures and issuing "its final judgment at worrying speed."

"The Appeals Chamber's ruling was issued far too rapidly for a case involving complex international crimes," said Miranda Sissons, head of the Iraq program of the International Center for Transitional Justice, which works on issues of accountability for atrocities.

"The Chamber should have conducted a serious revision of the evidentiary and fairness issues in the Dujail trial to ensure that justice was done," Sissons said. "That clearly hasn't happened."

Saddam Counsels Against Hating U.S. (WT/AP)

By Christopher Torchia

The Washington Times, December 28, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Saddam Hussein called on Iraqis not to hate the U.S.-led forces that invaded Iraq in 2003 in a farewell letter posted on a Web site yesterday, a day after an appeals court upheld the former dictator's death sentence and ordered him to be hanged within one month.

One of Saddam's attorneys, Issam Ghazzawi, confirmed in Jordan that the letter was authentic, saying it was written by Saddam on Nov. 5 -- the day he was convicted by an Iraqi tribunal for ordering the killings of 148 Shi'ite Muslims in the city of Dujail in 1982.

"I call on you not to hate because hate does not leave space for a person to be fair and it makes you blind and closes all doors of thinking," the letter said.

Mr. Ghazzawi said the letter was released Tuesday and published yesterday on the Web site of Saddam's former Ba'ath Party.

The deposed leader said he was writing the letter because his attorneys had told him the Iraqi High Tribunal that tried his case would give him an opportunity to say a final word.

"But that court and its chief judge did not give us the chance to say a word, and issued its verdict without explanation and read out the sentence -- dictated by the invaders -- without presenting the evidence," Saddam wrote.

"Dear faithful people," he added, "I say goodbye to you, but I will be with the merciful God who helps those who take refuge in him and who will never disappoint any honest believer."

The letter was released as Saddam's last legal means of avoiding execution came under question. A spokesman for President Jalal Talabani said the appeals court order upholding the death sentence might not require Mr. Talabani's approval to carry out the execution.

Meanwhile, some Saddam loyalists threatened to retaliate if he is executed, warning in a posting on the Ba'ath Party Web site that they would target U.S. interests anywhere.

The Ba'ath Party was disbanded after U.S.-led forces overthrew Saddam in 2003. The Web site is thought to be run from Yemen, where several exiled members of the party are based.

In its ruling Tuesday, the appeals court said Saddam must be hanged within 30 days for his role in the Dujail killings. The court also affirmed death sentences for two co-defendants, including Saddam's half brother. It ruled that life imprisonment for a third was too lenient and demanded that he also be sentenced to death.

Many Baghdad neighborhoods were jittery yesterday amid fears that Sunni Arab insurgents would target Shi'ite areas in revenge attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0109529

Violence appeared to be relatively minimal, though, with one car bombing killing eight civilians and wounding 10 near an army checkpoint in the capital, police said.

The U.S. military reported three troop deaths, bringing the U.S. death toll in December to 93 in one of the bloodiest months for American troops in Iraq this year.

Two Latvian soldiers were killed and three were wounded when a roadside bomb exploded under their Humvee, the Latvian Defense Ministry said. It was not clear where the incident occurred, but Latvia has about 130 troops serving in Diwaniyah, 80 miles south of Baghdad.

Saddam Advises Against Hatred In Farewell Letter (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis And Molly Hennessy-fiske

The Los Angeles Times, December 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Saddam Hussein declared in a handwritten farewell letter published Wednesday that his execution for crimes against humanity would be a sacrifice for his people, and he urged Iraqis not to give in to hatred.

"Here I am presenting myself as a sacrifice, if God wants this," the former Iraqi president wrote. "I invite you now to reject hatred, since hatred will not allow justice and fairness.... I also invite you, brothers and sisters, my sons and Iraq's sons, strugglers, comrades not to hate the nations that assaulted us."

The letter was released as shootings and explosions rattled Baghdad for another day, and protesters took to the streets of the Shiite holy city of Najaf after an associate of a radical anti-American cleric was killed in a confrontation with Iraqi and foreign troops.

The U.S. military announced the deaths of three service personnel: a Marine killed in combat Wednesday in Al Anbar province, a soldier killed in a road accident Tuesday while on a combat mission and another soldier who died of noncombat injuries in Balad on Dec. 23. Their deaths raised the number of U.S. troops who have died in Iraq since 2003 to 2,983, according to the Web site icasualties.org.

Saddam's letter was posted on a Web site used by his Baath Party. Bushra Khalil, a member of Saddam's defense team, confirmed its authenticity.

The letter was dated Nov. 5, the day Saddam was sentenced to death for crimes against humanity in connection with the execution of 148 men and boys from the Shiite town of Dujail after a 1982 assassination attempt. It was released after a nine-judge appeals panel upheld the sentence Tuesday.

Saddam said he wrote the letter because he was not given a chance to make a final statement when his sentence was handed down. "Oh loyal, generous people," his letter concluded, "I say farewell and my soul will be with the merciful God who helps those who take refuge in him and doesn't disappoint an honest believer."

Aref Shahin, the chief judge of the appeals panel, said the government was obliged to carry out the execution within 30 days. But Khalil said there might be grounds to block it. Saddam's defense team plans to meet Thursday in Jordan to discuss the next move.

Relatives of those killed in Dujail and other victims of Saddam's regime have demanded a public hanging. But government officials said Saddam's execution probably would be carried out in private in front of select witnesses. They said it might occur within days.

Under Iraq's constitution, President Jalal Talabani, a firm opponent of the death penalty, and his two deputies must ratify the executions of Saddam and three co-defendants before Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki can order them carried out.

However, the code governing the court created specifically to try Saddam and members of his regime does not permit any change once the sentence is ratified by the appeals panel.

"We have a contradiction here," Khalil said by telephone from Lebanon. "In such cases everywhere in the world, it is the constitution that is regarded as the highest law of the land."

Talabani's spokesman, Hiwa Osman, said Tuesday that the president regarded the issue of sentencing as a matter for the judiciary. In previous cases, Talabani has deputized one of his vice presidents to sign on his behalf.

DOJ_NMG_0109530

"The fact of the matter is that this (signature) is more ceremonial than it is official," said Mariam Rayis, al-Maliki's legal adviser. "The sentence will be carried out regardless of whether they actually sign or not."

Talk of executions comes amid surging sectarian bloodshed in Iraq. Sunni political leaders have warned that hanging Saddam could inflame violence and intensify attacks against U.S. troops.

Politicians close to al-Maliki said the prime minister wanted the sentence carried out quickly, to deny insurgents an opportunity to plan revenge attacks or to attempt to free Saddam. Education Minister Khodayer Khozar said the prime minister and other Cabinet members also wanted to avoid a distasteful public display.

"It would be the joy of millions of Iraqis to see him hang on television, but ethically we cannot do this," he said.

In Najaf on Thursday, at least 2,000 mourners in black chanted "No, no to America" during the funeral procession for Saheb Amiri, an associate of radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr's.

U.S. military spokesman Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said Amiri, who was suspected of planning and supplying materials for roadside bombings including an October attack on the Najaf police chief, was killed when he fired at an Iraqi soldier.

Abdul Razzaq Naddawi, an al-Sadr official in Najaf, claimed that Amiri was killed in front of his wife and children, and that he did not belong to al-Sadr's Mahi Army militia.

Caldwell said coalition forces were still holding two of five Iranian men detained in raids Dec. 20 and 21 in Baghdad's central Jadriya neighborhood. Evidence seized by the military links the two men to illegal weapons shipments to armed groups in Iraq, Caldwell said.

Four of the men arrested, including the two still held, were diplomats visiting Iraq at the invitation of Talibani, according to an official at the Iranian embassy in Baghdad who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Times staff writers Mohammed Rasheed, Raheem Salma and Said Rifai in Baghdad, and correspondents in Baghdad, Babil, Hilla, Najaf and Tehran, Iran, contributed to this report.

Iraqis Split Over Death Penalty For Saddam (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, December 28, 2006

News of Saddam Hussein's imminent execution provoked widely differing reactions among Iraqis on Wednesday, with some welcoming the demise of their former persecutor and many afraid that it would cause further disruption to their lives, and others convinced that the president would strike a last-minute deal to avoid death.

Iraqi officials announced on Tuesday that the execution could be carried out at any time, but suggested that it would probably not take place until after the four-day Eid al-Adha holiday, which is due to start at the end of the week.

An appeals court announced on Tuesday that it had turned down the former president's final appeal and that his execution would follow within 30 days. The deposed dictator was convicted in November of complicity in a campaign of reprisals against a Shia village after an assassination attempt against him in 1982.

Some residents in northern Kurdistanexpressed jubilation at the deposed leader's imminent hanging, even though it will supersede his trial on charges of carrying out a genocide against the Kurds in the late 1980s.

In Baghdad, the centre of Iraq's sectarian conflict, reaction was mixed. Some residents worried that Mr Hussein's execution would disrupt what little normalcy was left in their lives, fearing either retaliation from his supporters or an extended security clampdown on movement in the capital to prevent such attacks.

In Sadr City, a largely Shia district that is the support base of the radical Sadrist movement, one resident said few of his neighbours actually believed that Mr Hussein would be executed. He cited recent events – the escape of a Sunni minister from an Iraqi jail, and the demolition by UK forces of a police station in the southern city of Basra on the grounds that it had been affiliated with death squads – as indicators that Mr Hussein would somehow be able to cut a deal with the Americans and be allowed to escape.

Many Shia believe the US military is tying their hands in the country's sectarian conflict, and some believe that the Americans want to return his former ruling Ba'ath party to power.

Both sets of reactions indicate the degree to which Iraqis are likely to view Mr Hussein's execution through the lens of their own predicament and the country's shifting web of political alliances.

Meanwhile, Mr Hussein's lawyer released a letter written by the former president before his appeal was denied, in which he stated that he would go to the gallows as a "sacrifice" and called on his former Iraqi subjects to unite against their enemies.

A website affiliated with members of the Ba'ath party and believed to be run from Yemen posted a statement threatening retaliation against the US if the execution was carried out.

"The Ba'ath and the resistance are determined to retaliate, with all means and everywhere, to harm America and its interests if it commits this crime," the statement said.

The New York-based Human Rights Watch said that the Iraqi government should not implement the death penalty. It called Mr Hussein's trial "deeply flawed", citing Iraqi government actions that threatened the court's independence as well as procedural errors.

Execution Likely To Come Soon For Saddam Hussein (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-fiske

The Los Angeles Times, December 28, 2006

BAGHDAD — Saddam Hussein, sentenced to hang within 30 days, will likely be executed soon at a private gathering of select witnesses, officials close to Iraq's Prime Minister Nouri Maliki said today.

Hussein, 69, was sentenced to death Nov. 5 after being convicted of crimes against humanity in connection with the extermination of 100 men and boys from the Shiite town of Dujail after locals attempted to assassinate him in 1982.

A letter Hussein wrote on the day of his sentencing was released today on his former Baath party's web site.

"Dear faithful people," the deposed president wrote, "I say goodbye to you, but I will be with the merciful God who helps those who take refuge in him and who will never disappoint any honest believer."

Hussein's victims, particularly those from Dujail, are demanding a public hanging so they can see justice done. But government officials concerned about exacerbating sectarian tensions rejected the idea, said a cabinet member of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, adding the government will likely only release photographs of the hanging to the public.

A U.S. Marine was also killed today in combat in western Anbar province, the military said, and a U.S. soldier died Tuesday after his vehicle rolled over on a dirt canal trail while on a combat mission south of the capital. Their deaths raised the number of U.S. troops killed in Iraq since 2003 to 2,983, according to icasualties.org.

Explosions and shootings rocked the capital today, as protesters took to the streets in the southern city of Najaf after Iraqi and coalition forces killed a local aide to anti-U.S. cleric Muqtada Sadr.

Protesters chanted anti-American slogans during the funeral procession for Saheb Amiri, an associate of Sadr, who ran a civic organization called Shaheedollah, or God's Martyrs, and a newspaper.

U.S. military spokesman Army Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV described the raid at an afternoon briefing in Baghdad.

Caldwell said that after soldiers arrived, Amir fled to the roof of his house. An Iraqi soldier pursued him, followed by a coalition soldier, Caldwell said, and when Amiri shot at the Iraqi soldier with an assault rifle, the coalition soldier returned fire, killing Amiri.

Amiri's 16-year-old son, Ali, confirmed the story of the raid, but said the soldiers followed his father to the roof and killed him.

Caldwell said Amiri was suspected of planning and supplying roadside bomb attacks against Iraqi and coalition forces, including an October attack on the Najaf police chief.

Asked about Amiri's ties to Sadr and his Mahdi Army militia, Caldwell said Amiri was targeted for suspected illegal activity, "not because he was associated with any particular organization." But provincial and Sadr party leaders condemned the killing.

"This act is not accepted at all and it's a significant violation for sovereignty in Najaf," said a provincial leader who asked not to be named.

Sadr party leaders said Amiri was gunned down while trying to call them for help.

DOJ_NMG_0109532

"He was killed in front of his wife and his children," said Abudl Razzaq Naddawi, a Sadr official in Najaf, adding that at the time he was killed, Amiri was trying to call Sadr officials, "To tell them that he was surrounded by Americans." Naddawi said "Martyr Amiri" ran the civic group and a newspaper, Anwar Al Ghoori, and did not belong to the Mahdi Army.

Naddawi and other Sadr party leaders called a press conference in Najaf this afternoon where they urged followers not to lash out at U.S. forces.

"The Americans want to drag us into an open battle and we will not be lured into provocations," Naddawi said.

U.S. forces could be seen patrolling in greater numbers today in Baghdad's Shiite stronghold of Sadr City, and more were arriving in vehicles and helicopters late today, according to an Interior Ministry source.

Caldwell said operations are underway in Sadr City to root out the death squad responsible for extra-judicial killings. Such killings have been linked to both the Mahdi Army and the Shiite Badr Organization, a militia association with the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq party.

"Anybody who is operating outside of the law, extra-judicial killings, we are going to take down, regardless of their affiliations," Caldwell said.

He said coalition forces were still holding two of five Iranian men detained in separate raids Dec. 20 and 21 in Baghdad's central Jadriya neighborhood, Caldwell said. During the later raid, the military seized evidence that links the two men to illegal weapons shipments to armed groups in Iraq, including documents, maps, photographs and videos, Caldwell said.

Four of the men arrested, including the two still held, were diplomats visiting Iraq at Talibani's invitation, according to an official at the Iranian embassy in Baghdad who spoke on condition of anonymity. He said embassy officials have been trying unsuccessfully to visit the prisoners.

At least 23 people died in today's violence across Iraq.

In the southern city of Babil, two roadside bombs exploded at an Iraqi Army patrol post, killing three soldiers, according to police in nearby Kut.

Gunmen killed the mayor of the southern county of Husseiniya, Hameed Sharifi and his bodyguard as they were driving to his office in nearby Karbala today, according to Karbala's mayor.

In the capital, explosions and shootings erupted at several points during the day. At least 50 bodies were recovered in the 24-hour period ending today, according to the Interior Ministry.

A car bomb exploded at about 2:10 p.m. in the north Baghdad neighborhood of Talibiya, killing at least ten people.

A roadside bomb near Baghdad's Wathiq Square killed seven, including three police, according to police. Gunmen attacked a bus ferrying workers to Kindi Medical College near Shurta Tunnel in west Baghdad, injuring several.

Saddam Hussein's Baath Party Threatens To Retaliate If Their Leader Is Executed (IHT/AP)

By The Associated Press

International Herald Tribune/AP, December 28, 2006

Saddam Hussein's Baath party threatens to retaliate if their leader is executed

AMMAN, Jordan: Saddam Hussein's Baath Party threatened Wednesday to retaliate if the ousted Iraqi leader is executed, warning in an Internet posting it would target U.S. interests anywhere.

The statement appeared on a Web site known to represent the Baath, which was disbanded after U.S.-led forces overthrew Saddam in 2003. The site is believed to be run from Yemen, where a number of exiled members of the party are based.

On Tuesday, Iraq's highest court rejected Saddam's appeal against a conviction and death sentence for the killing of 148 people who were detained after an attempt to assassinate in Dujail, northern Iraq, in 1982. The court said the former president should be hanged within 30 days.

"Our party warns again of the consequences of executing Mr. President and his comrades," the statement said.

"The Baath and the resistance are determined to retaliate, with all means and everywhere, to harm America and its interests if it commits this crime," the statement added, referring to Baath fighters as "the resistance."

"The American Administration will be held responsible for any harm inflicted on the president because the United States is the decision-maker (in Iraq) and not the puppet Iraqi government."

DOJ_NMG_0109533

The statement said that if the execution takes place, it would be impossible for the Baath to take part in any prospective negotiations with U.S. and Iraqi officials to reduce the violence in Iraq.

Saddam's defense lawyers, who are based in Amman, called on Arab governments and the United Nations to intervene to stop the execution.

"Otherwise, all may be participating in what is going on, either actually or due to their silence in face of the crimes, which are being committed in Iraq in the name of democracy," the lawyers said in a statement in English that was e-mailed to The Associated Press bureau.

The statement, signed by "the Defense Committee for President Saddam Hussein," said the court's rejection of Saddam's appeal was part of the "continued shedding of pure Iraqi blood by the current regime in Iraq, which (is) directly connected with the American occupation."

One of Saddam's counsel, Najib al-Nueimi, a former justice minister in the Gulf state of Qatar, said it was now time for Saddam's family to appeal to Iraqi President Jalal Talabani.

"The defense team has exhausted all the legal channels to appeal this decision, so it is up to the president's family to present an appeal for clemency to the current president, asking him not to sign the execution papers," al-Nueimi said, speaking in a phone interview from Qatar.

Saddam's wife, Sajda, lives in Qatar, and his daughter Raghad, who has supervised his defense team, lives in Amman.

Asked whether the family would appeal to Talabani, al-Nueimi would only say: "It's up to them."

Later in the day, the lawyer of the former Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Tareq Aziz condemned the verdict saying it was a flagrant violation of the regulations of the court. He believes that court regulations require that an execution occur after 30 days — not within this period, as the court announced.

Badee Izzat Aref told the AP in a telephone call from Dubai that he met Saddam and Aziz last week in Baghdad and understood from them that Aziz will testify in court for the benefit of Saddam in his ongoing trial. Saddam is currently on trial for the military campaign, codenamed Operation Anfal, that took place during the 1980-88 Iraq-Iran war. An estimated 180,000 Kurds died during the campaign.

"He has very important issues to reveal during the trial," Aref said. "He will uncover the involvement of many important foreign and local personalities."

"The Iraqi government wants to accelerate the execution process to avoid the testimony of Tariq Aziz," Aref said.

Noting that Iraqi President Jalal Talabani he was against the death penalty, whether against Saddam or anybody else, Aref said, "If he gives authority to his vice president to sign the execution order, he will face great embarrassment before his party and the Kurdish people."

Rough Justice (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 28, 2006

AT FIRST, British Prime Minister Tony Blair's reaction to Saddam Hussein's imminent hanging sounds a little wishy-washy. Blair reiterated his own opposition to capital punishment but also said the sentence "does give us a very clear reminder of the total and barbaric brutality of that regime."

Wishy-washy or not — and when it comes to Iraq, thoughtful equivocation is preferable to false certainty — Blair got it right. If one opposes capital punishment as a matter of principle, as we do, putting Hussein to death is of course objectionable. So was executing Adolf Eichmann and Timothy McVeigh. Rather than dwell on generic objections to capital punishment, a futile exercise given Iraqi law, Blair emphasized the sentence's significance as a judgment on the former Iraqi leader's misrule.

That said, both the sentence and the trial that produced it can be described as very rough justice. By British and U.S. standards, there were lapses in the trial that convicted Hussein of ordering the murders of 148 residents of a Shiite village in 1982. It's also troubling that the Iraqi appeals court that ruled Tuesday that Hussein should be hanged within 30 days took only three weeks to rule on detailed arguments submitted by his lawyers.

The most practical argument for sparing Hussein's life is rooted not in procedural scruples or a rejection of the death penalty but in political strategy. Ideally, Hussein would have been convicted against the backdrop of an Iraqi government regarded as legitimate by all segments of society, including Sunnis who prospered under the despot's rule. The current Shiite-led government in Baghdad falls sadly short of that description.

Assuming that Iraq's president or vice president could commute Hussein's sentence — and the appeals court insists that its ruling can't be altered — the best argument for mercy is that it might appease Sunnis who regard Prime Minister Nouri Maliki as partial to his fellow Shiites. At the same time, sparing Hussein could further destabilize Iraq by outraging both Shiites and Kurds. Tens of thousands of the latter group died in a military campaign that forms the basis of a separate genocide charge against Hussein.

As with so much about Iraq, there is no simple answer to the question of whether the nation would be better off if the condemned keeps his date with the hangman. Hussein claims that he is prepared to join the ranks of "the true men and martyrs." Iraq's leaders need to ask themselves if that "martyrdom" will come, and if so whether it will be at too high a price.

G.O.P. Senator In Spotlight After A Critical Iraq Speech (NYT)

By James Risen

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 27 — At the close of the Senate's lame-duck session, in between formulaic tributes to senators departing voluntarily or otherwise, a Republican backbencher suddenly rose to give one of the most passionate and surprising speeches about the war in Iraq yet delivered in Congress.

For a solid Republican who had originally voted for the war, the words spoken by the senator, Gordon H. Smith of Oregon, on the evening of Dec. 7 were incendiary and marked a stunning break with the president.

"I, for one, am at the end of my rope when it comes to supporting a policy that has our soldiers patrolling the same streets in the same way, being blown up by the same bombs day after day," Mr. Smith said. "That is absurd. It may even be criminal."

But the real impact of the address came not just from Mr. Smith's words, but from the way he delivered them. His somber cadence resonated in a way that made political Washington take notice, transforming him into one of the most talked-about Republicans heading into the new Congress.

After acknowledging that he had been "rather silent" on Iraq since voting to authorize the war in 2002, Mr. Smith said he was rising "to speak from my heart" because he had witnessed "the slow undoing of our efforts there."

"I remember the pride I felt when the statue of Saddam Hussein came down," he said. "I remember the thrill when three times, Iraqis risked their own lives to vote democratically in a way that was internationally verifiable as well as legitimate and important. Now all those memories seem much like ashes to me."

"Many things have been attributed to George Bush," Mr. Smith said, "but I do not believe him to be a liar."

He continued, "He is not guilty of perfidy, but I do believe he is guilty of believing bad intelligence and giving us the same. I can't tell you how devastated I was to learn that in fact we were not going to find weapons of mass destruction."

Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, stopped short as he was walking out of the chamber to listen to Mr. Smith. He was so struck by the speech that he called him to congratulate him, an aide to Mr. Kennedy said.

A White House official also quickly called Mr. Smith to discuss his speech, Mr. Smith said in an interview.

Before his speech, Mr. Smith had last garnered national publicity with efforts to pass legislation to prevent suicides among youths after his son, Garrett, killed himself in 2003, on the day before his 22nd birthday.

But within days of the Iraq speech, Mr. Smith emerged as a new spokesman for an endangered political species: the moderate Republican.

In the process, Mr. Smith may have signaled that some moderate Republicans in the Senate are poised to break openly with the White House on the war, just as President Bush is seeking a new strategy to deal with the bloody stalemate in Iraq.

Only three or four senators were in the chamber when Mr. Smith spoke, but his speech has been replayed repeatedly on cable news and on the Internet and has had reverberations throughout the Republican Party.

For some, the speech helped crystallize the post-election anger many Republican lawmakers have for the Bush administration and its conduct of the war, which they believe cost them control of Congress. In the aftermath of his speech, Mr. Smith said he heard from several other Republican senators who he said agreed with his views.

DOJ_NMG_0109535

"I sensed a cold shoulder or two," he said. "But many of my colleagues said, 'Boy, you spoke for me.' "

Senator Olympia J. Snowe, Republican of Maine, said, "I think Gordon sort of struck a chord, and his speech represented a manifestation of frustrations that exists among many of us, not just moderate Republicans but all Americans."

"I think for some, that speech was a tipping point," Ms. Snowe added. "It was a reality check. We have to admit that something has gone terribly wrong."

But other Republican lawmakers argued that Mr. Smith's speech was not representative of most Senate Republicans' views.

"I don't believe it's true that a lot of Republican senators are ready to break with the White House on Iraq," said Senator Judd Gregg, Republican of New Hampshire. "I don't think the views he expressed represent a significant number of senators in the Republican caucus."

First elected to the Senate in 1996, Mr. Smith, 54, has forged an image as a centrist Republican in a swing state that is now tilting a bit Democratic.

He said he had previously refrained from publicly criticizing the war because he had been struck by the comment of a soldier from Oregon, who told him during a 2005 visit to Iraq that if he supported the troops, he also had to support their mission.

But Mr. Smith's attitude began to change over the past year, particularly after he visited Iraq in May. In an interview, the senator recalled two occurrences in Baghdad during his visit, one in which a massive bomb killed about 70 people and a second in which some American troops were killed on patrol.

And a book on World War I he had been reading, by John Keegan, the British military historian, was beginning to haunt him.

Mr. Smith said that his use of the word "criminal" in his speech to describe the war in Iraq came from his reading of that book, which he said explained to him the "practice of British generals, sending a whole generation of British men running into machine guns, despite memos back to London saying, in effect, machine guns work."

Much like the British in World War I, he added, "I have concluded that we are employing strategies that are needlessly getting kids killed."

After returning to Washington from Baghdad, Mr. Smith said he listened with growing dismay to optimistic briefings given to senators by Donald H. Rumsfeld, then secretary of defense, and other administration officials. Even in closed-door briefings, he said, "the answers always seemed to be, It's tough but we have to stay the course.

"And so I started thinking about the British generals," he said.

Last summer, on a flight from Portland, Ore., to Washington, Mr. Smith said he read "Fiasco," a history of the Iraq war by Thomas E. Ricks, "and by the time I landed I was heartsick."

As the situation in Iraq worsened in the fall, Mr. Smith said it became increasingly obvious to him that "we were playing street cop in a civil war."

"I started thinking about those British generals again," he said.

He said he had decided not to speak out before the midterm elections, both out of political loyalty and a fear that his words would be drowned out by partisan attacks.

"Then we were back in Washington for the lame-duck session," he said, "and I woke up one morning and turned on the news and another 10 soldiers had been killed. And I went from steaming to boiled. And then I went to the floor."

Mr. Smith faces re-election in 2008, and some Democrats in Oregon have suggested that his break with the White House was timed to aid his coming campaign, an accusation he adamantly denies.

Oregon's Democratic governor dismisses talk that the speech was politically motivated. Instead, the governor, Theodore R. Kulongoski, said he believed that the suicide of Mr. Smith's son had had a large effect on Mr. Smith's thinking on a wide variety of issues.

"I think the loss of his son has dramatically changed his view," Mr. Kulongoski said in an interview. "He understands the loss of a child. I think he's gotten tired of reading about these kids dying."

"I think he has been struggling through this for a long time," he added. "I think the trauma in him has been his loyalty to his party and to his president, at the same time this gut-wrenching thing in him."

Mr. Smith said he recognized that his words upset the White House and some fellow Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0109536

"It is not easy to stand up to the president of your own party to say you are unhappy with the way this has been managed," he said. "But if you can't speak up, then you should go home."

Support Is Lacking For British Troops, Commander Says (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

LONDON, Dec. 27 — The commander of Britain's 7,000 troops in southern Iraq has complained that they are operating in conditions that display "a generation of underfunding and relative neglect" by successive governments back home.

The remarks by the commander, Maj. Gen. Richard Shirreff, echoed criticism by two other high-ranking officers in recent months, breaking with a tradition of public restraint by military commanders in expressing political views.

In an interview with the BBC, General Shirreff said, "The nation needs to understand that the quality work done by these courageous men and women out here only happens and can only continue if our soldiers are properly supported back home in terms of the support for training, infrastructure, barracks, accommodation."

"Some of these issues need solving," he said, describing many of them as "the result of a generation of underfunding and relative neglect."

General Shirreff did not blame a specific government and directed some of his criticism at the broader relationship between civilians and the military.

"I don't blame any particular party or government; I think this is a general issue," he said. "There's a whole range of areas — it's not just the sharp end here." He said the "military covenant between the nation and its soldiers" was "seriously out of kilter."

General Shirreff's comments followed remarks in October by Gen. Sir Richard Dannatt, the top army commander, who said British troops, based primarily in Basra, should be withdrawn from Iraq "sometime soon" because their presence was adding to security problems.

Snipers Stalk Marine Supply Route In Western Iraq (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, December 28, 2006

along msr mobile, outside fallouja, iraq — The battle for this desolate stretch of road east of Fallouja is relentless: Twenty-four hours a day, Marines lumber up and down the six-lane freeway in 23-ton amphibious assault vehicles, looking for bombs and dodging snipers.

The shadowy gunmen are a constant menace on MSR Mobile — short for Main Supply Route Mobile, so dubbed because it serves as a main link between several U.S. bases here in Al Anbar province. In the last two weeks, two Marines with Company B of the 2nd Assault Amphibian Battalion from Camp Lejeune, N.C., have fallen to snipers' bullets: Lance Cpl. Luke Yepsen, 20, of Brazos, Texas, and Cpl. Joshua Pickard, 20, of Merced, Calif.

Marines suspect the same sniper killed Yepsen and Pickard.

"I hope he shows up today — I'd like to blast his ass," Sgt. Clayton Chism, 26, of Prentiss, Miss., said at the beginning of a patrol involving 14 Marines and three vehicles from the battalion's Team Gator.

The mission on the road linking Fallouja to Baghdad could be seen as a microcosm of the Marine mission in Al Anbar: nothing likely to be made into a Hollywood war movie, just a "persistent presence" to wear down the insurgency.

But there are moments of adrenalin-pumping drama. On this day, the Marines shot an Iraqi spotted planting a roadside bomb. When Lance Cpl. William Shaw was lifting the wounded Iraqi into a vehicle to be taken to a field hospital, the Marine was shot in the back by a sniper.

The round struck the back plate in the flak vest worn by the 22-year-old from Fort Bend, Texas. A few inches lower, and Shaw might have been killed or his spine severed.

The explosive ordnance detail was called to examine the bomb. It was fake.

Fake bombs are a recent wrinkle in the insurgents' game plan. The strategy, apparently, is to fire at Marines who arrive to neutralize the devices.

DOJ_NMG_0109537

Navy trauma doctors who have treated wounded Marines say the snipers have also learned how to find vulnerable spots not covered by protective plates.

"We're not bionic men," said Gunnery Sgt. Justin Smith, 32, of Boston.

Several sniper shootings have taken place nearby. Marines suspect that insurgents use low-slung buildings parallel to the freeway as a staging ground and a place to make bombs.

The Marines raided the buildings recently and detained dozens of Iraqis. Some Marines had hoped to get permission to demolish the buildings, but that was denied by upper authority.

"It's like being in the U.S. and having a public park being used by drug dealers," said Capt. Eric Dominijanni, 34, of New York, commander of B Company. "Not everybody there is a drug dealer, and you can't destroy the park."

Chism's three-vehicle convoy arrived to provide additional security for the Marines. Inside one vehicle, nicknamed "Event Horizon," after a sci-fi movie, three Marines waited to respond if the searchers were attacked.

Protecting MSR Mobile is sometimes boring.

For four hours, they waited. "It was a good day: not much action," said Cpl. Dennis Bryant, 21, of Kodiak, Alaska. "Everybody came back OK."

Navy corpsman Raymond Casas, 35, of Victoria, Texas, was hit by a sniper round in the upper chest while on a mission just off the freeway. The bullet hit his M-16 and then the fabric of his protective vest, leaving Casas with a deep gouge in his Grim Reaper tattoo.

Casas said he felt a sharp sting in his chest and immediately went on the radio to report he'd been hit. "I was more mad than hurt," he said. He knows that if the bullet hadn't been deflected by his M-16, he'd be dead. "I was lucky, I guess."

Although the sniper thought to have killed Yepsen and Pickard is still at large, the Marines here have killed and captured numerous snipers and bombers.

"We take one off, there seems to be another to take his place," Smith said.

Pakistan Proposes Fence To Rein In Taliban (CSM)

By David Montero

The Christian Science Monitor, December 28, 2006

ISLAMABAD, PAKISTAN

First, Pakistan tried to fight the Taliban militia along its remote, craggy border with Afghanistan. Then it tried to make peace with them. This week, Pakistan announced a new solution to the problem on its western frontier: mines and fences along the Afghan border, designed to keep militants from crossing in and out of the tribal zone.

Western capitals, newspapers, and military intelligence reports are increasingly voicing concern that the source of the Taliban's growing power rests in Pakistan and that Pakistan is not doing enough to quell it. This latest approach, beyond being quixotic, is also risky, analysts say: If the fence doesn't work, Pakistan may have exhausted all apparent options - and possibly its credibility, too.

"If this doesn't solve the problem, then what next?" asks Ramiyullah Yusufzai, a prominent journalist and tribal analyst in Peshawar.

For its part, Afghanistan immediately responded with anger to the fence idea. "The border is not where the problem lies," Khaliq Ahmad, a presidential spokesman in Kabul, was quoted as saying.

Many critics in Pakistan agree. "Are we going to detain ourselves? Or should we look into the root causes - the policy of tolerating militants inside our borders," asks Afrasiab Khattak, a political analyst and member of the opposition Awami National Party in Peshawar, near the Afghan border.

Pakistan has repeatedly dismissed the numerous claims that it has shied away from engaging Taliban militants, reiterating its commitment to fighting terrorism. The fence proposal, Pakistani officials insist, has not been timed to address rising concerns in the international community.

DOJ_NMG_0109538

"It's not that our military action failed and our political action failed. No. This proposal pre-dates those," says Tasneem Aslam, Pakistan's Foreign Office spokesperson. Ms. Aslam refused to characterize the fence as a barrier to prevent Pakistani-based terrorists from entering Afghanistan, insisting that Taliban violence was an internal Afghan problem.

"There are 200,000 [people] crossing the border a day, and they're not all crossing at designated points. We want to control that," she explains.

In September, however, President Pervez Musharraf admitted that Pakistani militants are responsible for some portion of violence inside Afghanistan.

"There are al-Qaeda and Taliban in both Afghanistan and Pakistan," Musharraf said during talks in Kabul. "Clearly they are crossing from the Pakistan side and causing bomb blasts in Afghanistan."

The job of preventing those attacks is, by all accounts, not an easy one. Afghanistan and Pakistan share a 1,500-mile-long border, studded with some of the most rugged terrain in the world. The Taliban are well-trained, well-armed and well-versed in that terrain, analysts agree. There are no easy, short-term solutions. Half-hearted ones, like the fencing proposal, will only chip away at Pakistan's credibility, which some see as already fading.

A more realistic solution begins with an honest review of Pakistan's policy of supporting militants, some analysts contend.

"It is for the policymakers in Islamabad," says Mr. Khattak.

Other analysts caution against such claims, citing a lack of hard proof. But they agree that substantive political reform is vital. Political parties are banned from the tribal areas, meaning there is no force to contest religious leaders who support the Taliban. Draconian, colonial-era laws are the rule of the land, compelling many to view Taliban-inspired laws as more just.

"Pakistan has the will [to stop militants]. It is a problem of its political capacity," says Rasul Bahksh Rais, a professor of political science at the Lahore School of Management Sciences. Introducing political parties is a critical step, he adds, but one the government has resisted for fears such parties will resist them.

"We are not going to impede the movement between countries," Aslam assured. The fencing proposal, which Pakistan has broached in the past, will include designated crossing points where officials can easily monitor traffic. So far, the proposal has no timeframe.

It is unclear if Pakistani authorities plan to mine and wire the entire 1,500-mile stretch. Pakistan has proposed the project unilaterally - a move that has sparked ire from Afghan officials and raised eyebrows at home.

"You make an agreement when you do these kinds of things. But they haven't discussed it with the Afghan authorities," says Yusufzai.

Pakistan's Foreign Secretary, Riaz Muhammed Khan, insisted at a press conference, however, that Pakistan "needs no permission or agreement with any country, including Afghanistan, while carrying out any such project within its territorial boundaries."

The proposed fence would run along the Durand Line, a border set by British colonialists in 1893. Pakistan recognizes the line as an international border, but Afghanistan does not. Pashtun tribes, who live on both sides of the border and have migrated in between for centuries, are unlikely to accept the fence.

"There would be attempts to stop the fence or blow up areas of the fence," says Mr. Yusufzai. Others add that for every militant felled by a mine, many more will emerge from the swirl of death and violence."One part of a family on one side [of the border] will be stepping over dynamite to see family on the other side. Don't we have enough gun powder in our area?" asks Khattak.

Afghan Air Strike Irks U.S. Soldiers (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, December 28, 2006

Special-operations soldiers say that if the command in Afghanistan had listened to them four years ago, there would have been no need this month for a U.S. air strike that killed senior Taliban leader Mullah Akhtar Mohammed Osmani.

He already would have been locked up.

DOJ_NMG_0109539

As reported in 2002 by The Washington Times, an Army Green Beret "A Team" said it captured Osmani in a village near Kandahar, the Taliban's birthplace.

The U.S. prison at the Bagram military base north of Kabul later released Osmani, the Special Forces soldiers said. They suspect Osmani convinced his captors that he was not a Taliban leader but a poor villager. The soldiers said they heard later that he crossed into Pakistan and reorganized his forces.

A military spokesman told The Times, "If we had captured Osmani, we would still have him."

Osmani was killed earlier this month. The Combined Forces Command in Kabul said that on Dec. 19 Osmani was identified, based on intelligence reports, as riding in a vehicle near the Pakistan border in a deserted area. An air strike killed him and two unidentified companions.

"Osmani was in the top ring of the Taliban leadership, and he was also a close associate of Osama bin Laden and [anti-U.S. warlord] Gulbuddin Hekmatyr," said Col. Tom Collins, a command spokesman. "His death is a major achievement in the fight against extremists and their terrorist networks."

Osmani had helped lead a Taliban resurgence this year that saw the radical Islamic movement recapture towns in southern Afghanistan, commit a string of atrocities and ramp up ambushes of NATO troops.

The command said Osmani ran the Taliban's military operations in Kandahar and other southern towns. His leader, Mullah Mohammed Omar, remains at large.

Soldiers on the A Team in 2002 said Osmani should never have had the second chance to reorganize the Taliban.

"We may never find out what really happened to him and if he was really let go by mistake, or something else, but it would have saved many, many lives, Afghan and American, if Osmani had been locked up or killed in '02," said a Special Forces soldier who was in Afghanistan at the time.

The soldiers told The Times that in July 2002 they received intelligence from locals that Osmani was staying in a compound in the village of Sangin. The soldiers said that U.S. military operations had slowed by then and that some ex-Taliban felt reasonably secure living in small villages.

While his compound was under surveillance, a man matching Osmani's description emerged to attend morning prayers, the soldiers said. The man was stopped at gunpoint and searched. He had an old Taliban ID card with the name "Osmani," they said, and scars on his chest that matched an intelligence profile.

The soldiers said they took the man by truck to Kandahar, from where he was flown to the prison in Bagram. Weeks later, they said, they heard he had been released.

A Defense Intelligence Agency spokesman said, "The DIA has no knowledge that Mullah Akhtar Mohammed Osmani was ever in U.S. custody in Afghanistan. Given Osmani's high profile and our interest in detaining him, misidentification by experienced personnel is unlikely."

Air Force May Hire Outsiders To Oversee Projects (WSJ)

By Andy Pasztor

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

The Air Force is considering a potential new approach to managing multibillion-dollar space projects that could help it avoid the costly troubles that plagued previous efforts and lead to a lucrative new role for private-sector contractors.

But the new approach could present its own share of problems, including the potential for conflicts of interest.

The Air Force is considering hiring outside engineers or consultants to oversee systems integration of its next-generation navigational satellites, according to industry and government officials. Typically, the military service that orders a particular system retains primary responsibility and control over systems engineering and integration.

But hiring a separate project integrator could set a precedent for future projects and would be a tacit acknowledgment that both Air Force Space Command and the Pentagon's massive weapons-buying bureaucracy lack the necessary expertise to perform the required oversight role.

The project involves setting up a next-generation U.S. global positioning system, which is widely used by the military and supports consumer applications such as in-car driving directions. The new system would feature stronger signals and be more jam-resistant. While a final price tag has yet to be determined, preliminary specifications for the system call for as many as two dozen satellites costing $100 million or more.

Boeing Co. and Lockheed Martin Corp. are vying to build satellites for the new system, known as GPS III, and may end up competing for the integration work as well. Production go-ahead is expected in 2008, though the newly designed spacecraft may not go into orbit until 2013. So far, the Air Force hasn't made a final decision on whether units of the two prime contractors will be eligible to receive any integration contracts, or if the Pentagon will seek a separate consulting firm to do that work, said the people familiar with the matter.

An Air Force spokesman declined to comment. A Boeing spokeswoman said the company is waiting for official requests for bids. A Lockheed Martin spokesman said the company is still reviewing details to determine if bidding on a potential systems-integration contract for GPS III "makes good business sense."

In the past few weeks, Air Force officials in conjunction with Aerospace Corp., a federally sponsored think tank that advises the Pentagon on acquisition matters, have been reviewing draft versions of the bid requests for GPS III. Air Force acquisition officials are specifically debating whether prime contractors for GPS III or other big-ticket programs should be barred from competing for certain integration contracts in order to avoid potential conflicts of interest, said a person familiar with the matter. The Air Force is seeking a mitigation plan to deal with any conflicts.

While an integrator wouldn't have final say over which company gets business, it would serve as the Air Force's eyes and ears and would play an important role in resolving technical issues and evaluating the performance of other contractors. Even if different parts of the same contractor are prevented from sharing sensitive information by setting up strict organizational divisions, the military recognizes such protections "by themselves will not mitigate" potential conflicts of interest, according to the Air Force's preliminary bid-solicitation document, issued earlier this month.

Having an integrator also doesn't eliminate complications. Boeing is the integrator for the Army's modernization program, called Future Combat System, and has faced scrutiny over costs and the viability of some of the technologies involved. Boeing has defended its work and the system.

Air Force officials already have said they intend to award separate manufacturing contracts for the satellites and related ground facilities.

The Air Force previously chose the international consulting giant Booz Allen Hamilton Inc. to serve as the lead systems integrator for its $16 billion Transformational Communications System. But that program is still in the concept-development phase and, compared to GPS III, a production ramp-up is likely to occur years later.

Top Federal Prosecutor In Conn. Named To National Position (AP)

By John Christoffersen, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 28, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. (AP) -- Connecticut's top federal prosecutor has been appointed to a national position focused on combatting violence amid signs that a three-year lull in crime is ending, officials said Wednesday.

U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor has been named associate deputy attorney general at the U.S. Justice Department, where he will lead a team focused on violent crime and initiatives to crack down on gangs and illegal guns. He also plans to remain U.S. attorney for Connecticut for at least six months.

"I'm honored that they asked me to do it," O'Connor said. "To me this is a great opportunity to be involved on the national level on the same issues I've been involved in on a local level."

Preliminary FBI data released last week showed that murders and robberies continued to rise across the country during the first six months of 2006. Violent crime figures are on pace for a second straight annual increase. Violent crime rose 2.2 percent nationally last year - the first increase since 2001.

Authorities around the country also are worried about a resurgence in gangs. O'Connor held the state's first gang summit in September, and his office has been stepping up prosecutions.

O'Connor, who was appointed U.S. attorney in 2002 and starts his new position next week, also has been active in Project Safe Neighborhoods, which targets gun-carrying felons and has recovered about 4,000 guns over the past five years, he said.

His appointment comes nearly a year after Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced an expanded program to combat gang violence, including an infusion of federal funds for cities with gang problems. His plan also called for expanding Project Safe Neighborhoods to include more anti-gang efforts and a new national gang task force.

O'Connor, whose new job will not increase his salary of about $145,000, said he will be in Connecticut as least once a week and plans to keep his Connecticut position for at least six months.

"I have no plans of stepping down as U.S. attorney unless circumstances lead me to conclude doing two jobs is having a negative effect on either one," O'Connor said. "I would not have accepted this offer from the deputy attorney general if I was not fully confident my leadership team could manage this district very effectively in my absence."

O'Connor's new position could help Connecticut with its law enforcement needs as well as position O'Connor for a top Justice Department position, said Stan Twardy, a former U.S. attorney for Connecticut. Others have held dual roles before, he said.

"If there are needs in Connecticut, they'll be heard directly, not through filters," Twardy said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Apple 'falsified' Files On Jobs' Options (FT)

By Richard Waters In San Francisco

Financial Times, December 28, 2006

Steve Jobs, chief executive of Apple Computer, was handed 7.5m stock options in 2001 without the required authorisation from the company's board of directors, according to people familiar with the matter.

Records that purported to show a full board meeting had taken place to approve Mr Jobs' remuneration, as required by Apple's procedures, were later falsified. These are now among the pieces of evidence being weighed by the Securities and Exchange Commission as it decides whether to pursue a case against the company or any individuals over the affair, according to these people.

News of the irregularities, which is expected to be revealed in a regulatory filing by Apple before the end of this week, will add to pressure that has been growing on one of Silicon Valley's most highly-regarded companies since the middle of 2005.

Apple is among more than 160 companies that have owned up to stock option backdating – handing options to executives and other employees at exercise prices that were set in hindsight at favourable levels – a scandal which has led to the departure of a number of chief executives.

The latest revelation is likely to add to questions about Apple's disclosures about its internal investigation into the backdating issue. In October, the company largely exonerated Mr Jobs over the matter, saying that while he had been "aware" of the backdating "in a few instances", he "did not receive or otherwise benefit from these grants and was unaware of the accounting implications".

According to an Apple filing in 2002, the options under review were handed to Mr Jobs in October 2001, at an exercise price of $18.30 a share. However, the purported board authorisation was dated near the end of the year, suggesting that the benefits were both not properly authorised and were backdated. Mr Jobs later surrendered his options before they were exercised, implying that he did not gain any direct benefit from them. He was later given a grant of restricted stock by the company instead.

Apple's lawyers have briefed people involved in the case on the findings of the company's internal review of the matter, though it remains unclear how much detail will be included in the filing.

Under Apple's rules, the chief executive's remuneration must be set by a compensation committee of independent directors and later authorised by the full board.

An Apple spokesman refused to comment on the matter on Wednesday, but said the company had handed the findings of its internal enquiry to the SEC. The company said in October that it had found "no misconduct by any member of Apple's current management team" but that its investigation "raised serious concerns regarding the actions of two former officers". At the same time, it also announced the resignation from its board of Fred Andersen, a former chief financial officer. Mr Andersen had not been a director at the time of the 2001 options grant.

Legal News Slams Apple, But Stock Recovers (AP)

By May Wong, Associated Press

AP, December 28, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif. — Wall Street ultimately shrugged off a report Wednesday that federal prosecutors are investigating whether former Apple Computer Inc. officials forged documents to maximize executives' profit from stock options.

The legal publication that detailed the federal probe also reported that CEO Steve Jobs has hired outside attorneys to represent him in the investigation.

Shares of the iPod and Macintosh computer maker went on a roller-coaster ride in trading Wednesday, falling almost 5 percent before rebounding to close up a penny at $81.52 on the Nasdaq.

In a morning note, UBS Investment Research analyst Ben Reitzes called investors' fears "overblown."

"Investors seem to be reacting to the mention of Steve Jobs," Reitzes said in his note. "We believe it could make sense to obtain counsel, given his immense personal fortune and influence."

The Recorder, a San Francisco-based publication owned by American Lawyer Media, reported late Tuesday that federal prosecutors are looking into forged documents at Apple related to administering stock options. The report cited people with knowledge of the case who requested anonymity because the case is the subject of criminal and civil government investigations.

Apple spokesman Steve Dowling said the company is providing the Securities and Exchange Commission with the results of an internal investigation into its practices for granting stock options, but had no further comment Wednesday.

Apple is one of nearly 200 companies that have disclosed SEC, Justice Department or internal investigations for potential backdating of stock options. Backdating refers to retroactively pegging the strike price of an option to a day when the stock traded cheaply. Options with low strike prices are more valuable to their owner because they are less expensive to exercise.

In October, Apple said the internal investigation found no misconduct by any current officers but raised concerns about how two former officers recorded and accounted for stock options. Citing people with knowledge of the investigation, the Recorder also reported those two former officers were general counsel Nancy Heinen and Chief Financial Officer Fred Anderson.

Anderson retired as Apple's CFO in 2004 but remained a board member until he resigned in October after the internal inquiry. Heinen left Apple for unknown reasons in the spring, before Apple initiated its stock options probe in June.

Apple said the probe found accounting "irregularities" that occurred between 1997 and 2002. The troublesome awards included millions of options given to Jobs, though he subsequently surrendered the awards in 2003.

Echoing other analysts who have said they do not believe Jobs' position will be affected by the scandal, Piper Jaffray analyst Gene Munster said Wednesday that he remains convinced Jobs was not involved in any wrongdoing.

"Apple has issues with stock options, but I don't think it matters unless Steve Jobs is impacted," Munster said. "I think Wall Street could care less about this. They've already got two fall people — Nancy and Fred — and what it comes down to for investors is how many iPods they sold in the December quarter."

On Dec. 15, Apple said it was delaying filing its annual report with the SEC because of its ongoing investigation into stock option grants.

Apple Recovers After New Options Info (MRKTWTCH)

Market Watch, December 28, 2006

NEW YORK (MarketWatch) -- Apple Computer Inc. shares regained ground after being rocked Wednesday by a published report that some company officials may have falsified stock-option documents, and that Chief Executive Steve Jobs has hired a lawyer to represent him in federal inquiries.

The report from the California legal newspaper the Recorder, which appeared on the Web site Law.com, said federal prosecutors are examining the documents to determine whether criminal charges should be filed. The report cited "individuals familiar with the case who requested anonymity."

A separate report, which appeared in the Financial Times online edition, indicated that Jobs gained 7.5 million stock options in 2001 without the board's authorization, which is required.

The FT report, which cites unnamed people familiar with the matter, added that records were falsified to show that the board had approved the options for Jobs. The Securities and Exchange Commission is looking at those records to decide whether to pursue a case against Apple, according to the FT story.

The FT story didn't say who allegedly gave the options to Jobs or who allegedly falsified company records.

The Recorder story also said Jobs had decided to hire his own attorney to deal with inquiries by the Justice Department and the SEC. The high-profile chief executive had been represented by the company's outside law firm.

Apple had previously said that its own internal investigation found no misconduct by Jobs or other senior executives. The company did say that its probe had raised concerns about the actions of two unidentified former executives.

Company spokesman Steve Dowling had no specific comment on the news report, except to say Apple is "providing all the details of its investigation" to the SEC.

He said Apple plans to file its 10-K on or before Dec. 29, but he declined to say if it will contain any update on the stock-option investigation.

Gene Munster, an analyst at Piper Jaffray, pegged the odds that Jobs was involved in any shenanigans at less than 5%.

"We believe there is a very low likelihood that Steve Jobs was involved in the falsification of options documents, although we expect the investigation may continue to point to former Apple officers," Munster wrote Wednesday in a research note.

He reiterated his outperform rating on the stock.

Further details about Apple's situation are expected to be unveiled Friday, when the company plans to file several quarterly reports and its annual report for the fiscal year ended Sept. 30.

Apple has delayed the filings amid an internal probe into the backdating of employee stock-option grants.

The company previously has said that it would restate financial results for prior reporting periods to record noncash compensation charges after it found accounting irregularities for some grants issued between 1997 and 2002. Apple has not given an estimate of those charges.

The maker of Macintosh personal computers and iPod music and video players is among more than 100 firms under scrutiny for the practice of pricing option grants on dates that were different from their actual grant dates.

Grants priced on days when the underlying stock price was at monthly or quarterly lows led, in many cases, to sizable financial windfalls for corporate executives.

Revelations of options backdating have led to the ouster of more than 30 executives at companies. Among them is a former Apple chief financial officer, Fred Anderson, who resigned on Oct. 4, the same day that the company said its internal probe had found evidence of backdating.

That same investigation revealed that "in a few instances, Chief Executive Steve Jobs was aware that favorable grant dates had been selected, but he did not receive or otherwise benefit from these grants and was unaware of the accounting implications" of backdating.

Apple Shares May Fall On FT Report Of Jobs's Options Grant (BLOOM)

By Ian King And Connie Guglielmo

Bloomberg, December 28, 2006

Dec. 28 (Bloomberg) -- Shares of Apple Computer Inc. may fall after the Financial Times reported Chief Executive Officer Steve Jobs was given stock options in 2001 without the authorization of the company's board.

Company records that appear to show the full board considered a grant of 7.5 million stock options were falsified, the newspaper reported, citing people familiar with the matter. The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission is examining the evidence, the report said.

``It does create a certain amount of doubt as to whether Steve Jobs can stay with the company," Rob Enderle of the research firm Enderle Group said yesterday in an interview. ``It looks more and more serious."

DOJ_NMG_0109544

Apple is among the biggest names caught in a stock-option scandal that has widened to more than 190 companies. In June the maker of the iPod music player began an internal review of its grants, including one to Jobs. Apple said in October said it found 15 misdated grants from 1997 to 2002. The Recorder, a San Francisco-based legal newspaper, first reported yesterday on the discovery of possibly falsified documents related to options.

``We are providing all details regarding the internal independent investigation to the SEC and not commenting beyond that," Steve Dowling, an Apple spokesman, said by telephone.

John Nester, a spokesman for the SEC, refused to comment on the Financial Times article. Claude Stern, the partner in charge of the Redwood City, California, office of Quinn Emanuel Urquhart Oliver & Hedges, the law firm hired by Apple's board to examine the grants, declined to comment.

Shares Fall

Shares of Cupertino, California-based Apple declined $2.47, or 3 percent, to $79.05 in extended trading after the report. They gained 1 cent to $81.52 in regular Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading and had risen 13 percent this year.

``The SEC has been looking very hard at these cases and they're working with the Department of Justice to put together criminal cases," said Bill Portanova, a former federal prosecutor in solo practice in Sacramento, California. ``When prosecutors are looking at something that they think is wrong in the first place, and they find paperwork in support of that thing that has been falsified, their appetite is whetted."

When Apple released the results of its three-month investigation in October, it didn't disclose any falsified documents. The company said it found backdated option awards on 15 occasions from 1997 to January 2002. While Jobs, 51, was aware of some instances, he didn't benefit, Apple said.

Restatements Due

Apple promised to submit restatements for the third quarter ended July 1 and the year ended Sept. 30 by the end of December.

Backdating allows executives to inflate the value of the stock options by retroactively choosing grant dates when the underlying shares are lower. Restatements, revisions and charges have topped $5.7 billion among the companies that have corrected their results thus far.

Jobs apologized to shareholders in October after finding instances of favorable grants. Apple said at the time the actions of two unnamed former executives raised ``serious concerns." Former Chief Financial Officer Fred Anderson, whose tenure included the five years when options were manipulated, resigned from the company's board.

While Jobs knew some options were backdated, he didn't benefit or understand the accounting, the company said. Apple added there has been no misconduct by current management.

U.S. Attorney

The Recorder said yesterday federal prosecutors are examining whether Apple officials falsified documents to inflate the value of grants. The fake documents were uncovered during the company's internal probe, and the information was passed on to the U.S. Attorney's office, the Recorder said, citing people familiar with the case.

Helen Yee, a Justice Department spokeswoman in San Francisco, didn't return a phone call seeking comment after normal business hours.

``How does it affect the timing, predictability or size of cash flow of Apple going forward? The only way it can is if they implicate Jobs in some way," said James Grossman, a fund manager at Thrivent Financial for Lutherans in Appleton, Wisconsin. The firm oversees $65 billion including Apple shares.

``The charges are serious," said Grossman. ``I'm going to stick with the original statement by the company that Jobs isn't a part of it."

Nabors Industries Will Relaunch Review Of Option-Grant Practices (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

Nabors Industries Ltd. said it is initiating a further review of its option-granting practices in light of "issues raised" in an article published by The Wall Street Journal.

DOJ_NMG_0109545

The oil-and-gas driller said this review follows an internal review earlier this year of its stock-option practices going back to 1998. It said this initial review "did not suggest that there was reason to question the propriety" of its option-granting practices.

The Journal article, published yesterday, said that Eugene Isenberg, the chief executive officer of Nabors, is among the highest-paid corporate executives in history, receiving more than $450 million in compensation over the past 19 years, largely due to stock-option grants whose value, the article contends, was enhanced by certain "controversial moves" made by the company, which has U.S. headquarters in Houston but is registered in Bermuda.

The moves cited by the Journal included allowing Mr. Isenberg to trade in certain worthless options for new ones with lower exercise prices and "reloading" Mr. Isenberg with new options when he cashed in others.

In 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading yesterday, Nabors's shares rose 30 cents, or 1%, to $30.53.

In separate options-related news, HCC Insurance Holdings Inc. said it has completed an independent review of its stock-option-granting practice and recorded a gross noncash compensation expense of $26.6 million related to corrections of errors from 1997 to 2005.

The company said the charge had no impact on its reported net revenue, cash or cash flow for the period, but it did result in a net after-tax decrease in shareholders' equity of $3.3 million.

HCC, of Houston, said its conclusion of the review and subsequent completion of certain quarterly and annual financial filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission will have "cured any possible Event of Default" stemming from its failure to deliver the reports in a timely manner under the provisions of certain debt offerings.

In addition, HCC posted third-quarter net income of $93.3 million, or 80 cents a share, up from $7.4 million, or seven cents a share, in the year-earlier period.

HCC's shares rose 38 cents, or 1.2%, to $32.04 on the Big Board.

Street Sleuth France Ready To Bring Hedge Case (WSJ)

By Alistair MacDonald

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

France's markets regulator will fine hedge fund GLG Partners LP and Deutsche Bank AG for abuses arising out of a convertible-bond offer for French telecommunications-equipment maker Alcatel SA, according to people familiar with the matter.

The Autorité des Marchés Financiers, or AMF, is following the recommendations of a preliminary report it received in October that was compiled by one of its officials.

The AMF has decided to increase the fine levied on London-based GLG to €1.2 million ($1.6 million) from €1 million recommended in the report and reduce Deutsche Bank's fine to about €300,000 from €1.5 million, these people said.

Alcatel SA, now Alcatel-Lucent, announced Dec. 12, 2002, that it would offer between $640 million and $835 million in bonds that would convert into shares.

The AMF was investigating whether hedge funds acted on information offered by Deutsche Bank before the bonds' issuance was publicly announced.

While it is common practice by banks to preview deals to select clients ahead of their announcement, it is against market regulations in Europe to act on that information.

The AMF's final report will mainly blame former GLG trader Philippe Jabre for abuses related to the convertible-bond issue, according to one person familiar with the matter. Mr. Jabre is planning to launch a hedge fund in Geneva.

A spokesman for Mr. Jabre declined to comment. A spokesman for GLG said the firm will appeal the AMF's decision.

DOJ_NMG_0109546

A Deutsche Bank spokeswoman said, "Deutsche Bank has been sanctioned for technical and procedural reasons. There is no case to answer on insider trading. Deutsche Bank will not be appealing."

The AMF typically allows the appeals process to get under way before announcing the final results of its investigations.

The preliminary report said three other hedge funds, Marshall Wace LLP, Meditor Capital Management Ltd. and Ferox Capital Management Ltd., which had been targets of the investigation, didn't have a case to answer to. It is unclear whether they have been given a final clearance by the AMF.

The AMF's decision comes as politicians and some regulators in Europe call for increased scrutiny of hedge funds, which are private investment pools catering mainly to wealthy investors and institutions.

KLA-Tencor's Former Chief Tompkins Resigns From Board (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Ian King

Bloomberg, December 28, 2006

Dec. 27 (Bloomberg) -- Former KLA-Tencor Corp. Chairman Jon Tompkins resigned from the board, making him the fourth senior official to sever ties with the company since it discovered problems related to the backdating of stock option grants.

Tompkins resigned on Dec. 21, San Jose, California-based KLA-Tencor said in a U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission filing today. Tompkins, who is also chairman of Electro Scientific Industries Inc., quit for personal reasons, KLA-Tencor spokeswoman Kyra Whitten said. She declined to comment further.

Tompkins served as chief executive officer from May 1997 until July 1998, then as chairman until June 1999. The company said in September it would restate results from 1997 to 2002 after a special committee found incorrect dates were used in granting stock options to executives.

KLA-Tencor, the second-largest U.S. chip-equipment maker, said on Oct. 16 it found $400 million in costs related to backdated stock options and canceled grants to another former CEO, Kenneth Schroeder.

General Counsel Stuart J. Nichols resigned that day and KLA-Tencor said it terminated ``all aspects of its employment relationship'' with Schroeder, who ran the company from 1999 to 2005, succeeding Tompkins. A day later, Chairman Kenneth Levy retired. The company said it would reprice options held by Levy and other executives.

Tompkins didn't respond to a phone message seeking comment left at Electro Scientific Industries.

Shares

Shares of KLA-Tencor rose 20 cents to $50.21 at 4 p.m. New York time in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading and have gained 1.8 percent this year.

KLA-Tencor is among more than 190 companies to disclose internal or federal investigations of stock-option practices to determine if grant dates were manipulated to enrich employees. The SEC, the Justice Department and Internal Revenue Service are looking for evidence that companies broke securities or tax laws by backdating grants to coincide with days when share prices were low.

They're also examining grants that were made in advance of news that drove up company stock prices, a practice known as spring-loading.

SEC Reversal Irks A Committee Chief (WSJ)

By Siobhan Hughes

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Securities and Exchange Commission's decision to reverse course and relax disclosure rules on executive pay isn't sitting well with the Democrat who will head the House Financial Services Committee in the new Congress.

Rep. Barney Frank (D., Mass.) said he is "very disappointed with both the substance and the procedure" involved in the rule changes, which the SEC announced late Friday, just before the long Christmas weekend.

The rules, which apply to publicly held companies, would reduce the amount of top executives' compensation that many companies would be required to disclose next year. Companies would be allowed to spread the value of options and restricted-stock awards over a number of years, disclosing them as they vested, rather than in the year they were granted. Businesses had lobbied for the change, arguing that the SEC's plan to tighten disclosure requirements for options would have overstated executive pay.

Mr. Frank's committee has oversight of the SEC, and he could hold hearings on the executive-pay rules. He has already said he would push for legislation to allow shareholders to vote on executive compensation.

"Backtracking by the SEC on this important matter of stock options reinforces my determination that Congress must act to deal with the problem of executive compensation that is now unconstrained by anything except the self-restraint of top executives, a commodity that is apparently in insufficient supply," Mr. Frank said.

The SEC said it acted to reconcile the value of stock-options awards as disclosed in corporate financial statements with the value of executive-stock option grants disclosed to investors.

Companies treat stock options as costs in their financial statements as the options become exercisable. The SEC rules had previously required companies to disclose the value of stock-options awards on the date of the award, sometimes years before the recipient was entitled to exercise them.

SEC Chairman Christopher Cox said in a statement yesterday that "the object is to report accurate numbers. Artificially inflating executive pay, or reporting 'phantom' pay, is just as misleading as routinely underreporting it, which was the case before we adopted the new executive-compensation rules in July."

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce had complained that by including the value of options, stock or other awards that wouldn't vest -- or pay out -- for years, the earlier rules would have made executive pay packages look misleadingly large.

Executive pay increasingly is becoming a hot-button political issue as the pay gap widens between corporate chieftains and rank-and-file employees. Prompted by investor concern, the SEC earlier this year approved rules that will provide more information about the pay and perquisites granted to top executives. The new details of executive-pay packages will be released mostly in early 2007, when companies file annual proxy statements.
